Trial Court Discretion — Showing of Prejudice Required: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance, in which defendant argued he was deprived of his right to effective counsel, due process, and time to prepare his case. Motions for continuance are directed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the trial court will not be reversed absent a showing of prejudice to the movant, citing St. v. Paulson, 167 M 310, 538 P2d 339 (1975). As more than 2 months elapsed between the entry of defendant's plea and his motion for continuance, and because he failed to show any prejudice, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Denial Not Abuse of Discretion: In view of defendant's failure to comply with 25-4-501, it cannot be said that the court abused its discretion in denying a motion for continuance. St. v. Pascgo, 173 M 121, 566 P2d 802 (1977).

Good Cause for Continuance: If a defendant wishes to protect himself from alleged prejudice incurred by the use of an approximate date in charging an offense and the proof offered at trial, he can move for a continuance under this section. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

Substitution of Counsel: The denial of a motion for a continuance based on substitution of counsel was not an abuse of discretion or a denial of the defendants' constitutional right to counsel. St. v. Spurlock, 161 M 388, 506 P2d 842 (1973).

Time to Prepare for Trial Sufficient: The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in denying the defendant's application for a continuance over the term when the trial was set for May 7, 1956, after the defendant had entered a plea of guilty on April 24, 1956. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

Prejudice of Potential Jurors: In the absence of a showing of abuse of discretion, an order refusing continuance of a criminal trial, asked for on the grounds that a large portion of the persons qualified for jury duty in the county were prejudiced, will be affirmed. St. v. Collins, 88 M 514, 294 P 957 (1930).

ABSENCE OF WITNESSES

Guidelines for Determining Whether Motion for Continuance Based on Absent Witness Proper: During Fields' criminal trial, his motion for a recess to allow a second psychiatric expert witness was denied. When a continuance motion is requested and is reasonable, viewing all relevant factors, including the interests of justice and defendant's right to a fair trial, denial of the request is an abuse of discretion. In determining whether the District Court abused its discretion in denying the motion for continuance based on an absent witness, the Supreme Court set out guidelines, including whether: (1) there is a reasonable expectation or prospect of obtaining the presence of the absent witness; (2) the witness's testimony would help the defense; and (3) the witness would testify. Here, the charged offense was deliberate homicide; the requested delay was less than one-half day in a case originally estimated to require a week; the trial court had already ruled that Fields' second psychiatric expert's testimony was not cumulative and would go directly to the defense of mitigated deliberate homicide; Fields' counsel had told the jury that he would present two psychiatric experts; and in closing arguments, the state referred to the fact that Fields had presented only one psychiatric expert and that the expert had interviewed only Fields. Fields' motion was reasonable, and the trial court abused its discretion in refusing the motion for a continuance to allow the second psychiatrist to testify. St. v. Fields, 2002 MT 84, 309 M 300, 46 P3d 612 (2002), followed in St. v. Toulouse, 2005 MT 166, 327 M 467, 115 P3d 197 (2005).

Failure to Employ Due Diligence — Trial Court Discretion to Deny Continuance: The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it denied Elliott's motion for a continuance, noting that: (1) the trial had previously been continued at Elliott's request; (2) no reason was given why Elliott's expert was reluctant to appear and testify; (3) the matter had been pending for almost 1 year; and (4) Elliott had ample opportunity to arrange for witnesses. St. v. Elliott, 2002 MT 26, 308 M 227, 43 P3d 279 (2002), following St. v. Walker, 225 M 415, 733 P2d 352 (1987).

DUI Charge — No Objection to Rescheduled Trial — Vague Indication of Testimony — No Abuse of Discretion Found in Denial of Request for Continuance: Big Hair was arrested for DUI, and his trial was set 6 months in advance and was rescheduled once. On the day before trial, Big Hair moved for a continuance in order to procure the testimony of an exculpatory witness. The state objected on the grounds that the state's evidence would prove the basis for the arrest and that the arresting officer was moving to Oregon and would have to return if a continuance were granted. The Supreme Court upheld the denial of a continuance, noting that there was nothing in the record showing that Big Hair objected to the rescheduled trial date, that no basis was presented for Big Hair's belief that if a continuance was granted the witness could be located, and that Big Hair gave the District Court only vague indications as to what the witness's testimony might be. St. v. Big Hair, 1998 MT 61, 288 M 135, 955 P2d 1352, 55 St. Rep. 257 (1998).

Late Motion and Unidentified Witnesses in Unknown Place: Defendant moving for a continuance to obtain additional witnesses had to show reasonable cause for the continuance, that he employed due diligence to procure the witnesses, and that their testimony could help his defense. Defendant made the motion the day before trial, was not sure where the witnesses were or that they could be located in a reasonable time, refused to identify them, and stated they could only be located through intermediaries, whom he failed to identify. The District Court's denial of the motion was affirmed. St. v. Walker, 225 M 415, 733 P2d 352, 44 St. Rep. 363 (1987), and St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989). See also St. v. Johnston, 271 M 385, 897 P2d 1073, 52 St. Rep. 490 (1995).

No Show of Abuse of Discretion — Refusal to Continue: The District Court did not abuse its discretion and thus did not err in refusing the defendant, who was accused of aggravated assault, a continuance to allow additional time to find a witness. The record showed that the District Court considered the defense's diligence in procuring the witness and that there were no assurances given to the court that the witness would be located in a reasonable time or that her testimony would be as the defense believed it would be. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Minimal Inconvenience to Locate Local Witness: The District Court abused its discretion in denying a continuance to allow defendant time to locate a local witness who, although subpoenaed, failed to appear for the trial. In applying the guidelines set forth in St. v. DiGiallonardo, 160 M 379, 503 P2d 43 (1972), the Supreme Court determined that the continuance should have been granted because: (1) there was no showing of lack of diligence; (2) the continuance would have caused minimal inconvenience; and (3) any question regarding the probative value of the missing witness's testimony should have been resolved in favor of the defendant's right to a fair trial. St. v. Fife, 187 M 65, 608 P2d 1069 (1980).

Continuance Denied: The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a continuance to allow the defendants time to locate two missing witnesses. St. v. DiGiallonardo, 160 M 379, 503 P2d 43 (1972).

Insufficient Supporting Affidavit: An affidavit in support of a motion for a continuance on the ground of the absence of witnesses, which was filed on the day set for trial and failed to disclose the date upon which such witnesses left the state, was insufficient. Such an affidavit must disclose specifically the facts expected to be proved by the absent witnesses and set forth that, if such witnesses were present, they would testify to those facts. St. v. Showen, 60 M 474, 199 P 917 (1921).

LISTING OF WITNESSES

Listing of New Witnesses Ten Days Before Trial — Defense Acquiescence in Noncontinuance: The state gave notice 10 days prior to trial of intent to possibly call 12 additional witnesses. After defense objection, the state agreed not to call five of those witnesses, whereupon the defense appeared to acquiesce in the decision not to continue the trial date. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the new witnesses. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987).

Withholding of Informants' Names — Harmless Error: Defendant moved for a continuance when, with a trial date set for August 2, the informants' names were not revealed to defendant's attorney until late July 30 and the County Attorney knew defendant's attorney would be out of town on August 1. The District Court denied defendant's motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that although the Sheriff and police acted improperly in refusing to comply with the District Court's order to disclose the informants' names, this was harmless error in this case and was not grounds for a continuance. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the continuance because the informants could provide nothing that would refute the state's case. The Supreme Court stated that it did not condone the actions of the law enforcement agencies or the County Attorney. St. v. Warnick, 216 M 102, 699 P2d 1049, 42 St. Rep. 675 (1985).

Prosecution Witness Endorsed on Day of Trial — Failure to Request Continuance: Under the circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecution to endorse a psychological counselor, an assistant to the doctor treating the victim, as a witness on the day of the trial. The counselor was previously interviewed by the defense, and the doctor had long been identified as a prosecution witness. The defense did not petition for a continuance, which should have been done if it was believed the endorsement left the defense inadequately prepared. St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Late Notice of Evidence to Be Used — Waiver of Continuance: The night before trial the prosecutor phoned the defense and gave notice that he would use a piece of evidence of a prior criminal act. Judicially mandated notice was served the next morning. The judge granted a 2 ½-day continuance to the defense. Defense counsel waived his right to additional time when he told the judge after the continuance that he had had enough time to investigate the evidence and did not need time beyond the 2 ½ days. St. v. Azure, 208 M 233, 676 P2d 785, 41 St. Rep. 302 (1984).

Witness Added Five Days Before Trial — Three More Witnesses Added Morning of Trial — Not Error to Deny Continuance — Subject of Testimony Considered: It was not error for the District Court to deny a motion for continuance to a criminal defendant when the State added an extra witness 5 days before trial and then added three more witnesses on the morning of trial. The witness added 5 days before trial, an expert, was available for interviewing by the defense during those 5 days, and her testimony was basically corroborated by the defendant. The other three witnesses, local medical employees, testified (per stipulation) on chain of custody of the evidence and (not per stipulation, but de minimis) on preparation and shipping procedures of the evidence. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Witness List Amended — Continuance Denied: The trial court properly denied a defense motion for a continuance after permitting the State to amend its witness list on the morning of trial since the State informed the defendant's counsel of a change in the information within hours after the new witness negotiated a plea involving an agreement to testify. The defense counsel knew of the development on Friday but chose to keep other commitments, thus he was estopped from claiming surprise. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20 (1978).

Endorsement of Additional Witness on First Day of Trial:

The defendant was not prejudiced when, on the first day of the trial, the District Court endorsed two more witnesses for the prosecution because the defendant's counsel and the County Attorney had already discussed the endorsement, the two names were set out in the information as victims, the County Attorney showed good cause for failing to list the names specifically as witnesses prior to the trial, and the defendant's counsel could have asked for a postponement or a continuance. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

The lower court did not err in allowing the addition of the names of 58 new witnesses to the amended information on the day of trial when the defendant failed to ask for a continuance, the witnesses were not prejudicial to the defendant, and the court was careful to provide the defendant with protection against surprise and to ensure that the defendant was able to prepare for the testimony. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Failure of State to List Witnesses: When the State failed to list witnesses on an information and continually failed to provide a list of witnesses even after a request by the defendant to do so and a promise by the Deputy County Attorney to the District Court that he would do so, the State did not make a sufficient showing of "good cause" to add witnesses on the day of trial. Therefore, the defendant had no burden to move for a continuance of the trial date. St. v. Haag, 176 M 395, 578 P2d 740 (1978).

Amendment of Witness List — Remedy When Surprise Claimed: The proper procedure when surprise is claimed from the addition of witnesses is to ask for a continuance so that the defendant may prepare. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Amendment of Witness List During Trial: Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976).

ATTORNEY-CLIENT RELATIONSHIP

Counsel Ready for Trial — Motion for Continuance Properly Denied: Molder asserted that a motion to continue trial should have been granted because his substitute counsel was unprepared for trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779 (1984), to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion in denying a continuance, including: (1) the length of the requested delay; (2) whether the state's case would be prejudiced; (3) reasons for the requested continuance; (4) whether defense counsel was diligent in preparing for trial; (5) whether defendant's right to a speedy trial would be violated; and (6) defendant's right to effective assistance of counsel. Despite Molder's assertion to the contrary, his counsel stated that a trial strategy was in place and that counsel was prepared for trial. The Supreme Court held that the trial strategy was reasonable, that Molder suffered no prejudice, and that Molder's substantial rights were not affected. Denial of the motion for continuance was affirmed. St. v. Molder, 2007 MT 41, 336 M 91, 152 P3d 722 (2007).

Deprivation of Right to Private Counsel Through Denial of Continuance Motion Warranting Reversal: About 18 days before Garcia's criminal trial, Garcia moved for a continuance so that his prospective private counsel could prepare for trial. Here, the District Court denied the continuance because: (1) retention of private counsel 2 weeks prior to trial was not a sufficient reason to grant a continuance; (2) Garcia's court-appointed counsel was competent; (3) if the motion was granted, Garcia would remain in jail for a lengthy period because of the inability to post bail; and (4) a new trial could not be scheduled for several months because of the court's congested docket. The case proceeded, and Garcia was convicted. On appeal, Garcia contended that denial of the continuance motion was error, and the Supreme Court agreed. The right to counsel contemplates the right to effective assistance of counsel, and the right to effective assistance in turn encompasses the right to retain counsel of one's choosing. Regardless of whether a defendant is entitled to appointed counsel, the right to be heard through the defendant's own counsel is unqualified. Pursuant to St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683 (1995), a defendant may not insist upon appointment of specific counsel or demand dismissal or substitution of appointed counsel as long as effective assistance is rendered. However, for individuals with the means to secure private representation, the right to decide who can best conduct the case must be respected whenever feasible. A District Court must consider a motion for continuance in a criminal trial in light of the diligence shown by the moving party and may grant the continuance if, in its discretion, the interests of justice so require. Here, Garcia exercised sufficient diligence in acquiring independent representation and in seeking a continuance, and the District Court abused its discretion in denying the continuance motion. Questions of the competency and effective assistance of court-appointed counsel were irrelevant and should not have been considered in addressing the continuance. Although the denial of a continuance motion cannot be reversed absent a showing of resultant prejudice to a defendant, in this case, despite the legitimacy of the subsequent proceedings, a deprivation of this magnitude warranted reversal in the interests of justice. St. v. Garcia, 2003 MT 211, 317 M 73, 75 P3d 313 (2003).

Denial of Continuance Unfair When Defendant Tried to Secure Counsel With Due Diligence: An information was filed December 2, 1983, charging the defendant with the offense of sexual intercourse without consent. After retaining an attorney, the defendant pleaded not guilty to the charge on December 9, 1983. The attorney continued to represent the defendant until a disagreement arose between the two concerning the handling of a motion hearing. Two days later, on May 2, 1984, the defendant released the attorney. On May 3, 1984, the defendant tried to secure another attorney, who agreed to represent the defendant only if the trial court would grant a continuance. The court refused to do so, and trial was set to begin May 14. The defendant, after trying unsuccessfully a second time to secure counsel, appeared at trial without an attorney and again moved for a continuance. The motion was denied. Voir dire commenced, a jury was selected and sworn, and the defendant again moved for a continuance, waiving his right to a speedy trial. An attorney was appointed to defend the defendant, the trial proceeded immediately without allowing defendant's counsel an opportunity to prepare, and the defendant subsequently was convicted. The trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a continuance of the trial as he acted with due diligence to secure new counsel on learning he was not compatible with the attorney he initially retained. The mere right to an attorney is not sufficient if that attorney is not given sufficient time to prepare the client's case, including adequate pretrial preparation time. The defendant was denied a fair trial. St. v. Lundblade, 213 M 420, 691 P2d 831, 41 St. Rep. 2208 (1984).

Denial of Continuance When Attorney Informed of Appointment 25 Days Before Homicide Trial — Fair Trial and Effective Assistance Rights Denied: Attorney for defendant charged with deliberate homicide was relieved of his duty on December 14, and the new attorney learned of his appointment on December 30. On January 3, trial was set for January 24, and the new attorney was notified of the trial date on January 5. He spoke with the trial Judge on January 10 about a continuance, and on January 17 a motion for continuance was heard and denied. In the 7 days before trial, the attorney was able to interview only 8 of the state's 12 witnesses and could not locate possible defense witnesses or interview the state's pathologist. Refusal of the continuance was an abuse of discretion and reversible error requiring a new trial. The attorney's diligence was unquestioned, and though the state had a right to a speedy trial, the defendant's right to a fair trial must take precedence, particularly since defendant waived his speedy trial right. Defendant's rights to a fair trial and effective assistance of counsel were denied. St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779, 41 St. Rep. 568 (1984).

Failure to Cooperate With Counsel — Continuance Denied: Defendant was arrested and charged with felony theft, theft, and burglary on November 20, 1980. His trial was set for February 22, 1981. On February 20, 1981, defendant's counsel moved for a continuance because defendant had not been cooperating with counsel up until date of motion but had finally agreed to cooperate. The District Court denied the motion, saying defendant had not employed due diligence to cooperate with counsel. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion and would not overturn the District Court's ruling. St. v. Van Natta, 200 M 312, 651 P2d 57, 39 St. Rep. 1771 (1982).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute adopts the key provisions of the 1987 code that permitted a change of the place of trial for prejudice. Subsection (1) allows that either party may file such a motion but also requires that prejudice be significant enough to jeopardize the fair trial process. The subsection preserves established procedure. As the Montana Supreme Court stated, facts must be shown creating a reasonable apprehension that a fair trial cannot be had. Allegations alone will not support a change for prejudice. See St. v. Palmer, 223 Mont. 25 (1986). Subsection (2) preserves the court's options when faced with a case in which local prejudice may affect the fair trial. Nothing in this provision differs from the 1987 code.

This section is not intended to overrule the two Dryman decisions, 127 Mont. 579, 269 P.2d 796; 128 Mont. 402, 276 P.2d 969; but it is intended to preserve the fair trial rule allowing a change of venue when it appears impossible to draw an impartial jury.

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in two places in (2), before "court", inserted "district".

1991 Amendment: In (1) deleted last sentence that read: "The motion must be made at least 15 days prior to trial except that, if good cause is shown, it may be made thereafter"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The motion must be in writing and supported by an affidavit which must state facts showing the nature of the prejudice alleged. The defendant or the state may file counteraffidavits. The court shall conduct a hearing and determine the merits of the motion"; in (2)(a), after "other", deleted "court of competent jurisdiction in any"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Inserted (3)(b) authorizing court to select a jury in another county; and inserted (3)(c) authorizing court to take any other action to insure a fair trial.

GENERAL

Pretrial Publicity Test for Change of Venue — Inflammatory Publicity Defined: Devlin moved for a change of venue for his bail-jumping trial on grounds of inflammatory publicity. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court considered what constitutes inflammatory publicity. The pertinent question is not simply whether media reports contain editorializing, whether the reports were calculated to achieve a sinister purpose, or whether the reports contained factual information. Although those are relevant factors, the focus must be on the publicity's likely effect on the jury pool. Therefore, inflammatory publicity is defined as publicity that, by its nature, has the tendency to stir up in the community pervasive and strong passions of anger, hatred, indignation, revulsion, and upset to such an extent that there are reasonable grounds to believe that jurors chosen from that community could not determine a defendant's guilt or innocence in a fair and unbiased manner based solely on the evidence at trial. This determination must be made based on extant circumstances, including but not limited to the size of the jury pool, the nature of the offense charged, the type and character of the media reports, readership of the publication, the relative size of the radio or television audience, the time lapse between the publicity and the trial, whether the reports contain extrajudicial statements by prosecutors or law enforcement personnel that are prejudicial to the defendant, and whether there is any ostensible adverse community reaction to the publicity. Considering the entire record, the Supreme Court concluded that the pretrial publicity was not inflammatory. Devlin failed to demonstrate, by surveys or affidavits or by individual voir dire, that the publicity actually inflamed the prejudice of the community to such an extent that a reasonable possibility existed that Devlin would not receive a fair and impartial trial. Thus, Devlin failed to meet the standard, and the District Court did not err in denying Devlin's motion for change of venue. St. v. Devlin, 2009 MT 18, 349 M 67, 201 P3d 791 (2009). See also St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366 (1981), St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457 (1994), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996).

Appeal of City Court Ruling — Trial De Novo in District Court Proper Remedy: Defendant was charged in Three Forks City Court with four counts of endangering the welfare of a minor. The City Court determined that a fair trial could not be had in Three Forks and, upon motion by the city for a change of venue, ordered the case and jurisdiction transferred to Madison County. A Madison County Justice's Court jury convicted defendant of one count and acquitted on three counts. Defendant appealed to Gallatin County District Court, requesting that the case be dismissed because the Three Forks City Court improperly granted the change of venue. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, but concluded that the change of venue was an abuse of discretion and remanded to the Three Forks City Court for a new trial. The city appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The general rule is that, with few exceptions, District Courts must try appeals from Justices' Courts and City Courts de novo, rather than acting as courts of review. In this case, none of the statutory or case law exceptions to the general rule applied, so the District Court was limited to the remedy of conducting a de novo trial as required by 46-17-311, regardless whether the City Court's change of venue was erroneous. A trial de novo in District Court also cured any prejudice that might have been suffered by defendant occasioned by the change of venue. The case was remanded for a trial de novo in Gallatin County District Court. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681

(2007), distinguishing Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800 (1998), and St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

No Prejudice in Change of Venue: The trial court granted Bar-Jonah's motion for a change of venue from Great Falls to Butte. Even though the venue change was requested by Bar-Jonah, following conviction, he asserted that pretrial publicity in Butte precluded a fair trial. The Supreme Court found that Bar-Jonah failed to demonstrate prejudice by the decision to hold the trial in Butte and declined to reverse the judgment absent a showing that any error in changing the venue was prejudicial. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Insufficient Probable Cause for Citizen Arrest — Suppression of Evidence Proper: At the visitor center at Malmstrom Air Force Base, security officers smelled alcohol on May's breath when May sought to enter the base. Because May was a civilian, the officers believed that May could be detained but not arrested, so they held May's driver's license, registration, and proof of insurance, and May was told to wait until a highway patrol officer arrived. May was subsequently arrested for DUI and at trial asked the District Court to suppress evidence from the arrest on grounds that the arrest was not based on probable cause and was thus illegal. Following denial of the suppression motions and conviction, May appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Applying the test in St. v. Widenhofer, 286 M 341, 950 P2d 1383 (1997), the court determined that May's detention constituted a citizen arrest. The test for probable cause for a citizen arrest is whether a reasonable person, under personally known facts and circumstances, is warranted in believing that someone is committing or has committed an offense. Here, the security officers' sole basis for detaining May was the smell of alcohol, but the odor of alcohol emanating from May's person, standing alone, was insufficient to establish probable cause for a citizen arrest. Thus, the arrest was illegal, and evidence related to the arrest should have been suppressed. St. v. May, 2004 MT 45, 320 M 116, 86 P3d 42 (2004).

Test for Change of Venue: A motion for a change of venue is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a denial is not error in the absence of an abuse of that discretion. Each case must be determined by the facts presented by it, and all indications of prejudice must be considered. The rule is that the accused is entitled to a change of venue when it appears that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the prejudice alleged actually exists and that by reason of the prejudice there is a reasonable apprehension that the accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982); State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Venue Change Ordered Where Pervasive Publicity Among Small Population: Upon reversing mitigated deliberate homicide conviction had upon defendant's second trial for the offense charged, the Supreme Court ordered the District Court to grant a change of venue. The county (Mineral) in which the offense occurred had only about 993 residents, substantially increasing the probability that publicity could be pervasive and affect the opinions of potential jurors. There had already been two trials in the county, each hotly contested and attended by many residents of the county, so that the possibility that the results and content of the prior trials had been widely disseminated was much higher than if no prior trials had occurred. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Pre-Voir Dire Determinations: Voir dire is not the solution to every venue case in which it must be determined whether prejudice still exists and whether by reason of it there is a reasonable apprehension that accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. Although that issue is usually determined by voir dire, each case must turn on its own merits, and a motion for a change of venue may be decided prior to voir dire if the circumstances of the case indicate inherent prejudice. Judicial economy and effective administration of justice are not served by the use of voir dire to decide the issue when it is apparent that it should be decided before voir dire, and there is the inherent problem of an atmosphere that may exert pressure on the jury selected. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Content and Effect of Pretrial Publicity — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: In assessing whether pretrial publicity precludes a fair trial, a court must consider the content of the publicity and its effect on the jury. A single misstatement of facts in a newspaper article 6 months prior to trial did not constitute inflammatory or impassioned press coverage. Where each person on the jury either had not read the newspaper article or could not recall the details of the article, the impact of the pretrial publicity was insufficient. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Prejudice of Judge:

In support of an application for a change of place of trial a denial of bail could not be claimed as showing prejudice by the trial judge, for such is a mere preliminary matter. St. v. London, 131 M 410, 310 P2d 571 (1957).

The action of a judge in refusing to set bond pending appeal from a manslaughter conviction is not an act which prejudices a defendant during a trial. St. v. Bischert, 131 M 152, 308 P2d 969 (1957).

"Place" Defined: In the expression "place of trial", the word "place" primarily means county and is synonymous with the word "venue". State ex rel. Sackett v. Thomas, 25 M 226, 64 P 503 (1901).

MOTION REQUIRED

Extensive Publicity — Failure to Move for Change of Venue: In a case that was the subject of extensive pretrial and trial publicity, the defendant was not denied his right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury when the record indicated that the defendant had attempted to use the media for his own advantage and had failed to move for a change of venue on the basis of the publicity. The defendant's argument that the court should have examined the jury as to their contact with the publicity and its prejudicial effect on them was not a proper subject for examination on appeal since no such motion was made during trial. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Application Necessary: The defendant in a criminal proceeding was not entitled to a change of venue when the files did not contain any application for a change of place of trial. In re Larocque's Petition, 139 M 405, 365 P2d 950 (1961).

MOTION PROPERLY DENIED

No Prejudicial Atmosphere in County Where State Prison Located: Defendant was charged with possession of a deadly weapon while an inmate at the state prison. He sought change of venue, contending that prejudice in the county where the prison was located was so great that a fair trial could not be had. The formation of a Citizen Protection Association and the fact that a large number of prison employees lived in the county did not constitute a prejudicial atmosphere. Also, upon review of the record of voir dire, the Supreme Court concluded an impartial jury had been empaneled, belying defendant's contention that all juries in the county were unalterably prejudiced. St. v. Palmer, 223 M 25, 723 P2d 956, 43 St. Rep. 1503 (1986).

Knowledge of Crime by Jurors Insufficient — Prejudice Required: Knowledge on the part of jurors cannot be equated with prejudice; thus, it was not an abuse of discretion by the trial court to deny a change of venue based upon appellant's claim of a denial of a fair trial because nearly all of the impaneled jury had heard of the case. Appellant must establish that a prejudicial atmosphere existed within the venue which created a reasonable apprehension that he could not get a fair trial. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986), followed in St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Change of Venue to Adjacent County Proper: The trial court granted defendant's motion for change of venue, but over defendant's objection, placed venue in an adjacent county. The court agreed to reconsider the issue and change venue if the selection of jurors in the adjacent county indicated the defendant could not receive a fair trial. As the case came to trial, defendant did not renew his allegations of prejudice and thus waived his objection. The key to a venue inquiry is whether a fair trial may be had in a particular county, which is primarily a factual question. In this case, the action of the trial court was not arbitrary or capricious and therefore will not be overturned. The court acted reasonably in balancing the competing considerations of cost and inconvenience of holding a trial at a distant venue with the defendant's right to a fair trial. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985). See also St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Venue of Second Retrial Returned to County Where Crime Committed — Order Upheld: Defendant argued that he had met a considerable burden in initially obtaining change of venue from Flathead County to Lake County, and that it was error for the District Court to order change of venue to Flathead County for a second retrial. The Supreme Court observed that the trial court was granted the discretion to determine place of trial and upheld the order changing venue, with cautionary instructions for the trial court and prosecution to use stringent controls to insulate the trial jury from any local prejudice. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985).

Notorious and Controversial Defendant — Fairness Insured — No Change of Venue: The defendant was president of the Valley Industrial Park (V.I.P.). The defendant became a notorious and controversial figure when an attempt was made to house Cuban refugees at V.I.P. During the voir dire of the jury in defendant's trial on theft of V.I.P. property, every member of the jury panel stated that they knew of V.I.P. and the defendant. Defendant moved for a change of venue, but his motion was denied. On appeal, the court said the defendant failed to show prejudice and inflammation. The transcript indicates the District Court used many precautions to ensure fairness and therefore properly denied defendant's motion for a change of venue. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Community Upheaval — Subsided Before Trial: Where the defendant was convicted of two counts of negligent homicide after striking and killing a police officer and another person with his truck, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a change of venue. The defendant failed to satisfy the test for a change of venue established in St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366 (1981), as the record showed that although there was community upheaval over the double deaths, that upheaval had significantly subsided within a few months after the incident. Moreover, the defendant was instructed by the court that the motion could be renewed, but it never was. St. v. Ballard, 202 M 81, 655 P2d 986, 39 St. Rep. 2342 (1982).

Jurors Challenged for Cause — Not Proof of Prejudice: An inmate at Montana State Prison, charged with the offense of possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner, moved for a change of venue, claiming that a fair trial could not be had in the county because of prejudice. The fact that 4 jurors out of the total of 28 called were challenged for cause did not establish the existence of communitywide prejudice. The real question is whether the 12 jurors impaneled were sufficiently impartial. St. v. Ritchson, 199 M 51, 647 P2d 830, 39 St. Rep. 1201 (1982).

Prejudicial Pretrial Publicity Not Proved: An inmate at Montana State Prison, charged with the offense of possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner, moved for a change of venue, claiming that a fair trial could not be had in the county because of prejudicial pretrial publicity. Because the newspaper articles complained of were factual reports, contained no editorializing, and did not refer to the inmate's offense, they were not inflammatory. Because the inmate did not inquire at voir dire if any prospective jurors had read the articles, he failed to prove that the community was actually inflamed by the articles. The motion for change of venue was properly denied. St. v. Ritchson, 199 M 51, 647 P2d 830, 39 St. Rep. 1201 (1982), followed in St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988), St. v. Bousquet, 248 M 53, 808 P2d 506, 48 St. Rep. 320 (1991), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996).

Prejudice to Be Exposed Through Voir Dire: Armstrong sought a change of venue and the appointment of an independent pollster to demonstrate the effect of prejudicial pretrial publicity. The District Court gave Armstrong, through his counsel, the opportunity to dig out and expose, through voir dire examination, any bias or prejudice that would have prevented a fair trial. The voir dire examination did not reveal any such prejudice. The District Court properly denied both the motion for an opinion survey at county expense and the motion for a change of venue. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341 (1980).

Court's Discretion:

The defendant in a deliberate homicide case had moved for a change of venue based on allegedly inflammatory pretrial publicity and general bias against him in the county where the victim was killed. The Supreme Court held that a motion for a change of venue is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and a denial is not reversible error in the absence of an abuse of discretion by the trial court. The Supreme Court also looked at the indicia of a denial of a fair trial resulting from prejudicial publicity (i.e., arousal of feelings of the community, threat to personal safety of the defendant, established opinion of members of the community as to the guilt of the accused, news articles beyond the objectivity of news printing and dissemination, and difficulty or failure in securing a fair and impartial jury from the community in which the news articles appeared). Having applied these indicators to the defendant's case and having considered the allegedly inflammatory news articles and broadcasts and the voir dire examination of prospective jurors, the Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion for a change of venue. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980). The denial was found proper in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. Bashor v. Risley, 730 F2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1984).

When the affidavits supporting the defendant's motion for a change of venue failed to show compelling evidence in support of the motion, it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to deny the motion. St. v. Barick, 143 M 273, 389 P2d 170 (1964).

An application for a change of place of trial is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and a clear abuse of discretion must be shown or the ruling of the trial court will not be disturbed. In re Larocque's Petition, 139 M 405, 365 P2d 950 (1961); St. v. Bischert, 131 M 152, 308 P2d 969 (1957).

Due Process — Change of Venue for Prejudicial Publicity — Affidavit: The District Court's denial of defendant's motion for change of venue or a continuance for prejudicial publicity did not deprive him of due process since an affidavit supporting assertions of prejudice did not accompany the motion as required. Additionally, the facts do not indicate he was denied a fair trial. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224 (1979).

Venue Unaffected by Publicity of Murder: Considering the nature of the crime involved, the Supreme Court found the reporting extremely objective and factual and not unreasonably voluminous. Therefore, there was no abuse of discretion in the District Court's refusal to grant defendant's motion for change of venue. St. v. Sandstrom, 176 M 492, 580 P2d 106 (1978).

Racial Bias Unproved: There was no evidentiary basis in the record to show the trial court abused its discretion in denying a change in venue based on the alleged anti-Black attitude at the trial site. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977).

Refusal to Transfer Proper: Notwithstanding the pretrial publicity and the judge's comment that transfer of the case would cause expense to the county, if each juror seated could render an impartial verdict based upon the evidence, there was no error in not transferring the case. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Juror's Impartiality: The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion for change of place of trial based on the mere existence of any preconceived notion as to the guilt or innocence of an accused as sufficient impartiality is established if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court. St. v. Lewis, 169 M 290, 546 P2d 518 (1976), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994). See also St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

MOTION ERRONEOUSLY DENIED

Same Defendant — Similar Facts — Change of Venue Required: Paisley appealed to the District Court a conviction of a misdemeanor sexual assault. The case was to be tried de novo in the District Court. Earlier, in St. v. Paisley, 204 M 191, 663 P2d 322, 40 St. Rep. 763 (1983), the Supreme Court had approved an order granting a change of venue in companion cases on felony charges. In the interests of consistency, the Supreme Court issued a Writ of Supervisory Control ordering the District Court to grant a change of venue. State ex rel. Paisley v. District Court, 673 P2d 815, 40 St. Rep. 1852 (1983).

Prejudicial Pretrial Statements by Prosecution: In a well publicized and controversial case, defendant charged with rape had bail set at $100,000 by a Justice of the Peace and lowered to $15,000 by the District Court. The County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney made statements to the press and various groups clearly indicating they believed defendant guilty and praising the description of defendant and his vehicle given by the 11-year-old victim. A disciplinary rule of Canons of Professional Ethics states that prosecutors shall not, in a pending case, make statements that a reasonable person would expect to be disseminated by means of public communication and that relate to the testimony or credibility of a prospective witness or to any opinion as to guilt or innocence of the accused or to the evidence or merits of the case. The failure of the County Attorney and a Deputy County Attorney to strictly adhere to the dictates of that rule jeopardized the impartial administration of justice to defendant by contributing to the establishment of prejudice against him, prejudice that the Supreme Court found to warrant a change of venue. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Publicity and Actions Arising From Rape and Bail: Defendant charged in Helena with rape of 11-year-old girl was entitled to a change of venue, as his exhibits and affidavits supplied reasonable grounds to believe that the prejudice alleged actually existed. After a Justice of the Peace set bail at $100,000, the District Court lowered it to $15,000. Angry citizens marched on the courthouse, public meetings were held and organizations were formed to address the matter, removal of the judge was sought, vandalism occurred, threats were made against defendant, the only local paper ran numerous front-page stories with photos and went beyond an objective dissemination of information and inflamed an already angry populace, and the Sheriff, County Attorney, and a Deputy County Attorney made comments prejudicial to defendant indicating they clearly believed him guilty. Law enforcement officials praised the victim's careful, excellent, and thorough description of her assailant and his vehicle. Numerous letters to the editor of the local paper indicating belief in defendant's guilt were printed. Defendant and his wife were forced to move to avoid reprisals and were prevented from moving into a place of their choice by complaints of nearby residents. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Intense Feeling Against Defendant in Community: The trial court was in error for refusing to grant a change of venue when the evidence disclosed that local newspapers had fanned the feeling of the community against the defendant and that county officials themselves felt that feeling against the defendant was so high that they moved him for safety to the state prison. St.

v. Dryman, 127 M 579, 269 P2d 796 (1954). See also State ex rel. Dryman v. District Court, 128 M 402, 276 P2d 969 (1954).

MOTION ERRONEOUSLY GRANTED

No Finding of Existing Prejudice: The findings of the District Judge do not indicate that he found existing prejudice. Rather, he found that "the publicity incident to these particular cases, without more, is sufficient to warrant a change of venue". Montana case law requires more than an allegation of publicity; the court must determine that the publicity has so affected the community and has so aroused prejudice in the community that a fair trial cannot be had. Without such a finding, the District Judge abused his discretion in ordering the change of venue. St. v. Link, 194 M 556, 640 P2d 366, 38 St. Rep. 982 (1981), followed in St. v. Bousquet, 248 M 53, 808 P2d 506, 48 St. Rep. 320 (1991). See also St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162, 53 St. Rep. 966 (1996), citing St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457 (1994), St. v. Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 114-1(f).

This segment of the pre-trial motions chapter is general in scope and is intended to outline the approach to be used by the defense in raising objections up to and including the time of arraignment. The remaining segment of pre-trial motions is primarily concerned with affirmative requests on the part of the defense for changes in the conduct of the future trial—such as (1) continuance, (2) change of venue, (3) change of judge.

46-13-205. Return to original place of trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a newly developed provision intended to provide for instances in which a retrial is required for a case in which a change of place of trial has been previously granted. This statute allows the case to return to the county in which it was originally and properly filed if a retrial is required. Once the case returns to the county in which it was originally filed, that court may again determine whether a change of place of trial is warranted.

Case Notes

Appeal of City Court Ruling — Trial De Novo in District Court Proper Remedy: Defendant was charged in Three Forks City Court with four counts of endangering the welfare of a minor. The City Court determined that a fair trial could not be had in Three Forks and, upon motion by the city for a change of venue, ordered the case and jurisdiction transferred to Madison County. A Madison County Justice's Court jury convicted defendant of one count and acquitted on three counts. Defendant appealed to Gallatin County District Court, requesting that the case be dismissed because the Three Forks City Court improperly granted the change of venue. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, but concluded that the change of venue was an abuse of discretion and remanded to the Three Forks City Court for a new trial. The city appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The general rule is that, with few exceptions, District Courts must try appeals from Justices' Courts and City Courts de novo, rather than acting as courts of review. In this case, none of the statutory or case law exceptions to the general rule applied, so the District Court was limited to the remedy of conducting a de novo trial as required by 46-17-311, regardless whether the City Court's change of venue was erroneous. A trial de novo in District Court also cured any prejudice that might have been suffered by defendant occasioned by the change of venue. The case was remanded for a trial de novo in Gallatin County District Court. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681

Change of Place of Trial — Jurisdiction Retained by Original Court: When the location of a criminal trial is changed, the court in which the proceeding is commenced ordinarily retains jurisdiction. However, a City Court Judge may call in a substitute judge to act in the original judge's place. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute, using Rule 13 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure as a model, provides for consolidation of charges or defendants in the interest of judicial economy when the charges or defendants could have been charged jointly in the first place.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at end substituted "46-11-404" for "46-12-213, 46-15-322, and 46-15-323".

46-13-211. Relief from prejudicial joinder.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Relying on Rule 14 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, subsection (1) provides that the court may order severance whenever either party is prejudiced by a joinder.

Subsection (2), based on the same federal rule, allows the court opportunity to review any extrajudicial statements of codefendants that are intended to be introduced at a joint trial. By doing so, the statute enables the court to determine whether the use of those statements would cause a prejudicial joinder.

Case Notes

Failure of Trial and Appellate Counsel to Adequately Assert Prejudice Element of Motion to Sever Constituting Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Warranting Reversal: Trial counsel failed to properly form a motion to sever sexual assault charges from pornography charges in a manner to demonstrate that failure to sever the criminal counts would result in prejudice to defendant. Following conviction on all counts, appellate counsel argued in St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004), that the trial court erred in failing to sever, but did not raise the issue of ineffective assistance of trial counsel, so the Supreme Court declined to consider the issue. On a petition for postconviction relief, new counsel argued the ineffective assistance of both trial and appellate counsel, and the District Court agreed. However, the petition was dismissed on grounds that counsels' conduct did not prejudice defendant in a manner that denied defendant a fair trial. Defendant appealed denial of the petition, and the Supreme Court reversed. Trial counsel's failure to allege the nature or type of prejudice that would occur absent a severance constituted ineffective assistance, and appellate counsel's failure to raise ineffective assistance of trial counsel could not be viewed as a legitimate appellate strategy. Defendant received inadequate assistance of both trial and appellate counsel and was entitled to a new trial on the sexual assault charges. Yecovenko v. St., 2007 MT 338, 340 M 251, 173 P3d 684 (2007).

Standard of Review for Severance of Counts: A criminal defendant seeking to sever counts into separate trials has the burden of proving that severing the counts is necessary to prevent unfair prejudice. It is not enough to prove that some prejudice will result from a joint trial or that a better chance of acquittal would be realized from separate trials; rather, defendant has the burden to prove that prejudice will prevent a fair trial. As enumerated in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3 (1999), there are three types of prejudice that defendant may prove that must be considered by a trial court: (1) the accumulation of evidence may be such that a jury would find defendant to be a bad person and wish to convict defendant of something; (2) a jury might use evidence of guilt on one count to convict on another count, even though that evidence would be inadmissible at a separate trial on the latter count; and (3) defendant may suffer prejudice by wanting to testify on one count but not another. If the District Court fails to properly weight these types of prejudice against the judicial economy resulting from a new trial, an abuse of discretion occurs. In this case, Freshment conceded the third factor and failed to meet his burden to show prejudice under the other two factors, so although the case was reversed on other grounds, no abuse of discretion was ascribed to the denial of Freshment's motion to sever. St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002), followed in St. v. Yecovenko, 2004 MT 196, 322 M 247, 95 P3d 145 (2004), and St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

No Prejudice in Joinder of Logically Linked Offenses: Hocevar was charged with attempted deliberate homicide, two counts of deliberate homicide, criminal endangerment, and assault in connection with the deaths of her two sons. The District Court denied her pretrial motion to sever the two counts associated with the death of one son from the three counts associated with the death of her other son, finding instead that joinder was proper because the counts were similar in nature and much of the proof, which included many out-of-state professional witnesses, would apply to all counts. Hocevar appealed on grounds that the counts should have been severed and separate trials held. In determining whether to grant a motion to sever, the trial court must balance the possibility of prejudice to defendant against the judicial economy that results from a joint trial and the burden is on defendant to show that prejudice was so great as to prevent a fair trial (see St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222 (1995)). Citing St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380 (1996), the Supreme Court considered three types of prejudice that may result from the joinder of charges: (1) the jury considers a defendant facing multiple charges a "bad person" and accumulates evidence until it convicts the defendant of something; (2) the jury uses proof of guilt on one count to convict the defendant of a second count, even though the proof would be inadmissible in a separate trial on the second count; and (3) the defendant wishes to testify on one charge but not another. Hocevar alleged prejudice of the first two types, but after reviewing the record, the Supreme Court held that Hocevar failed to establish the existence of any of the three types of prejudice against her and affirmed the trial court's joinder of charges. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Joinder of Criminal Counts of Similar Character — Factors in Determining Similarity of Crimes: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. Southern moved to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials, pursuant to this section, based on there being four different victims. Southern claimed a lack of similarity of the alleged crimes. The motion to sever was denied, and Southern was convicted on all nine counts and subsequently appealed. Although not determinative, some factors that are relevant to whether charges in an information are of the same or similar character include whether: (1) the charges are brought under the same statute; (2) the charges involve similar victims, locations, or modus operandi; (3) the conduct charged occurred in a narrow timeframe; and (4) the conduct charged occurred in a limited geographical area. Southern sought to differentiate the crimes by pointing out that the rapes occurred at different times of day, that some involved use of a knife while others did not, and that not all the rapes took place in the victims' homes. The Supreme Court held that despite these differences, the five counts of sexual intercourse without consent were properly joined because the crimes were of sufficiently similar character, being charged under the same statute. Counts may also be joined if the offenses constitute parts of a common scheme or plan. Thus, the kidnapping, burglary, and theft counts were also properly joined because, by definition, they were part of a common scheme linked by motive and because one charge precipitated the second charge, so overlapping proof would have been required regarding those counts and the accompanying counts of sexual intercourse without consent. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), following St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222, 52 St. Rep. 1176 (1995).

Joinder of Criminal Counts of Similar Character — No Prejudice: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. Southern moved to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials, pursuant to this section, based on there being four different victims. Southern asserted that joinder of the counts under 46-11-404 would result in unfair prejudice. However, it is not sufficient for a criminal defendant to prove that the defendant will face some prejudice as a result of a joint trial or that the defendant stands a better chance of acquittal in separate trials; rather, the defendant must prove that prejudice is so great as to prevent a fair trial. Applying the three basic kinds of prejudice outlined in St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509 (1976), the Supreme Court found no unfair prejudice and affirmed, deferring to the trial court's discretion in balancing the possibility of prejudice against the judicial economy resulting from a joint trial. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), following St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996), and followed in St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005), and St. v. Harlson, 2006 MT 312, 335 M 25, 150 P3d 349 (2006).

Denial of Motion to Sever Upheld — Defendant Not Prejudiced by Admission of Evidence of Other Crimes: Martin was charged with several counts of sexual assault, sexual intercourse without consent, and deviate sexual conduct. Martin sought to have the counts severed in such a manner that five separate trials would have been required, but the District Court refused to sever. Martin argued that he was prejudiced on one count by the admission of evidence applicable to another count. Citing the rules on admissibility of evidence of other crimes established in St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), the Supreme Court held that the evidence that was admissible on some counts was admissible on others as well, so that Martin was not prejudiced by the use of inadmissible evidence. St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996), followed in St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Denial of Motion to Sever Economic Counts From Deliberate Homicide Count — No Error: Defendant was charged with 1 count of deliberate homicide, 51 counts of felony theft, 7 counts of felony forgery, and one count of felony deceptive practices. The Supreme Court held that the burden of showing prejudice by the joinder rests on the defendant and that the defendant must show that the prejudice was so great as to prevent a fair trial. The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion to sever the economic counts from the deliberate homicide count. St. v. Richards, 274 M 180, 906 P2d 222, 52 St. Rep. 1176 (1995), followed in St. v. Martin, 279 M 185, 926 P2d 1380, 53 St. Rep. 1109 (1996), St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), and St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

Part 3
Suppression of Evidence

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: Two statutes modeled after the 1987 code have been amended to govern the suppression of certain evidence. The two statutes are divided in order to clearly separate the suppression of certain evidence from the suppression of confessions or admissions.

The Commission at all times remained cognizant of the difficulties arising from shifting the burden of proof. Under the 1987 code, the prosecution has the initial burden of showing that a confession or admission is admissible. See 1987 MCA 46-13-301(4). The defense has the burden of proving inadmissibility in other cases. See 1987 MCA 46-13-302(4). The statutes reflect the 1987 code but make no attempt to allocate the burden of proof. It is recognized, however, that the initial burden, however slight, of going forward with the evidence is on the defendant.

The statutes do not contain provisions concerning general motion practice. See 1987 MCA 46-13-301(3). The general statutes applicable to all pretrial motions are provided for in Title 46, ch. 13, part 1.

Part Case Notes

Improper Denial of State's Right to Appeal Justice's Court Suppression Motion: A Justice's Court granted Willis's motion to suppress that precluded the state from presenting statements made by Willis on the day of an accident on grounds that the state had unlawfully obtained the statements in violation of constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination. The state appealed the Justice's Court's ruling to the District Court, and the District Court granted Willis's motion to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Regardless of whether the Justice's Court order suppressed evidence or a confession or admission, the state had a statutory right under 46-20-103 to appeal the Justice's Court's ruling. Trial de novo in District Court was the proper proceeding for the state's appeal pursuant to St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987). St. v. Willis, 2008 MT 293, 345 M 402, 192 P3d 691 (2008). See also St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997).

Trial De Novo of Criminal Case on Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — No District Court Jurisdiction to Review Justice's Court Order Suppressing Evidence: A criminal case on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court must be tried anew in the District Court pursuant to 46-17-311, regardless of which party appeals. Accordingly, a District Court does not have appellate jurisdiction to review a Justice's Court order suppressing evidence. St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987), followed in St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992).

Misrepresentation of Statute by Prosecutor — Not Prosecutorial Misconduct or Suppression of Evidence: Defendant claimed that the prosecution misrepresented the immunity statute to the court in an effort to prevent testimony by a witness, which amounted to a suppression of evidence. The Supreme Court found the prosecutor was incorrect in his interpretation, due to a statutory amendment, but that neither the court nor defense counsel was aware of the amendment either; therefore, the innocent misstatement of the law did not rise to the level of a knowing, bad faith scheme or action constituting misconduct. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing

Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of their psychological evaluations of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

Voluntariness of Confession — Factual Determination: The issue of voluntariness of a confession is mainly a factual determination for the District Court, and District Court's judgment will not be disturbed on appeal unless it is clearly against the weight of the evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979). [Annotator's note: Certiorari was granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and the judgment vacated and the case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981). On remand the court affirmed its original decision in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).]

Suppression of Evidence — Motion for New Trial: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant moved for a new trial, alleging that his counsel did not hear testimony offered by a State witness concerning an exculpatory item not admitted into evidence, claiming the prosecution had suppressed the evidence. The State did not take possession of the evidence during the trial or consider it evidence, and the defendant did not seek a continuance even when he gained knowledge of the evidence. There is no suppression of evidence if the defendant has knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the evidence. The court, therefore, did not err in denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979), followed in Harris v. St., 234 M 482, 765 P2d 706, 45 St. Rep. 2067 (1988), and in St. v. Henry, 241 M 524, 788 P2d 316, 47 St. Rep. 476 (1990).

Sexual Assault — Evidence of Previous Crimes: The District Court did not commit a reversible error by not excluding testimony relating to other incidents of sexual assault. The court had granted a motion to suppress testimony by the minors involved in the other incidents, but the judge specifically restricted his ruling to testimony by, as opposed to testimony relating to, the minors, and the defense attorney did not object. Further, he did not object at the trial when the testimony of the prosecutrix relating to statements made by the defendant about the previous incidents was introduced. The testimony was relevant not to prove the occurrence of the incidents but to prove the intent of the accused. The testimony was of sufficient probative value to outweigh any possible prejudicial effect of its introduction. St. v. Patton, 183 M 417, 600 P2d 194 (1979).

Use of Accused's Pretrial Testimony to Impeach: The pretrial testimony of the defendant at a suppression hearing may be used to impeach him, but not on the issue of guilt. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

46-13-301. Suppression of confession or admission.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes two special provisions dealing specifically with the suppression of confessions or admissions. The statute is loosely modeled after 1987 MCA 46-13-301. The statute recognizes that it is incumbent upon the defendant to plead facts that the confession or admission was not voluntary. Also, the statute retains the 1987 code provision that allows the jury to hear the circumstances concerning the making of a confession or admission. Such evidence is only admissible to allow the jury to consider the weight of the evidence admitted.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 114-11.

This section provides for the suppression of an involuntary confession or admission. The determination of when a confession or admission is voluntary is to be made on a case by case method. A recent Montana decision now recognizes that the truth or falsity of a confession is not [to] be considered in determining its voluntariness. (State v. White, 146 Mont. 226, 405 P.2d 761.) The test set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court is whether the will of the accused is so overborne, that his statement is not the product of a rational intellect and a free will. (Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961)[)]. This test is also recognized by recent Montana decisions. (See State v. Noble, 142 Mont. 284, 384 P.2d 504 and State v. White, supra.)

The procedure to be followed by state courts in determining the voluntariness of a confession has been set forth in the case of Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368. This case requires that the court must first hold a complete evidentiary hearing regarding the confession outside the presence of the jury. The court must then make a determination whether the purported confession was voluntary or involuntary. If the confession is found to be voluntary it may be admitted for consideration by the jury. This procedure must be followed whenever the voluntariness of a confession is put in issue, whether by motion prior to trial as provided for by this section or by objection during trial.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Deleted former (2) and (3) that read: "(2) The motion shall be made before the trial unless for good cause shown the court shall otherwise direct.

(3) The defendant shall give at least 10 days' notice of such motion to the attorney prosecuting or such other time as the court may direct. The defendant shall serve a copy of the notice and motion upon the attorney prosecuting"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "The prosecution must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the confession or admission was voluntary" for "The burden of proving that a confession or admission was involuntary shall be on the defendant" in (4).

GENERAL

Youth's Right to Parental Notification — Suppression of Statements for Failure to Notify Parents: McKee, a youth charged with assault with a weapon, contended that police erred by failing to notify his parents prior to questioning or to inform him of the right to waive notification and that statements made prior to notification should have been suppressed. The trial court denied the suppression motion, reasoning that 41-5-331 provided the parents, not the youth, with the right to notification, so it was not a right that McKee could waive. The Supreme Court disagreed. The right of parental notification belongs to the youth, not to the parents. McKee did not waive the right, so statements made prior to parental notification should have been suppressed, and failure to do so was reversible error. St. v. McKee, 2006 MT 5, 330 M 249, 127 P3d 445 (2006).

Standard of Review of Motion to Suppress Statements: The Supreme Court reviews a District Court's ruling on a motion to suppress to determine whether the District Court's findings of fact are clearly erroneous and whether its interpretation and application of the law are correct. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous if it is not supported by substantial evidence, if the District Court misapprehended the effect of the evidence, or if the Supreme Court has a definite or firm conviction that the District Court has committed a mistake. St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003).

No Error in Denial of Untimely Midtrial Motion to Suppress Evidence: Motions to suppress are expressly among pretrial matters that must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing. Griffing indicated an intent to file motions to suppress his confession and physical evidence pursuant to 46-13-302 and this section, but the motions were not made until trial had commenced. Failure to raise the issues at or before the omnibus hearing constituted a waiver under 46-13-101. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying the midtrial motion to suppress as untimely. St. v. Griffing, 1998 MT 75, 288 M 213, 955 P2d 1388, 55 St. Rep. 309 (1998), following St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975 (1997).

Untimeliness of Motion Waived by Failure to Object: A motion to suppress was filed the first day of trial, contrary to the 10-day notice requirement in 46-13-301. By failing to object to the timeliness of the motion at trial, any objection on appeal was waived under 46-20-104. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Questions of Evidence — Law of Forum Controls: The defendant, while incarcerated in Louisiana on a misdemeanor charge, confessed to a murder committed in Montana several years earlier. At his subsequent trial in Montana on a charge of deliberate homicide, he moved to suppress evidence of the confession on several grounds. As to an allegation of delay in initial appearance, the prosecution sought to have Louisiana law applied because the defendant was incarcerated there and was allegedly subject to Louisiana law at the time of his confession. The Supreme Court held that the general rule, as to questions of evidence, is that the law of the forum controls. The question involved an application of the exclusionary rule, which is a rule of evidence. Therefore, Montana law should control. Whenever possible, defendants should be entitled to the fullest protection of Montana law when appearing in its courts. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Lynch, 1998 MT 308, 292 M 144, 969 P2d 920, 55 St. Rep. 1278 (1998).

Jury to Weigh Credibility or Weight to Be Given Admission — Jury Instruction on Competence of Defendant Improper: Under 46-13-301(5), the jury is allowed to consider circumstances surrounding admission as bearing upon credibility or weight to be given admissions. Defendant's rejected instruction incorrectly addressed the question of defendant's competence rather than the weight or credibility of evidence. This inappropriately shifted the issue of admissibility to the jury. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in refusing defendant's proposed instruction. St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20, 42 St. Rep. 946 (1985).

Motion In Limine a Motion to Suppress: On the first day of trial the defendant made a motion in limine regarding damaging statements made to police officers prior to arrest. The motion in limine was in fact a motion to suppress and was subject to the time and notice requirements of this section. St. v. Hart, 200 M 185, 650 P2d 768, 39 St. Rep. 1673 (1982), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Motion Made First Day of Trial Untimely: Immediately after his arrest the defendant attempted to retract damaging statements he had made prior to his arrest. Four months after he was charged with sexual assault, on the first day of trial, after the jury had been seated, the defendant orally motioned to suppress the damaging statements. The motion was untimely and properly denied by the trial court. St. v. Hart, 200 M 185, 650 P2d 768, 39 St. Rep. 1673 (1982).

"Good Cop/Bad Cop" Questioning Technique — Examination of Totality of Circumstances: In determining whether the impermissible "good cop/bad cop" questioning technique was used by police, the totality of the circumstances must be examined. The intent of the officers, whether or not they planned to use the technique, is irrelevant to that inquiry. Where the defendant confessed to a seemingly "nice" police officer after he had been questioned by officers who seemed to him to be angry was not, in this instance, triggered by the use of the technique but rather hinged on the defendant's listening to a codefendant's recorded confession at the end of the questioning session. The trial court's determination that the confession was freely given is supported by the comparatively short questioning period, the number of Miranda warnings given and defendant's understanding of them, and the defendant's age and education. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Failure to File Motion Within 10 Days — Motion Denied: Seven months prior to trial the defendant made statements and admissions. Eight days prior to trial the defendant filed a motion to suppress his statements and admissions. Section 46-13-301 requires at least 10 days' notice of such a motion. The Supreme Court found that the failure to comply with the statutory requirement is a proper ground upon which to deny the motion. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180 (1979), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Confession of Codefendant — Arrest Valid Under Idaho Law: The Supreme Court held that Idaho law recognizes the common-law rule that an arrest may be made without a warrant when the arresting officer has probable cause to believe the person arrested has committed a crime in another state. Thus, subsequent confessions of a codefendant were properly admitted. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978). See also St. v. Lynch, 1998 MT 308, 292 M 144, 969 P2d 920, 55 St. Rep. 1278 (1998).

Immunity From Use of Testimony Rejected: The court of appeals held that a state is not constitutionally required to grant a probationer immunity from use of testimony he gives at a combined probation revocation and deferred sentencing hearing when he is under criminal indictment for the same act that constitutes the alleged probation violation. Ryan v. St., 580 F2d 988 (9th Cir. 1978).

Statements Not Entered — Effect on Appeal: As the defendant's statements to the police following his arrest in a homicide were not used in his perjury trial, his specification of error based on denial of his motion to suppress the statements lacked relevance in the appeal. St. v. Thompson, 176 M 150, 576 P2d 1105 (1978).

Surprise Testimony Discounted: The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that trial testimony constituted surprise and should have been excluded when a witness testifying as to admissions made by the defendant quoted certain profane and vulgar language not previously mentioned in a statement provided to the defendant by the prosecution. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Motion for Mistrial: The trial judge was correct in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a mistrial because the admission made by the defendant to the arresting officer on another charge in another state and introduced in the instant case was not prejudicial or a denial of the right to a fair trial. St. v. LaVe, 174 M 401, 571 P2d 97 (1977).

Failure to List Witness Excused: In the absence of surprise, testimony concerning the defendant's oral admission of guilt was properly admitted even though the State had not supplied the names of witnesses to the admission. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

VOLUNTARINESS

Waiver of Rights and Confession Voluntary Despite Defendant's Emotional State — Motion to Suppress Testimonial Evidence Properly Denied When Defendant Advised of Miranda Rights: Lacey was advised of his Miranda rights prior to interrogation and subsequently confessed to felony sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault. Lacey moved to suppress the testimonial evidence on grounds that he was under intense emotional distress when waiving his rights, so the confession was not voluntary, but the trial court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. In this case, the interrogation was clearly custodial in nature, but when a custodial interrogation has occurred and a subject has been properly informed of the Miranda rights, those rights against self-incrimination may be waived by a waiver that is made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. A defendant may move to suppress a confession on grounds that it was involuntary, which focuses on the factual inquiry of whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion. Lacey contended that the confession could not be voluntary because of the extreme emotional distress, but there was no indication that officers took advantage of that emotional state to manipulate Lacey and coerce the confession, so the confession was voluntary. Lacey was properly advised of his Miranda rights and knowingly and intelligently waived those rights, so the denial of the motion to suppress the confession was not error. St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009).

Use of Youth's Voluntary Confession of Drug Use in Subsequent Probation Violation Proceedings Not Error: A youth admitted that she had used methamphetamine, as part of an agreement with the County Attorney and in exchange for a recommendation that the youth be placed in a drug treatment program. When the youth violated the terms of her probation, the confession of prior drug use was admitted into evidence. The youth contended that the self-incriminating statement was inadmissible because the youth was not informed that the statement could later be used against her if she violated probation. The Supreme Court declined to reverse the Youth Court's disposition simply because the youth was not advised that the admission could be used later and instead noted that if the confession was voluntary and not coerced, it could properly be used at a later trial for drug possession. Further, under In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004), the fact that an admission is voluntary is all that is required for a confession to be admissible in a Youth Court proceeding. In this case, the youth was not placed in a position in which she was coerced into waiving the right against self-incrimination by a threat of penalty, but rather voluntarily admitted drug use as a condition of sentencing to a drug treatment program in a manner similar to a plea bargain agreement. Thus, the Youth Court did not err in allowing the youth's admission into evidence and in taking judicial notice of the youth's waiver of the right against self-incrimination. In re R.L.H., 2005 MT 177, 327 M 520, 116 P3d 791 (2005).

Voluntary Confession During Noncustodial Interrogation — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Honey was interviewed once in a patrol car and once at the Sheriff's office regarding his involvement in certain thefts. At both interviews, Honey was read his Miranda rights, was advised of his right to counsel, which he waived, and was informed that he would not be arrested and was free to leave at any time. Honey later contended that his confession was involuntary and moved to suppress it. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Being able to leave, Honey was not subject to a custodial interrogation, and he was not denied the right to counsel. Under the totality of the circumstances, his confession was voluntary, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005). See also St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995), and St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

No Error in Failure to Suppress Incriminating Statements Made Following Knowing and Voluntary Waiver of Rights: After McCollom pleaded guilty to felony sexual assault against two 9-year-old girls, he argued on appeal that the trial court erred in failing to suppress incriminating statements made to law enforcement officers following his arrest. However, McCollom was fully advised of the right to counsel, signed a waiver of Miranda rights, admitted that he was advised of his rights and understood them, and then consented to the interrogation at which the statements were made. The trial court's conclusion that McCollom knowingly and voluntarily waived his rights was based on substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous, and the Supreme Court affirmed denial of the suppression motion. St. v. McCollom, 2005 MT 61, 326 M 251, 109 P3d 215 (2005).

Youth's Waiver of Rights When Parent and Youth in Separate Places — No Specific Topic of Questioning — Admissibility of Confession: After a fire in a clandestine methamphetamine laboratory, police sought to question a youth who was reported to be involved. With the youth's mother present, the officers informed them of the youth's various rights, gave them a written statement of rights, and allowed them to discuss waiver of the rights. In the youth's presence, the mother signed a consent to waive the youth's rights. The youth was then taken to the station without his mother, who declined to go, was informed of his rights again and signed a waiver of rights, and was questioned about the fire and the laboratory. The youth subsequently confessed to involvement in the drug operation, and the District Court declared him delinquent and entered a dispositional order. On appeal, the youth contended that the confession should have been suppressed because he and his mother did not agree together to waive his rights and because his mother was led to believe that the questioning was about the fire and not the laboratory, so she could not effectively waive his rights without accurate knowledge of the basis of the questioning, citing Evans v. District Court, 2000 MT 38, 298 M 279, 995 P2d 455 (2000). The Supreme Court disagreed. Nothing in Evans or in 41-5-331 requires that a youth and parent agree as to the specific topic of questioning to which a waiver of rights applies in order to make the waiver effective, nor does 41-5-331 requires the agreement of the youth and parent in the same place at the same time. The youth also failed to show that the confession was involuntary through police deceit because he should have known that any interview regarding the fire could involve questions regarding the drug operation. In re C.L., 2004 MT 71, 320 M 369, 87 P3d 462 (2004).

Voluntariness of Statements Made to Officers Responding to Emergency Call — Admissibility of Statements Not Made During Custodial Interrogation: Officers responded to an emergency 9-1-1 domestic violence call at Saxton's home and discovered a marijuana growing operation in the home. Saxton contended that statements made to the officers should be suppressed because the statements were not voluntary and because no Miranda warning was given. The trial court disagreed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the state may not use confessions or admissions obtained through custodial interrogations without proper Miranda warnings, in this case, the officer's conversation with Saxton was not considered a custodial interrogation within the context of Miranda because Saxton was not restrained in any way and was told repeatedly that she was free to leave and because Saxton's statements regarding ownership of the marijuana were offered voluntarily. St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: When a defendant moves to suppress a confession or admission on grounds that it was given involuntarily, the prosecution must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it was voluntary. On appeal, the Supreme Court will review denial of a suppression motion to determine whether findings of fact were clearly erroneous and correctly applied as a matter of law. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous if: (1) it is not supported by substantial evidence, which must be more than a scintilla of evidence but may be less than a preponderance of the evidence; (2) the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; or (3) the Supreme Court has a definite or firm conviction that a mistake was made. When a determination of voluntariness depends on the credibility of witnesses, the Supreme Court will defer to the trial court. The emphasis in determining voluntariness is on whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion, which must take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's age and education, whether the defendant was advised of Miranda rights, the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system and police interrogation, the defendant's background, experience, demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of faculties, the length and method of interrogation, and whether the confession or admission was extracted through force, violence, or improper influence or by direct or implied promises. If the confession or admission was involuntary, its use violates self-incrimination and due process. Here, the Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and found substantial credible evidence that Hoffman's confession was voluntary. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003), followed in St. v. Jones, 2006 MT 209, 333 M 294, 142 P3d 851 (2006). The standard of review of denial of a motion to suppress was also applied in St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007), and St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Admission of Murder by Schizophrenic Held Voluntarily Made — No Prejudice to Defense Case: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was arrested for the murder of Willis and made incriminating statements in the back of a police car. He was taken to the police station where he was read his Miranda rights, waived those rights, and gave a recorded interview with a detective. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision not to suppress the statements made in the police car or the tape of the interview with the detective. After reviewing all of the evidence, the Supreme Court held that the single fact that raised doubts about the voluntariness of Scarborough's inculpatory statements is the fact that he is schizophrenic and was therefore subject to the suggestion by the arresting and interviewing officers that he had committed the crime rather than someone else. The Supreme Court reviewed the record of the circumstances of the confessions and held that they were not made because the police had suggested Scarborough's guilt to him. The Supreme Court also held that even if the confessions were involuntary, the admission of those confessions by the District Court did not prejudice Scarborough's defense because, as his defense, Scarborough admitted committing the murder but claimed that the murder was committed during an acute psychotic episode. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Voluntariness of Confession Raised by Defendant — Burden of Proof Upon State: Hayworth was arrested by the police for attempted deliberate homicide and, in the course of his interrogation by the police, admitted his participation in the attempt. Hayworth filed a motion to suppress the confession, and the Supreme Court held, citing St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196 (1992), that when a defendant raises the issue of voluntariness of a confession, the state must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the confession or admission was voluntarily obtained. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Coercion of Testimony by Lengthy Interrogation, Threats, Bribes, Good Cop/Bad Cop Technique, and Misrepresentations Refuted by Record: Law enforcement officers did not coerce defendant's statements. A 5 ½-hour interview with a 2-hour break for dinner, a 2-hour interview on the next day, and a 1-hour interview on the third day did not amount to overly long or arduous interrogation. Defendant's move to a jail nearer his family was at his request, refuting his assertion that the officers threatened him with consequences to his family. The record contained similar evidence refuting allegations of use of good cop/bad cop technique, misrepresentations that defendant was not a suspect, offers of cigarettes, and feigned concern about defendant's family. St. v. Lawrence, 285 M 140, 948 P2d 186, 54 St. Rep. 1082 (1997).

Totality of Circumstances — Police Deception and Failure to Give Adequate Miranda Warning — Confession Not Voluntary: The defendant moved to suppress a videotaped statement on the grounds that the statement was obtained involuntarily. The Supreme Court stated that in a custodial interrogation at the station house, the failure of the police to preserve some tangible record of the giving of Miranda warnings and of the knowing, intelligent waiver by the detainee will be viewed with distrust in the judicial assessment of voluntariness under the totality of circumstances surrounding the confession or admission. Based on the totality of the circumstances of police deception and on the failure to give the defendant adequate warning, the confession was not voluntary and the District Court erred in denying the motion to suppress. St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951, 52 St. Rep. 1193 (1995), distinguished in St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008). The rules regarding preservation of a tangible record, set out in Grey, St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997), and St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713, 55 St. Rep. 668 (1998), were extended to statements of a witness or informant made at the station house or in a similarly controlled environment in St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Statement Taken From Inmate Following Prison Riot — Narrative Statement Not Extracted by Detailed Questioning: Defendant, a prison inmate, moved to suppress evidence concerning his statement made to a state investigator shortly after a prison riot, on grounds that the statement was involuntary because of the coercive nature of the situation. The motion was properly denied by the trial court because the totality of the circumstances revealed that defendant was informed of his rights and voluntarily waived them, that he was capable of understanding the meaning and consequences of his statements, and that the statement was narrative and was not extracted by detailed questioning. St. v. Wild, 266 M 331, 880 P2d 840, 51 St. Rep. 872 (1994).

Warrantless Search of Home — Voluntary Consent — Totality of Circumstances Test: Warrantless searches and seizures conducted inside a home are per se unreasonable, subject only to a few carefully drawn exceptions, including instances in which a citizen has knowledgeably and voluntarily consented to a search. In order for consent to be voluntary, it must be uncontaminated by any duress or coercion, express or implied, as determined by the totality of the circumstances. In this case, defendant was told that he was not required to consent to the search, but that factor was not controlling. Other circumstances mitigating against voluntariness included: (1) the fact that defendant had made a highly incriminating admission that was extracted improperly without Miranda warnings after entry to the home was gained without a warrant; (2) coercion arising from the fact that defendant was promised that if consent was given for the search, he would not be arrested or incarcerated, which constituted an implication that if cooperation was not given, incarceration would result; and (3) a statement by the investigating officer that if consent was not given, officers would remain in the house for a number of hours until a search warrant was obtained. Based on the totality of the circumstances, defendant's consent was coerced rather than given freely and voluntarily and evidence obtained during the subsequent search was inadmissible. St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355, 51 St. Rep. 262 (1994), following Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 US 218, 36 L Ed 2d 854, 93 S Ct 2041 (1973), and followed in St. v. Doyle, 1998 MT 195, 290 M 287, 963 P2d 1255, 55 St. Rep. 819 (1998), St. v. Wetzel, 2005 MT 154, 327 M 413, 114 P3d 269 (2005), and St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Involuntary Confession — Circumstances Mandating Suppression: The following circumstances surrounding a confession mandated suppression on the grounds of voluntariness. By the time defendant confessed to a crime committed 1 year previously, he had been: (1) awake for more than 30 hours; (2) questioned continuously without the presence of an attorney; (3) separated from his children, whom he was told were at the hospital being examined for possible health problems; and (4) lied to by the investigator, having been told that there was incriminating evidence against him when such evidence did not exist. St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), followed in St. v. Hermes, 273 M 446, 904 P2d 587, 52 St. Rep. 1055 (1995), St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56, 54 St. Rep. 1366 (1997). Hermes and Loh were followed in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Statements to Parole Officer Voluntary: Shortly after his initial court appearance, defendant telephoned his parole officer and requested that the officer visit defendant in jail. During the parole officer's subsequent visit, defendant made incriminating statements to the officer that the officer testified to at trial. Defendant's statements and admissions to the parole officer were voluntary and thus came under the purview of this section that requires that the prosecution prove by a preponderance of evidence that the statements and admissions were voluntary. Therefore, a Miranda warning was not required. St. v. Pambrun, 240 M 62, 783 P2d 374, 46 St. Rep. 1944 (1989).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

Confession of Juvenile — Voluntariness and Mental Deficiency: A 14-year-old boy with an I.Q. of 86 confessed to the sexual assault of a 6-year-old child. The Supreme Court noted that mental deficiency does not preclude admissibility of a confession if the defendant was capable of understanding the meaning and consequences of his statements, quoting St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447, 42 St. Rep. 305 (1985). Looking to the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's background, experience, and conduct, the court found substantial credible evidence to support the voluntariness of the confession. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986). See also St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Admission Made to Polygraph Examiner in Postexamination Interview — Voluntary: An admission was made after signing a rights and waiver form. The admission was made to a polygraph examiner in a postexamination interview in another room after disconnection from the device and in response to a note given the examiner while the postexamination interview was being conducted. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in holding that the admission was a voluntary confession supported by sufficient credible evidence. The appellant made no specific charges of coercion or unfair procedures but merely stated that he signed the waiver expecting exculpatory evidence, and since polygraph evidence is inadmissible, the waiver was not voluntary. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Incarceration Unlawful — Subsequent Confession Voluntary: The defendant, while incarcerated illegally in Louisiana on a misdemeanor charge, confessed to a murder committed in Montana several years earlier. At his subsequent trial in Montana on a charge of deliberate homicide, the defendant moved to suppress evidence of his confession on several grounds, including that the State failed to establish the confession was voluntary. When, as in this case, a defendant shows his incarceration was initially illegal, the burden shifts to the State to show that his right against self-incrimination was not violated. The determination of voluntariness depends on the totality of the circumstances, with the burden of proof on the State to prove voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence. In this case the defendant was issued numerous timely and complete Miranda advisements prior to making the incriminating statement. Also, he confessed in the presence of his attorney after opportunity to confer with him. The totality of the facts indicate the trial court did not err in finding the confession voluntary. St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 1080 (1985), followed in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304, 53 St. Rep. 879 (1996). Loh was followed, as to totality of circumstances, in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998). Hayworth was followed in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Defendant Admitted Driving — Statement Voluntary Under Totality of Circumstances Corroborated by Circumstantial Evidence: Defendant was convicted of negligent homicide and DUI following a one-car accident in which his female companion died. Before trial defendant moved to suppress his admissions made at the scene of the crash, when he stated that he was driving. The District Court found by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant's statements were voluntary. The court took into account the totality of the circumstances, including the observations of highway patrol officers and emergency medical personnel. The court noted that defendant's statements that he was the driver were consistent throughout the period leading up to defendant's hospitalization. The Supreme Court's review of the suppression hearing transcript indicated conflicting evidence, but the trial court resolved the conflict in favor of admissibility of the statements. The Supreme Court held the transcript contained substantial evidence to support the findings and conclusions of the trial court. Defendant's admission was corroborated by sufficient independent evidence in the form of circumstantial evidence. St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20, 42 St. Rep. 946 (1985), followed in St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304, 53 St. Rep. 879 (1996). Campbell was followed, as to necessity for corroboration by independent evidence, in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Confession Voluntary Under Totality of Circumstances — Questionable Police Conduct: A preponderance of the evidence supports the trial court's holding that, in the totality of the circumstances, defendant's confession was voluntary. The Supreme Court found: first, that although the investigating officer walked a thin line between constitutionally permissible police conduct and reversible error by giving defendant the impression that there would be the possibility of psychiatric treatment, it fell short of a promise of treatment in return for a confession; second, a detective potentially transgressed police conduct by stating during interrogation that ". . . we've even got a doctor's report on this . . . we've got all the evidence" when he possessed no medical report at the time—however, his partner had talked to the examining physician; and third, there was no impropriety in the display of women's clothing worn by defendant, use of leading questions, refusal to honor defendant's request to talk to his father, and prior denials of the accused. St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447, 42 St. Rep. 305 (1985).

Voluntary Waiver of Miranda Rights — Mistake on Waiver Form — Police Trickery: After the police read and fully explained the defendant's Miranda rights, the defendant indicated he would talk with the police about a shooting incident. When signing the rights waiver form, the defendant initially wrote "no" in the blank that asked if he desired to talk with the police. After a police officer explained that "no" meant he did not want to talk to the police, the defendant changed his answer to "yes", initialed the change, and made a statement. The defendant then repeated his statement in greater detail on a tape recording. Miranda warnings were again given, explained, and waived. Because there was no evidence to suggest that defendant's statement was a result of police trickery, his Miranda rights were voluntarily and intelligently waived. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Waiver of Right to Counsel by Defendant Claiming Mental Defect — When Confession Suppressed: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, appealed based on issues related to his confession. The Supreme Court on review said the real issue is whether the defendant knowingly and voluntarily waived the right to counsel. The question of waiver was inextricably interwoven with the question of the voluntariness of the accused's confession. That was especially true because the defendant alleged incapacity because of mental illness. Whether a confession should have been suppressed depends on its voluntariness, and that depends on the "totality of the circumstances". The Supreme Court found that the evidence showed that Miranda warnings were given before confession, that the defendant was capable of understanding the warnings, that the defendant waived his rights to counsel and against self-incrimination knowingly and voluntarily, and that the defendant was not improperly induced into confession. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Voluntary Confession and Production of Murder Weapon by Intoxicated Defendant: Defendant's confessions to the police and the production by defendant of the murder weapon to the police were not involuntary and inadmissible at trial where although defendant was "kind of drunk", defendant read his Miranda rights, signed a waiver of his rights, no evidence was offered showing defendant did not understand his rights or that he was coerced, and where defendant's production of the murder weapon and initial inculpatory statements were spontaneous responses during his first contact with the police officers. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981).

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: Involuntariness in a confession, rendering it unusable against a defendant, may be caused either by physical or mental coercion. To be used against him, the confession must be a product of an essentially free and unconstrained choice by its maker. In determining whether a confession was voluntary, once the defendant contends that it is a product of coercion, the burden is placed upon the State to show that the defendant knowingly and intelligently waived his privilege against self-incrimination and right to counsel by a preponderance of the evidence. This issue is addressed to the trial court's discretion and depends upon the totality of the circumstances; if there is substantial evidence to support the trial court's finding, it must be affirmed. St. v. Davison, 188 M 432, 614 P2d 489 (1980).

Self-Incrimination — Voluntariness of Confession: The police read the defendant his Miranda rights before they originally interrogated him and again just before he confessed to the homicide. Between the original interrogation and the confession, the police kept the defendant incommunicado in a small room in a hostile police environment. They used the nice cop-mean cop method of interrogation and lied to the defendant while using the guilt assumption technique of interrogation. The defendant eventually confessed to the homicide after a truth serum was administered and he was told that his story was inconsistent and contradictory to his "serum" story. The Supreme Court, after considering the totality of the circumstances, found the confession to be inadmissible on the basis that it was not made voluntarily. St. v. Allies, 186 M 99, 606 P2d 1043 (1979), followed in St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995). Allies was distinguished in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000), and St. v. Hill, 2000 MT 308, 302 M 415, 14 P3d 1237, 57 St. Rep. 1301 (2000). Hill was followed in St. v. Jones, 2006 MT 209, 333 M 294, 142 P3d 851 (2006).

Voluntariness of Confession — Burdens of Proof — Harmless Error: A trial judge can properly require a party moving for suppression of evidence (involuntary confession) to initiate suppression hearing proceedings. The rationale for such a procedure is the requirement that the movant establish a prima facie case that a constitutional infringement has occurred. Once this has been accomplished, the ultimate burden of proving the propriety of the state's action (obtaining a confession) shifts to the state, notwithstanding 46-13-301(4), which is unconstitutional in that it requires defendant to prove a confession or admission was involuntary. Thus, the District Court did not err in requiring appellant to present his evidence first at the suppression hearing but did err in putting the ultimate burden on the defendant at the hearing. The Montana Supreme Court, however, upheld the District Court's denial of the motion to suppress because its error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979). [Annotator's note: A 1981 amendment requires the state to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the confession or admission was voluntary. Certiorari was granted in Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and the judgment vacated and the case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981). On remand the court affirmed its original decision in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).]

Testimony by Accused: The defendant, who voluntarily testified that he had shot the victim (but only in self-defense), could not argue on appeal that he had been compelled to testify in order to correct errors presented by the prosecution. St. v. Grady, 166 M 168, 531 P2d 681 (1975).

Test:

In the absence of evidence of physical or psychological coercion, the defendant's handwritten confession, made about 2 hours after the crime was reported and after the defendant had been informed of his rights, was voluntarily given and admissible at trial. St. v. Smith, 164 M 334, 523 P2d 1395 (1974).

The truth or falsity of a confession is not to be considered in determining its voluntariness; before a confession may be admitted into evidence, the State must show to the satisfaction of the trial court that it was voluntary. St. v. White, 146 M 226, 405 P2d 761 (1965).

Before admitting a confession into evidence, it is necessary to determine whether it was made voluntarily and of defendant's free will. The fact that a sedative was administered to the defendant within an hour before his first confession did not, ipso facto, make it inadmissible. St. v. Noble, 142 M 284, 384 P2d 504 (1963).

MIRANDA REQUIREMENTS

Sufficient Proof of Miranda Warning Despite Failure of Recording Equipment — Denial of Motion to Suppress Statements Proper: Following Gittens' arrest, officers attempted to memorialize the reading of Gittens' Miranda rights, but the camera equipment failed to record any audio. At trial, Gittens moved to suppress all statements that he made after the arrest on grounds that, absent recorded proof, he had not been properly informed of his Miranda rights. The trial court denied the motion, and Gittens appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995), officers should preserve a tangible record of the giving and waiver of Miranda rights when the means to do so are readily available, but the lack of a tangible record does not mandate suppression of a detainee's statements. Rather, this is simply one factor that weighs against the state in proving its burden. The proper inquiry is whether, based on all available evidence, the state met its burden of proving that the officer read the detainee the Miranda rights and whether those rights were waived. In this case, two officers testified that they had made a good faith effort to preserve a record of the reading and waiver, that one officer read the Miranda rights off of a card while the other officer observed, that Gittens verbally waived the rights and never indicated that he wished to avail himself of those rights, and that if the officers had known that the audio equipment was nonfunctional, they would have had Gittens sign a written acknowledgment and waiver. The trial court weighed the testimony of Gittens and the officers and found the officers more credible. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's decision that the state met its burden of proving that Gittens was properly advised of his rights despite the lack of a tangible record. St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008).

Confession a Result of Exploitation of Unlawful Arrest — Miranda Warning Insufficient to Negate Cumulative Effect of Circumstances Leading to Confession: Officers had insufficient probable cause to arrest Van Dort, resulting in an unlawful arrest, and the Supreme Court then considered whether Van Dort's subsequent confession was legitimate. The state maintained that because Van Dort was given Miranda warnings, the confession should be admissible. Van Dort averred that the Miranda warnings alone were insufficient to sever the causal connection between the confession and the arrest. The court noted that as set out in St. v. Beach, 217 M 132, 705 P2d 94 (1985), which adopted the federal rule set out in Brown v. Ill., 422 US 590 (1975), the general principle is that a confession obtained as a result of an unlawful arrest is inadmissible; however, there must be a causal connection between the arrest and the confession. In determining whether a causal connection exists, the court considers: (1) the presence or absence of timely Miranda warnings; (2) whether there was an intervening independent act by the defendant or some third party; (3) the temporal proximity of the arrest and confession; and (4) the degree of the alleged constitutional violation. Miranda warnings will not, in all cases, attenuate the corruptive effect of a prior constitutional violation or remove the taint of a prior constitutional violation. In this case, the Miranda warnings did not sever the chain of causality between Van Dort's unlawful arrest and the confession and were insufficient to negate the cumulative effect of all the relevant circumstances leading to Van Dort's confession. The court distinguished Beach, holding that despite the issuance of Miranda warnings, Van Dort's confession was the result of the exploitation of the unlawful arrest and inadmissible as fruit of the poisonous tree, and the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's denial of Van Dort's motion to suppress. St. v. Van Dort, 2003 MT 104, 315 M 303, 68 P3d 728 (2003).

Miranda Warning Not Required When Suspect Not in Custody: Officers were lawfully searching Roehr's motel room when Dawson knocked on the door. An officer opened the door, and Dawson entered, asking for Roehr. The officer told Dawson that he was going to conduct a pat-down search for weapons and asked Dawson if he possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dawson said that he had no weapons. The officer repeated the question. Dawson motioned toward his coat pocket and said that he had some "smoke" in there. The "smoke" turned out to be methamphetamine and drug paraphernalia. Dawson sought to suppress the evidence on grounds that he was not given a Miranda warning before being subjected to a custodial interrogation and to suppress the statement regarding "smoke", contending that he was referring to his cigarettes. Two requirements must be met before Miranda is applicable: (1) the suspect must be in custody; and (2) the questioning must meet the legal definition of "interrogation". However, the questioning of Dawson took only 2 or 3 minutes, and there were several other people present. The investigative stop did not ripen into a custodial interrogation because the questions were routine, Dawson's detention was brief, and the protective frisk occurred within the view of others in the room. The only detention occurred when Dawson put his hands on the wall during the pat-down search. He was not under arrest or handcuffed at the time, so he was not in custody and the officer was not required to advise Dawson of his Miranda rights prior to asking if Dawson possessed any weapons, drugs, or needles. Dismissal of Dawson's motion to suppress the statement regarding the "smoke" in his pocket was not error. St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999), following U.S. v. Ritchie, 35 F3d 1477 (10th Cir. 1994).

Officer Testimony, Tapes, and Notes Showing Advice and Waiver of Rights: The state met its burden of showing by a preponderance of the evidence that defendant was advised of his rights, voluntarily waived them, and talked to the police. The officers who interviewed him testified that he was advised of his rights at the beginning of each of three interviews. The tape that was recorded at the end of each interview started with defendant's stating that he had been advised of his rights and had waived them. The notes of one of the officers referred to advices and waivers of rights. Defendant signed a waiver form. The statements would not be found inadmissible for failure to make a tape recording or other record of the advice and waiver at the time that they were given. Grey, in which the court stated a preference for such a record, does not require such a record. How the officers preserve a record of the advice and waiver is up to them. However, a tangible record should be preserved when the means to do so are readily available, and failure to do so will result in extreme disfavor with the court in later determining the voluntariness of a waiver. St. v. Lawrence, 285 M 140, 948 P2d 186, 54 St. Rep. 1082 (1997).

Admissions by Boot Camp Inmate to Other Inmates and Program Staff Held Admissible Without Miranda Warnings: Woods, an inmate at the Swan River Correctional Training Center, or "boot camp", made admissions that he killed two people to a trustee counselor and to other boot camp inmates in an anger management workshop. Woods later made the same admission to the boot camp superintendent. After being charged with the homicides, Woods sought to suppress the admissions, arguing that the admissions were not voluntarily made and that they were made while he was in custodial interrogation. From the review of the record, the Supreme Court found: (1) that Woods voluntarily chose to participate in the boot camp program knowing that under the program guidelines, he had to make full disclosure concerning his past; (2) that he made the disclosure to the members of the anger management workshop voluntarily; (3) that Woods's disclosures were made to the trustee and superintendent after they inquired whether he, Woods, wished to further discuss the subject; (4) that prior to Woods's admissions, the boot camp staff did not suspect Woods in the homicides; (5) that Woods was held in a room with the trustee out of concern for his safety rather than to coerce a statement from him; and (6) that there was no evidence of pressure or coercion by the other inmates, the trustee, or the superintendent. Based upon these findings and in reliance on case law from the State of Washington, the Supreme Court held that there was no "interrogation" and no "custody" within the meaning of Miranda, that Miranda warnings did not have to be given to Woods before his admissions, and that therefore the District Court did not err in refusing to suppress the admissions made by Woods without Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court did not address Woods's argument that he was placed in a "classic penalty situation", as discussed in Minn. v. Murphy, 465 US 420 (1984), and St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), because Woods raised the issue for the first time on appeal. St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997).

Suppression of References to First Illegal Interview From Second Legal Interview — Poisoned Tree: Defendant's fifth amendment Miranda rights were violated by interrogating officers during a November interview, but a subsequent December interview was conducted properly. Conceding that the November interview was clearly inadmissible, the state nevertheless argued that all of the December interview was admissible, including references to the November interview, as fruit of the poisoned tree that had been purged of the primary taint of the November Miranda violations by the presence of several factors outlined in In re R.P.S., 191 M 275, 623 P2d 964 (1981). However, references to the November interview were not "fruit" of the poisoned tree; they were the poisoned tree itself by the violation of defendant's constitutional rights. It was unacceptable to suppress the November interview and then admit that evidence by allowing reference to it in discussion of the December interview. The exclusionary rule dictated that the product of the constitutional violations was inadmissible, and therefore the trial court properly suppressed all reference to the November interview from the December interview. St. v. Moore, 250 M 254, 818 P2d 835, 48 St. Rep. 913 (1991).

Person Not in Custody as Focus of Investigation — Miranda Warning Unnecessary: Citing Beckwith v. U.S., 425 US 341, 48 L Ed 2d 1, 96 S Ct 1612 (1976), the Supreme Court held that Miranda warnings are not required when police officers question a person not in custody, even though that person is the "focus" of the investigation. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987), followed in St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916, 56 St. Rep. 668 (1999).

Weapon Seized in Home Without Warrant — Statement by Defendant Without Miranda Warnings — Evidence Suppressed: Defendant charged with aggravated assault moved to suppress evidence. The trial court granted defendant's motion on grounds that defendant felt compelled to give officers access to his home without warrant, and thus seizure of weapon in plain view was not justified; statements by defendant in response to officers' questions were not admissible since defendant was considered to be in custody at the time and did not receive Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court upheld the trial court's order suppressing the evidence, noting factors that required the officers to obtain a search warrant. St. v. Osteen, 216 M 258, 700 P2d 188, 42 St. Rep. 789 (1985), followed in St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355, 51 St. Rep. 262 (1994).

Later Voluntary Amplification of Confession — No Second Miranda Warning — Not Error: Approximately a month after his arrest for homicide, followed by a Miranda warning and confession, the defendant asked to see the Sheriff. When the Sheriff arrived at the cell, no Miranda warning was given, but the defendant began clarifying his confession and reenacting transactions that occurred the day of the homicide. The Supreme Court held it was not error for the District Court to admit the Sheriff's testimony regarding the incident because the defendant had been given a Miranda warning at the time of his first confession and he had asked to talk to the Sheriff and voluntarily offered information in an atmosphere free from coercion. The court also held that because there was no direct infringement of the defendant's fourth or fifth amendment rights under the federal constitution, the Sheriff's testimony could not be excluded as the fruit of a suppressed statement. In a further holding, the court provided that the Sheriff's statements were not inadmissible under Rule 701, Montana Rules of Evidence, on the grounds that the Sheriff's testimony was nonexpert opinion testimony and that even if error had occurred, there was no reversible error because no prejudice was demonstrated. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Miranda Warnings Given After Defendant Admitted Knowledge of Shooting: While the defendant was at police headquarters to identify his lost jewelry, police officers investigating a shooting incident asked the defendant if he knew of the shooting. The defendant replied "yes", at which point the officers read his Miranda rights. That defendant answered "yes" before Miranda warnings were given did not amount to an admission against interest or confession pursuant to an unconstitutional interrogation. Defendant had not been deprived of his freedom in any significant manner at the point when he answered "yes", nor had he stated an independent fact from which guilt could be inferred. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Waiver of Miranda Rights With No Knowledge of Victim's Injuries: A shooting incident resulted in the death of one victim and serious bodily injury to another victim. The defendant's contention that his Miranda rights could not be voluntarily or intelligently waived if he was not aware of the injuries that resulted from the incident was without merit. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Admission of Pre-Miranda Statement Not Prejudicial — Untimely Motion to Suppress: The defendant made the same damaging statements to the police before and after Miranda warnings were given. A motion to suppress the prior damaging statements was denied because of the motion's untimeliness under this section. Although the Supreme Court has the power under 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987) to overturn a conviction if the substantial rights of the defendant have been prejudiced, the slight cumulative effect of admitting the prior statements and the untimeliness of the motion to suppress do not warrant a consideration of the constitutionality of admission of the prior statements. St. v. Hart, 200 M 185, 650 P2d 768, 39 St. Rep. 1673 (1982).

Admission for Purposes Other Than as Direct Evidence: Evidence inadmissible in the prosecution's case in chief due to Miranda violations is not barred for all other purposes and may be used for impeachment of accused. If the police willfully violate Miranda, thinking that the evidence can still be used for impeachment, the case, like those involving coercion or duress, may be handled by the application of the traditional standards for evaluating voluntariness and trustworthiness. St. v. Cartwright, 200 M 91, 650 P2d 758, 39 St. Rep. 1598 (1982), following St. v. Smith, 168 M 93, 541 P2d 351 (1975); St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Refusal to Suppress Second Admission Held Proper — Connection With First Admission Held Controlling: Where a police investigation subsequent to the suppression of a first confession by the defendant to a charge of homicide revealed that the defendant had made a second confession over the telephone to a friend, the court did not err in refusing to suppress the evidence of the second confession and transferring the case from Youth Court to District Court for trial. The facts surrounding the second confession showed that it was derived from an independent source and not so connected with the first confession as to be considered "fruit of the poisonous tree", under the principles announced in Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. U.S., 251 US 385, 64 L Ed 319, 40 S Ct 182 (1920), or inadmissible under "the cat out of the bag" doctrine pertaining to second confessions announced in St. v. Allies, 190 M 475, 621 P2d 1080, 37 St. Rep. 2089 (1980). In re R.P.S., 191 M 275, 623 P2d 964, 38 St. Rep. 231 (1981), followed in St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919, 53 St. Rep. 510 (1996).

Miranda Warnings When Defendant Stopped on Street: Police officers were not required to give Miranda warnings prior to asking investigatory questions of the defendant where the defendant was stopped by armed officers in uniform on the street for the purpose of identifying the defendant as a witness or a suspect. Following Oreg. v. Mathiason, 429 US 492, 50 L Ed 2d 714, 97 S Ct 711 (1977), the Supreme Court held that any deprivation of freedom occurring under these circumstances was merely the result of the "coercive aspect" incidental to any conversation between an armed police officer and a suspect. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981).

Admissibility of Defendant's Statement When Attorney Advisability Mentioned — Miranda Warnings — Tape Recordings: A defendant who said it probably was advisable that he have an attorney but who nonetheless went ahead and fully consented to being interrogated and tape-recorded was held to have made a voluntary statement, having been advised of his rights. A statement made voluntarily after the speaker has been made fully aware of and understands his rights is not objectionable because the statement is made without the advice or assistance of counsel. Electronically recorded or preserved evidence is subject to the same admissibility tests as direct evidence of eyewitnesses or earwitnesses. With proper advice to a prospective defendant who then voluntarily consents to the tape recording of his statements, the constitutional defenses of self-incrimination, unlawful search, invasion of privacy, and right to counsel disappear. Then the tape-recorded statement may be regarded as independent direct evidence or as corroborative evidence. In either case, the tests for admissibility are the same. Since the interviewing detective would have testified directly to the recorded statements, the recorded statements are themselves admissible. St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979).

Admission of Confession — Harmless or Prejudicial Error: When error is federal constitutional error, as with the improper admission of a confession, the error cannot be considered harmless unless the court finds it harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. Admission of a confession taken without adequate Miranda warnings constituted prejudicial error, resulting in overturn of convictions on two charges. Nonetheless, because admission of that portion of the same confession that related to another charge (criminal trespass) against the defendant was held harmless error, conviction on that other charge was sustained. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979).

Suppression of Defendant's Confession — When Miranda Warning Inadequate — Voluntariness: Appellant's statement was admitted into evidence erroneously for two reasons. First, the State failed to prove the voluntariness of appellant's confession at the suppression hearing by a preponderance of the evidence. When the State fails to show that the appellant was advised of his Miranda rights or that the appellant made the statement attributed to him or to introduce any evidence other than evidence showing that the appellant had the mental capacity to make a voluntary statement, a finding that the State has carried its burden of proving voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence is clearly against the weight of the evidence and must be overturned. Second, the Miranda warning allegedly given appellant was inadequate. The language "we have no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if and when you go to court" was held confusing. Because the confession "undoubtedly weighed heavily in the minds of the jurors in finding [the] appellant guilty", conviction was reversed. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979).

No Coercion or Interrogation — Miranda Inapplicable: When an entire situation was free from any coercion or deprivation of freedom of action by law enforcement officers and the statements made by the defendant were not the result of interrogation, the requirements of Miranda were not applicable. St. v. Ryan, 182 M 130, 595 P2d 1146 (1979).

Admission Without Proof of Miranda Warning: Absent proof that the defendant was given the Miranda warning or otherwise effectively advised of his rights, the testimony of the County Attorney about an alleged admission by the defendant while in custody was inadmissible. St. v. Johnson, 177 M 182, 580 P2d 1387 (1978).

Incriminating Statements at Prison Disciplinary Hearing: When the defendant uttered incriminating statements at a disciplinary hearing involving allegations of possession of a weapon by a prisoner, without benefit of Miranda cautionary statements, the subsequent admission of the statements into evidence at the defendant's trial was a violation of the privilege against self-incrimination. St. v. Harris, 176 M 70, 576 P2d 257 (1978).

WAIVER OR LACK OF COUNSEL

Ambiguous and Equivocal Request for Counsel — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied When Admissions Voluntary: Immediately after demanding an attorney, and without interruption, Maestas told an investigator to question another witness. The investigator immediately instructed Maestas to stop talking and asked at least six times whether Maestas wanted counsel present before proceeding, but Maestas repeatedly stated that he did not want an attorney. As stated in St. v. Simmons, 2000 MT 329, 303 M 60, 15 P3d 408 (2000), a suspect must articulate the desire to have counsel present sufficiently clearly that a reasonable police officer in the circumstances would understand the statement to be a request for an attorney. Maestas's ambiguous and equivocal requests for a lawyer, followed by repeated statements refusing the provision for counsel, did not rise to the level of clarity that mandated that the investigator stop all questioning, especially questions seeking to clarify what Maestas really wanted. Thus, Maestas's right to counsel was not violated. In addition, the incriminating statements made by Maestas were not made until the following day after Maestas again waived the right to counsel. Under the totality of the circumstances, Maestas's motion to suppress the statements was properly denied. St. v. Maestas, 2006 MT 101, 332 M 140, 136 P3d 514 (2006).

Use of Police Informant to Obtain Taped Conversation Not Violative of Right to Counsel or Attorney-Client Privilege — When Right to Counsel Attaches: Police used Reavley's girlfriend to obtain a taped conversation that included statements that could be viewed as incriminating. The District Court granted Reavley's motion to suppress the statements, based on Escobedo v. Ill., 378 US 478 (1964), on grounds that the right to counsel extends to all stages preceding trial, beginning when an accused first becomes the focus of a police investigation. The District Court also concluded that Reavley's attorney-client privilege was violated when the girlfriend probed into conversations that Reavley had with his counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under Moran v. Burbine, 475 US 412 (1986), the right to counsel does not attach until after the initiation of formal charges. Reavley was not formally charged, and adversarial proceedings had not begun, so the right to counsel had not attached. Further, the record did not reflect that law enforcement directed the girlfriend to deliberately seek privileged information, nor did she purposely intrude into the attorney-client relationship or ask questions aimed at eliciting privileged information regarding Reavley's conversations with counsel. Rather, Reavley voluntarily disclosed the privileged communications without prompting from the girlfriend, which was sufficient to waive the right to their privileged nature. St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003).

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

Central Question on Motion to Suppress Confession: The central question on a motion to suppress a confession for being involuntary is whether the State has proved by a preponderance of the evidence that the person was advised of his constitutional rights and knowingly and voluntarily waived them. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982), on remand from U.S. Supreme Court.

Knowing and Intelligent Waiver Necessary — Test: In judging a waiver of the fifth amendment right to counsel, a conclusion that the right was waived necessarily entails a finding of a knowing and intelligent relinquishment of a known right, and some of the factors to be considered in making the finding are: (1) the background, experience, and conduct of the person; (2) his age, education, and intelligence; and (3) his capacity to understand the Miranda warnings given him, the nature of his fifth amendment rights, and the consequences of waiving those rights. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982), on remand from U.S. Supreme Court.

Waiver Following Indication of Interest in Counsel: Arrested person asked police interviewing him if they thought he should get an attorney, and police stated it was up to him. He resumed talking. At a later interview with police he stated, "Maybe I should have an attorney". The police stopped talking to him and began to leave the room, and before they left he resumed talking to them, at which point they reminded him that he had just indicated he wanted an attorney. He stated that he did not want an attorney. The interview continued. He made a knowing and intelligent waiver of his right to counsel, and subsequent confession was voluntary and admissible. St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982), on remand from U.S. Supreme Court.

Suppression of Confession — Voluntariness — Waiver of Right to Counsel After Making Request: To determine whether a confession should have been suppressed, it had to be determined whether the confession was voluntary and whether there was an unconstitutional denial of the right to counsel. In so doing, the following questions had to be answered: What was the totality of the circumstances? Was there effective assertion of the right to counsel, and if so, was there an effective waiver later? Since the evidence answered a large number of the requisite questions about the circumstances, the decision of the trial court was held not to have clearly contravened the weight of the evidence and its holding of voluntariness was upheld. Since any indication by a defendant in any manner that he wishes to consult with an attorney suffices, and evidence showed the defendant had met this requirement, the trial court erred in concluding that there was ineffective assertion of the right to counsel. After adopting the rule that a defendant can validly waive the right to counsel after making a request for counsel, the Supreme Court found the trial court properly found that the State had carried its "heavy burden" of showing waiver of counsel. St. v. Blakney, 185 M 470, 605 P2d 1093 (1979); certiorari granted, Blakney v. Mont., 451 US 1013, 69 L Ed 2d 384, 101 S Ct 2999 (1981), and judgment vacated and case remanded for further consideration in light of Edwards v. Ariz., 451 US 477, 68 L Ed 2d 378, 101 S Ct 1880 (1981); affirmed on remand in St. v. Blakney, 197 M 131, 641 P2d 1045, 39 St. Rep. 436 (1982).

Juveniles — Suppression of Statements and Evidence: In the trial of a juvenile for shooting a police officer, a motion for suppression of evidence, obtained under authority of a lawful inspection and statements voluntarily made, was erroneously granted. However, statements made after a waiver of counsel, which were void because of lack of counsel for the underaged defendant, were properly suppressed. St. v. District Court, 176 M 257, 577 P2d 849 (1978).

Voluntary Confession in Absence of Counsel: A confession made after 3 hours' interrogation of the accused, who was advised of his right to counsel and his right to remain silent, was not rendered inadmissible by the absence of counsel when the accused never requested assistance of counsel and the confession was voluntarily given. St. v. White, 146 M 226, 405 P2d 761 (1965).

NONCUSTODIAL CONFESSION

Noncustodial Statements to Law Enforcement — Motion to Suppress Improperly Granted: The District Court granted Reavley's motion to suppress a statement made to law enforcement at the police station on grounds that the police: (1) gave mere lip service to Miranda warnings; (2) did not respond to Reavley's inquiry about a need for counsel; (3) used psychological coercion by implying that Reavley would receive leniency if he confessed to the crime; (4) made repeated religious references; (5) falsely told Reavley that a hypnotist was on the way; and (6) lied about DNA evidence that did not exist. The Supreme Court's review of the record did not support the findings. In examining whether the statement was voluntary, the Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003), to determine whether Reavley was subjected to a custodial interrogation, and all the factors weighed in favor of the state. Reavley was not in custody when he was questioned by the police, so a Miranda warning was not required when questioning began. Officers did not use threats or violence or otherwise act improperly during the interview. At no time did Reavley make a clear, unambiguous, and unequivocal request for counsel, and he was free to leave the station at any time. Based on these facts, the motion to suppress the statement was improperly granted, and the District Court was reversed. St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995).

Admissions by Boot Camp Inmate to Other Inmates and Program Staff Held Admissible Without Miranda Warnings: Woods, an inmate at the Swan River Correctional Training Center, or "boot camp", made admissions that he killed two people to a trustee counselor and to other boot camp inmates in an anger management workshop. Woods later made the same admission to the boot camp superintendent. After being charged with the homicides, Woods sought to suppress the admissions, arguing that the admissions were not voluntarily made and that they were made while he was in custodial interrogation. From the review of the record, the Supreme Court found: (1) that Woods voluntarily chose to participate in the boot camp program knowing that under the program guidelines, he had to make full disclosure concerning his past; (2) that he made the disclosure to the members of the anger management workshop voluntarily; (3) that Woods's disclosures were made to the trustee and superintendent after they inquired whether he, Woods, wished to further discuss the subject; (4) that prior to Woods's admissions, the boot camp staff did not suspect Woods in the homicides; (5) that Woods was held in a room with the trustee out of concern for his safety rather than to coerce a statement from him; and (6) that there was no evidence of pressure or coercion by the other inmates, the trustee, or the superintendent. Based upon these findings and in reliance on case law from the State of Washington, the Supreme Court held that there was no "interrogation" and no "custody" within the meaning of Miranda, that Miranda warnings did not have to be given to Woods before his admissions, and that therefore the District Court did not err in refusing to suppress the admissions made by Woods without Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court did not address Woods's argument that he was placed in a "classic penalty situation", as discussed in Minn. v. Murphy, 465 US 420 (1984), and St. v. Fuller, 276 M 155, 915 P2d 809 (1996), because Woods raised the issue for the first time on appeal. St. v. Woods, 283 M 359, 942 P2d 88, 54 St. Rep. 617 (1997).

Confession Prior to Arrest: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that his confession was the product of an illegal arrest. Defendant himself admitted that he was not arrested first and that the confession was not taken against his will. St. v. Hodgson, 184 M 394, 603 P2d 246 (1979).

Statements Made to Civilians Prior to Police Custody: On two occasions, while the defendant and his stepchild were alone, the stepchild received serious injuries. On both occasions the defendant gave explanations of how the injuries occurred to his wife and to several doctors. The defendant was charged with aggravated assault and filed a motion to suppress his statements concerning the cause of the child's injuries. The trial court properly denied the motion. The statements were voluntarily given. The Miranda warnings do not apply to statements given by a person before he is a criminal suspect in police custody. The statements made here were not made to law enforcement agents or their alter egos. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180 (1979).

Evidentiary Hearing Not Required: The District Court did not err by not holding an evidentiary hearing to determine whether an admission by the defendant met constitutional requirements because the voluntariness of the statement was not an issue and Miranda warnings were not required for a noncustodial confession to a civilian. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

DELAY IN ARRAIGNMENT

Delay in Bringing Before Magistrate: The officers' failure to present the defendant before a magistrate before interrogation did not render the confession inadmissible when the defendant failed to show that it was an "unnecessary delay". St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

Delay in Initial Appearance — Statements Excluded: Failure to provide the defendant with a prompt initial appearance necessitated exclusion of evidence obtained and statements allegedly made after the defendant's arrest when he established that the delay was unnecessary and the prosecution failed to meet the burden of showing that such evidence and statements were not reasonably related to the delay. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

46-13-302. Suppression of evidence.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute, modeled after the 1987 code, is the statute designed to govern the suppression of evidence. The suppression of certain evidence is a defense practice, and the moving party must establish initial support for the motion.

Subsection (2) requires that once facts are established to support the motion, the court must conduct a suppression hearing. That hearing may be held in conjunction with the hearings of other motions at the omnibus hearing or at a later time as the court directs.

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 114-12.

This section provides the machinery for enforcing the constitutional protection against illegal searches and seizures as found in [1889] Montana Constitution Article III, section 7 [now Art. II, sec. 11, 1972 Mont. Const.], and the 14th Amendment to U.S. Constitution. In accordance with Mapp, the 14th Amendment denies the admission of illegally seized evidence. This section continues the requirement that the motion be made before trial but subsection [(3)] provides that if the grounds for the motion were unknown to the defendant he may make it later. (See State v. Gotta, 71 Mont. 288, 229 P. 405 (1924) which required a timely motion to suppress illegally gained evidence.)

The procedure for an appeal from a motion to suppress is provided for in Chapter [20]. [Chapter 18, part 9,] does not allow a defendant to appeal from a ruling on a motion to suppress until after final judgment.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "obtained", inserted "by the unlawful search and seizure" and deleted second sentence that read: "The motion shall be in writing and state facts showing wherein the search and seizure were unlawful"; deleted former (2) and (3) that read: "(2) The motion shall be made before trial unless for good cause shown the court shall otherwise direct.

(3) The defendant shall give at least 10 days' notice of such motion to the attorney prosecuting or such other time as the court may direct. The defendant shall serve a copy of the notice and motion upon the attorney prosecuting"; in (2), before "motion", deleted "allegations of the", after "show that the" substituted "evidence should be suppressed" for "search and seizure were unlawful", at end inserted "at the omnibus hearing or at a later date if the court orders", and deleted former sentence that read: "The burden of proving that the search and seizure were unlawful shall be on the defendant"; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL

Warrantless Entry Justified Under Exigent Circumstances Exception — Evidence Admissible Under Plain View Doctrine: Officer Cameron investigated a report that Kenfield was on the way to a remote small town to purchase alcohol for minors. The officer arrived at Kenfield's residence and heard loud music and smelled marijuana. Cameron was out of radio range. No one answered when Cameron knocked at the door and announced himself, but Cameron heard running feet. Concerned with the minors' well-being, Cameron entered the residence and saw drug paraphernalia and residue on the kitchen sink. Cameron then called dispatch from the residence and requested backup, and officers subsequently seized drugs and other contraband. Kenfield was arrested for drug production or manufacture, distribution of drugs to minors, and sexual abuse of children. Kenfield moved to suppress the fruits of the warrantless search, but the motion was denied, and Kenfield appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The odor of marijuana, coupled with the facts that the occupants attempted to avoid contact with Cameron and that Kenfield was believed to have been on the way to purchasing alcohol for minors, was sufficient for Cameron to form a reasonable belief that Kenfield had committed or was committing an offense. Additionally, the remoteness of the area, the time of the incident, the failure of Cameron's radio communication, Cameron's concern for the minors, the lack of response to the knock and announce, and the possibility that relevant evidence would be destroyed constituted exigent circumstances warranting immediate entry into the residence. Therefore, warrantless entry into Kenfield's home was justified, as was the seizure of drug evidence in plain view. St. v. Kenfield, 2009 MT 242, 351 M 409, 213 P3d 461 (2009), following St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065 (1998), distinguishing St. v. McBride, 1999 MT 127, 294 M 461, 982 P2d 453 (1999).

Admissible Evidence in Drug Case Obtained Through Informant — Actual Informant Testimony Allowed: A confidential informant wearing a wire purchased drugs from Schwartz, but no search warrant was issued for the electronic monitoring. The state indicated that it would call the informant to testify but would not introduce the results of the electronic monitoring. Schwartz moved to suppress all evidence seized as the result of a search conducted by the informant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The evidence derived through the informant and not through contemporaneous electric monitoring was admissible. Thus, the District Court was correct in declining to suppress actual testimony by the confidential informant, including identification of Schwartz as the seller and identification of the actual drugs purchased. St. v. Schwartz, 2009 MT 234, 351 M 384, 212 P3d 1060 (2009). See also St. v. Hanley, 186 M 410, 608 P2d 104 (1980), and St. v. Bassett, 189 M 28, 614 P2d 1054 (1980).

Evidence That Statements Freely Given, Not Compelled — Defendant's Right to Remain Silent Not Infringed — Mosley Standard: Morrisey was detained when officers served search warrants. The officers read Morrisey his Miranda rights prior to interrogation. When informed that he had the right to remain silent, Morrisey stated, "Yeah, I will." When told that anything he said could and would be used against him, Morrisey replied, "I ain't saying nothing." When informed that he had the right to an attorney and whether he understood that if he chose to answer questions he had the right to stop answering questions at any time, Morrisey answered, "Yes, got it." The officers then conversed with and questioned Morrisey for the next 3 to 4 hours, during which time Morrisey made incriminating statements. At trial for deliberate homicide, Morrisey moved to suppress the statements and evidence recovered as a result of the statements, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Morrisey maintained that his right to remain silent was violated during the interrogation and that the motion to suppress should have been granted. The Supreme Court recognized Morrisey's right against self-incrimination protected by due process and the totality of the circumstances test, as well as the Miranda doctrine. The court noted that under Oregon v. Elstad, 470 US 298 (1985), failure to give the prescribed warnings prior to questioning does not constitute actual coercion, but rather creates a bright-line legal presumption of coercion that is irrebuttable for purposes of the prosecution's case-in-chief. In this case, Morrisey did not contend that he did not receive Miranda warnings prior to questioning, but rather that officers failed to honor his assertion of the right to remain silent. The court, however, cited the standard in Michigan v. Mosley, 423 US 96 (1975), that the admissibility of statements obtained after a person in custody has decided to remain silent depends under Miranda on whether the person's right to cut off questioning was scrupulously honored. Morrisey was clearly in custody and also clearly invoked the right to silence but then willingly engaged in a running conversation with the officers, giving statements freely, voluntarily, and without compulsion, yet without invoking the right to cut off questioning. Therefore, under the Miranda-Mosley theory, Morrisey's right to remain silent was not infringed, and he was not entitled to suppression of the incriminating statements. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Morrisey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009).

Failure of Counsel to File Unmerited Motion Not Prejudicial — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Adkins contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney failed to move to suppress drug evidence based on an officer's failure to administer Miranda warnings to Adkins. However, Adkins was on probation at the time the search was conducted and was therefore subject to search of his person and residence. The imminent probation search was an independent legal means by which the evidence would have been inevitably discovered in any case. Counsel's motion to suppress would thus have been without merit, and failure to file for suppression therefore did not prejudice Adkins, so the ineffective counsel argument failed. St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

Inevitable Discovery of Laptop Computer Evidence — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Lacey shared a residence with Dozier, although the property was owned by Dozier. Dozier discovered incriminating evidence on Lacey's laptop computer, which was in the common area of the residence and which Dozier was allowed to access. Officers came to the residence and Dozier allowed them to seize the computer. Lacey later asserted that the officers lacked probable cause to seize Lacey's personal property without Lacey's consent. Because Lacey had a possessory interest in the property, Dozier did not have the right or authority to consent to seizure of the computer. However, because the computer was searched pursuant to a federal search warrant rather than on Dozier's consent, Dozier's consent was immaterial. Rather, even if probable cause did not exist for seizure of the laptop, the evidence later discovered pursuant to the federal warrant was admissible under the inevitable discovery exception to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, and Lacey's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009). See also St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 296, 318 M 146, 79 P3d 289 (2003), and St. v. Dasen, 2007 MT 87, 337 M 74, 155 P3d 1282 (2007).

Seized Evidence Not Considered "Other Evidence of a Crime" Not Subject to Suppression: Cotterell moved to suppress evidence of illegal hunting activity that was seized under a search warrant that allowed seizure of numerous hunting-related items, but also allowed seizure of "any other evidence of a crime", on grounds that the warrant was overbroad. The motion was denied. On appeal, the state conceded that the phrase "any other evidence of a crime" was overbroad (see St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), and Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001)) but asserted that journals and calendars found in searching Cotterell's property were directly related to the crimes being investigated and thus were not subject to suppression. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. Although the journals and calendars were not specifically mentioned in the warrant, they were found during execution of a validly executed warrant in places that could lawfully be searched, were found in the course of a search for items that were specifically set out in the warrant, and were related to hunting and fishing activities. Even if the overbroad phrase was excised from the warrant, the journals and calendars were within the scope of the warrant, so denial of the motion to suppress was affirmed. St. v. Cotterell, 2008 MT 409, 347 M 231, 198 P3d 254 (2008).

No Hearing on Suppression Motion Required Absent Showing of False Statement in Warrant Application: Tucker argued that the District Court erred by failing to hold a hearing on Tucker's motion to suppress. The Supreme Court disagreed. Tucker failed to make any preliminary showing of a false statement or to challenge any factual statement in the application and instead challenged whether probable cause was established within the four corners of the application, so no hearing was required under this section. Rather, a hearing was within the discretion of the District Court. St. v. Tucker, 2008 MT 273, 345 M 237, 190 P3d 1080 (2008).

No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Who Failed to Request Hearing That Was Not Required: Tucker contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to request a hearing on Tucker's motion to suppress evidence from a search pursuant to 46-13-302. The Supreme Court disagreed. Tucker failed the first prong of the Strickland test because he could not demonstrate that counsel was deficient for failing to request a hearing when counsel had no basis to request a hearing absent Tucker's challenge to the truthfulness of any statements in the warrant application. St. v. Tucker, 2008 MT 273, 345 M 237, 190 P3d 1080 (2008).

Inevitable Discovery Doctrine Exception to Exclusionary Rule on Inadmissibility of Evidence Obtained as Result of Unlawful Search — Sua Sponte Application by Supreme Court: Dickinson asserted that certain evidence discovered during a warrantless search of his motel room should be suppressed under the exclusionary rule as fruit of the poisonous tree because the discovery was not made during a search incident to arrest and because the search was not a justified protective sweep. The state contended that the search was conducted on grounds of safety and exigent circumstances. Although neither party raised the argument, the Supreme Court decided sua sponte to address the issue under the inevitable discovery doctrine exception to the exclusionary rule, which holds that fruit of the poisonous tree evidence is admissible if it is inevitable that the evidence would have been discovered apart from a defendant's confession. In this case, the officers were legally in the motel room, and there was more than sufficient evidence in plain sight to justify issuance of a warrant. Once the warrant was executed, the remainder of the evidence would have inevitably been discovered and was thus admissible under the inevitable discovery doctrine. St. v. Dickinson, 2008 MT 159, 343 M 301, 184 P3d 305 (2008). The Dickinson inevitable discovery doctrine was also applied in St. v. Hilgendorf, 2009 MT 158, 350 M 412, 208 P3d 401 (2009). See also St. v. Pearson, 217 M 363, 704 P2d 1056 (1985).

Clarification of Plain View Warrant Exception — Applicable to Seizures, Not Searches: The plain view doctrine allows peace officers to seize evidence in plain view without a warrant under certain circumstances. If an officer discovers evidence in plain view while lawfully present on an individual's property and the incriminating nature of the evidence is immediately apparent, the evidence may be seized and used against a defendant at trial. However, unlike exigent circumstances, valid consent, and lawful arrest, the doctrine does not allow the officer to proceed or intrude to the location of the evidence without a warrant. Rather, the applicability of the doctrine depends on the officer's lawful presence and right of access to the evidence and should not be construed as a stand-in for a search warrant. As an exception to the warrant requirement, the plain view doctrine applies to seizures, not searches. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 295, 340 M 10, 171 P3d 731 (2007). See also Horton v. Calif., 496 US 128 (1990).

Standard of Review of Denial of Suppression Motion: A trial court's denial of a suppression motion based on a finding of particularized suspicion is reviewed to determine whether that finding is clearly erroneous and whether the trial court's conclusions of law are correct. Billings v. Costa, 2006 MT 181, 333 M 84, 140 P3d 1070 (2006). See also St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

Motion to Suppress DUI Blood Test Evidence Obtained by Investigative Subpoena Properly Denied: Following a motorcycle accident, Fregien admitted to a responding firefighter that he had consumed some beer, and the firefighter and a highway patrol officer noticed the odor of alcohol on Fregien's breath. The firefighter's affidavit supported an investigative subpoena for Fregien's blood test results obtained at the hospital. Fregien contended that the evidence did not rise to the level of probable cause and that the blood test results should have been suppressed, but the suppression motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under St. v. Nelson, 283 M 231, 941 P2d 441 (1997), the facts warranted an honest belief in the mind of a reasonable and prudent person that Fregien had committed the offense of DUI, thereby establishing probable cause for the investigative subpoena for Fregien's blood test results, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Fregien, 2006 MT 18, 331 M 18, 127 P3d 1048 (2006).

Voluntary Confession During Noncustodial Interrogation — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Honey was interviewed once in a patrol car and once at the Sheriff's office regarding his involvement in certain thefts. At both interviews, Honey was read his Miranda rights, was advised of his right to counsel, which he waived, and was informed that he would not be arrested and was free to leave at any time. Honey later contended that his confession was involuntary and moved to suppress it. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Being able to leave, Honey was not subject to a custodial interrogation, and he was not denied the right to counsel. Under the totality of the circumstances, his confession was voluntary, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Honey, 2005 MT 107, 327 M 49, 112 P3d 983 (2005). See also St. v. Grey, 274 M 206, 907 P2d 951 (1995), and St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

Standard of Review of Grant or Denial of Motion to Suppress Evidence: The Supreme Court reviews a District Court's grant or denial of a motion to suppress evidence to determine whether the District Court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether those findings were correctly applied as a matter of law. A trial court's findings are clearly erroneous if they are not supported by substantial evidence, if the court has misapprehended the effect of the evidence, or if review of the record leaves the Supreme Court with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made. St. v. Ochadleus, 2005 MT 88, 326 M 441, 110 P3d 448 (2005). See also St. v. Roberts, 1999 MT 59, 293 M 476, 977 P2d 974 (1999), St. v. Lanegan, 2004 MT 134, 321 M 349, 91 P3d 578 (2004), and St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007).

Hearing on Suppression Motion Unnecessary When Facts Uncontested: In Justice's Court, Schulke moved to suppress evidence, but the motion was denied. Schulke stated that an evidentiary hearing on the motion would be superfluous and thus did not request a hearing. On appeal, the District Court declined to hold a hearing on the suppression motion and Schulke asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Schulke did not contest the facts in the investigating officer's report in Justice's Court and argued that a hearing was necessary only when the Justice's Court and the District Court ruled against him. An evidentiary hearing is unnecessary when facts are uncontested and the court is asked to make a decision as a matter of law. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a hearing on the suppression motion when a hearing was not requested in Justice's Court. St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005). See also St. v. Shook, 2002 MT 347, 313 M 347, 61 P3d 863 (2002).

Breath Test Administered Before Reading of Implied Consent Advisory — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Kintli was stopped for suspicion of DUI. She was administered field sobriety tests and was read the preliminary alcohol screen test advisory. At the detention center, she refused to repeat the field sobriety tests and indicated that she wanted to take the breath test. The test was administered and resulted in a BAC of 0.262. Following the test, the officer read Kintli the consent advisory and offered to void the test and administer a new one. Kintli indicated that she did not want to retake the test. Kintli was found guilty of DUI per se in City Court and appealed to District Court for a trial de novo. She moved to suppress the results of the breath test, which was denied. Kintli then pleaded guilty, reserving the right to appeal the suppression denial. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court. Because the right to independent blood testing remains constant regardless of whether the suspect refuses or submits to testing, Kintli's argument that the officer's failure to advise her of this right before she consented invalidates her consent is nonsensical. She was timely advised of her right to obtain independent blood testing, and this was sufficient to safeguard her due process rights. Section 61-8-409 requires an officer to advise a person submitting to a preliminary breath test ("PBT") of the right of refusal and the consequences of refusal. The Supreme Court has held that in order for that statutory section to have meaning, the notice of the right of refusal and the consequences of refusal necessarily must precede the testing. No similar statutory requirement is found as to other BAC tests conducted after arrest. St. v. Kintli, 2004 MT 373, 325 M 53, 103 P3d 1056 (2004).

Sufficient Corroboration of Tip in Application for Warrant to Demonstrate Probable Cause — Suppression Motion Improperly Granted: Based on a tip, Palmer was arrested for drugs following a search of his bus. The District Court subsequently granted Palmer's motion to suppress after concluding that: (1) the informant lacked reliability; (2) timeframes surrounding the information were unclear; (3) the informant's tip was not sufficiently corroborated; (4) associations between Palmer and drug activity were tenuous; and (5) evidence found in Palmer's trash could not be directly linked to Palmer. The state appealed the suppression, and the Supreme Court reversed. Applying St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), the court found it unnecessary to determine whether the informant should be treated as a confidential informant, requiring corroboration, or as an informant who made an unequivocal admission against interest in the course of providing the tip because the search warrant application itself sufficiently corroborated the tip and demonstrated probable cause. The fact that corroborative evidence in the form of video surveillance revealed no actual criminal activity did not necessarily lead to the conclusion that probable cause did not exist. St. v. Palmer, 2003 MT 129, 316 M 46, 68 P3d 809 (2003).

Exigent Circumstances and Probable Cause Justifying Warrantless Entry Into Private Home — Motion to Suppress Evidence of Warrantless Search Properly Denied: In response to an urgent domestic violence 9-1-1 call from Saxton, officers arrived at Saxton's mobile home, but because they received no response to their calls and knocking, the officers entered the home to protect the lives of possible victims inside. Once inside, the officers discovered a marijuana growing operation and subsequently arrested Saxton on drug charges. Saxton moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the warrantless entry was unlawful, but the motion was denied, and Saxton appealed. The Supreme Court recognized the general rule that warrantless searches conducted inside a person's home are per se unreasonable, with few exceptions. Pursuant to St. v. Wakeford, 1998 MT 16, 287 M 220, 953 P2d 1065 (1998), one exception occurs when an officer concludes that there are exigent circumstances and probable cause to conduct the search, and in this case, exigent circumstances and probable cause justified entry into the home. It was reasonable for the responding officers to conclude that it was necessary to enter the home to discover and protect Saxton or other potentially incapacitated victims. Because entry was justified, the District Court did not err in denying Saxton's motion to suppress evidence obtained as a result of the search. St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search of Vehicle for Suspected Drug Lab: Officers received a tip from Olson's estranged husband that a methamphetamine lab was being operated in Olson's garage. The officers placed the garage under surveillance and saw equipment being loaded into Olson's car that same day. The officers stopped the car for an investigative stop, and an officer informed Olson that he knew that lab equipment was in the trunk. Olson initially denied it, but when the officer expressed concern for Olson and her son, she made incriminating statements and confessed that the lab was in the car. The officers then obtained a search warrant and searched the vehicle and Olson's garage. Olson contended that the warrant application was not supported by probable cause. The Supreme Court applied the standards in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), and concluded that Olson's husband was acting as a good citizen and was a reliable informant. The officers had sufficient probable cause to believe that a drug lab was relocated from Olson's garage to the vehicle to support the issuance of the search warrant. St. v. Olson, 2003 MT 61, 314 M 402, 66 P3d 297 (2003).

Defendant Informed of Right to Independent Blood Test After Administration of Portable Breath Test — No Violation of Due Process Rights: After Feldbrugge was stopped for speeding, the investigating officer noticed that Feldbrugge seemed confused, had difficulty removing his driver's license from his wallet and producing proof of registration and insurance, had bloodshot and glassy eyes and slurred speech, and was unsteady on his feet. Upon questioning, Feldbrugge admitted having had a couple of drinks. The officer did not perform field sobriety tests, but did ask Feldbrugge to take a portable breath test (PBT). The officer read a short advisory that did not contain information regarding Feldbrugge's right to obtain an independent blood test to challenge the PBT results and told Feldbrugge that if he passed the PBT, he would not be arrested, but if he failed the PBT, he would be arrested for DUI. Feldbrugge consented to the PBT, which he failed, and was arrested and taken to the county jail. Before being administered an Intoxilyzer breath test at the jail, Feldbrugge was read the informed consent advisory form, which included a statement regarding Feldbrugge's right to obtain an independent blood test. At trial, Feldbrugge moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that his due process rights were violated because he was not informed of the right to an independent blood test until after the PBT was administered, citing St. v. Strand, 286 M 122, 951 P2d 552 (1997), which establishes an officer's affirmative duty to inform a defendant of the right to an independent blood test at the time of arrest while the blood can still be analyzed. The motion was denied, and Feldbrugge appealed. The state maintained that the officer in this case complied with Strand by informing Feldbrugge of the right to an independent blood test after arrest and at a time when the right could be meaningfully exercised, noting that Strand involves a defendant's right to attempt to obtain exculpatory evidence and does not implicate the separate right to refuse to submit to a breath test that has been requested under the implied consent statute. Feldbrugge argued that had he been informed of the right to an independent blood test, he might have refused to consent to the PBT. However, the notion that Feldbrugge had a choice between taking a PBT or obtaining an independent blood test, without penalty, was misguided. Under the implied consent statute, every person who operates a motor vehicle in this state impliedly consents to a blood or breath test, and if the test is refused, the person's driver's license is subject to immediate seizure and suspension. A person may obtain an independent blood test in addition to the test administered at the direction of an officer, but the right to an independent blood test, as discussed in Strand, is separate from the obligation to submit to an officer-designated test under the implied consent law. Here, it was unnecessary for the officer to inform Feldbrugge of the right to an independent blood test prior to requesting the PBT because even if Feldbrugge had been so informed, his options remained the same: consent to the PBT or refuse and have his driver's license seized. Rather, under Strand, the officer was required to timely inform Feldbrugge that he could obtain an independent blood test in addition to the PBT and Intoxilyzer breath test so that Feldbrugge could gather exculpatory evidence. Informing Feldbrugge after the PBT was timely, so Feldbrugge's due process rights were not violated. Because the PBT results were admissible, Feldbrugge's arrest was supported by probable cause, and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Feldbrugge, 2002 MT 154, 310 M 368, 50 P3d 1067 (2002).

Elements of Community Caretaker Doctrine — Particularized Suspicion Not Required in Case of Safety Stop: About 3:05 a.m., an officer on routine patrol stopped to investigate a vehicle parked beside a highway with its lights out but with its motor running. Lovegren was in the driver's seat and appeared to be asleep, but he did not respond when the officer knocked on the window. When the officer opened the door, Lovegren awoke and stated, "I was drinking." The officer noticed that Lovegren's eyes were bloodshot and smelled alcohol. The officer had Lovegren perform field sobriety tests, which Lovegren failed, and arrested Lovegren for DUI. Lovegren moved to suppress all evidence, claiming that the search was illegal because the officer had no particularized suspicion of any wrongdoing. The District Court denied the motion on grounds that a particularized suspicion was not necessary because the officer had a duty to investigate for Lovegren's own safety. Lovegren appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed pursuant to the community caretaker doctrine. The court applied the following test to determine whether an officer's actions fall under the doctrine: (1) as long as there are objective, specific, and articulable facts from which an experienced officer would suspect that a citizen is in need of help or is in peril, the officer has a right to stop and investigate; (2) if the citizen is in need of aid, the officer may take appropriate action to render assistance or mitigate the peril; and (3) once the officer is assured that the citizen is not in peril and is not in need of assistance or that the peril has been mitigated, any actions beyond that constitute a seizure implicating constitutional protections afforded by the right of privacy and the right against illegal search and seizure. In this case, when the officer opened the door to check on Lovegren's well-being and Lovegren awoke and voluntarily stated that he had been drinking, the officer then noticed other signs of intoxication that constituted a particularized suspicion to make a further investigative stop that eventually developed into probable cause for an arrest. It would have been a dereliction of the officer's duty if, after knocking on the window and receiving no response, the officer had walked away and continued on patrol. Thus, the escalation of events leading to Lovegren's arrest was proper, and denial of the motion to suppress the evidence of the investigation was not erroneous. St. v. Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002), following Grinde v. St., 249 M 77, 813 P2d 473 (1991), and Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), and followed in St. v. Reiner, 2003 MT 243, 317 M 304, 77 P3d 210 (2003), St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 13, 319 M 250, 84 P3d 25 (2004), St. v. Litschauer, 2005 MT 331, 330 M 22, 126 P3d 456 (2005), St. v. Wheeler, 2006 MT 38, 331 M 179, 134 P3d 38 (2006), and St. v. Vaughn, 2007 MT 164, 338 M 97, 164 P3d 873 (2007). The Lovegren community caretaker doctrine was also applied in St. v. Seaman, 2005 MT 307, 329 M 429, 124 P3d 1137 (2005). See also Henry v. U.S., 361 US 98 (1959), Terry v. Ohio, 392 US 1 (1968), and Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 US 433 (1973).

Standard of Review of Denial of Motion to Suppress Evidence of Investigatory Stop: The Supreme Court reviews the denial of a motion to suppress evidence from an investigatory stop to determine whether the trial court's finding that the officer involved had a particularized suspicion to justify the investigatory stop was clearly erroneous. The trial court's conclusions of law are reviewed to determine whether the court's interpretation of the law was correct. St. v. Lovegren, 2002 MT 153, 310 M 358, 51 P3d 471 (2002).

Catchall Phrase in Warrant — Particularity Requirement — Suppression of Only Articles Seized Pursuant to Invalid Portions of Search Warrant: A lawful search warrant authorized officers to search Hauge's mobile home and seize drugs, drug paraphernalia, records of drug transactions, weapons, and the proceeds of drug transactions, including "anything else of value furnished or intended to be furnished in the exchange of controlled substances". Hauge argued that the catchall phrase "anything else of value" rendered the warrant overbroad and invalid and that any evidence seized pursuant to the warrant must be suppressed. After initially citing the requirement that a search warrant must particularly describe who or what is to be seized, the Supreme Court noted that in St. v. Seader, 1999 MT 290, 297 M 60, 990 P2d 180 (1999), warrant language authorizing seizure of anything else of value was a catchall phrase encompassing everything conceivable, giving officers unbridled discretion to engage in a general exploratory rummaging without any guidance in distinguishing between items that could and could not be seized and that the language rendered the warrant facially overbroad and all fruits of the search inadmissible. However, the court also noted the adoption of the doctrine of severance, explained in U.S. v. Gomez-Soto, 723 F2d 649 (9th Cir. 1984), which provides that invalid portions of a search warrant may be stricken and valid portions preserved and that only articles seized pursuant to the invalid portions of the warrant need be suppressed. In Hauge's case, officers acting pursuant to a lawfully issued and otherwise sufficiently particularized warrant did not seize any property related to the catchall phrase and no criminal charges resulted from the presence of the catchall language in the warrant. The overbroad catchall clause was thus severable, and because no evidence was seized pursuant to the clause, no evidence was subject to suppression. Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001). See also St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556 (1998).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant Based on Tip From Confidential Informant — Corroboration Required — Defendant's Burden to Show False Information in Warrant Application: A confidential informant told police that Gray was conducting a marijuana growing operation in his home. Based on the allegations, officers surveyed the exterior of the home and discovered a newly installed chimney and vents consistent with such an operation. Known drug offenders were observed frequenting the residence. An investigative subpoena of Gray's utility records showed an increase in power consumption consistent with a growing operation. Based on this information, officers obtained a search warrant and discovered 77 marijuana plants and associated growing paraphernalia. Gray moved unsuccessfully to suppress the evidence on grounds of insufficient probable cause to support the warrant, arguing that the warrant application contained unreliable hearsay, insufficient detail, and unsupported conclusory statements. The Supreme Court affirmed. In St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), the court reiterated that corroboration of an informant's tip through other sources is necessary when the information is hearsay or the informant is anonymous. In this case, even though the informant was not anonymous, the informant lacked personal knowledge of the operation, so the information was hearsay and required corroboration. Nevertheless, the information could still be considered with other factors in determining probable cause under the totality of the circumstances test. The officers made several attempts to corroborate the information, including verification of the physical description of Gray and the residence, although that innocuous information alone provided no indicia of suspicious human conduct to substantiate the allegations, as required in St. v. Griggs, 2001 MT 211, 306 M 366, 34 P3d 101 (2001). However, the officers' other observations did provide sufficient corroboration to support probable cause, despite Gray's attempt to offer seemingly innocent explanations for the suspicious conduct. When a defendant challenges the veracity of information in a warrant application, the defendant must make a substantial preliminary showing that the application or affidavit in support of the application contained false information. If that showing is made, a hearing must be held and the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the information is untrue, and if proved untrue, that information must be excised from the application and a determination made as to whether sufficient probable cause exists without the excised information (see St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968 (1999)). Here, Gray did challenge the veracity of some, but not all, of the information, but the Supreme Court declined to disturb the trial court's findings regarding the reasonableness and prudence of the investigation or its judgment regarding the credibility of the witnesses. The court found that at some point, credence must be lent to the judgment of law enforcement whose training and experience invoke common sense conclusions about human behavior, and as long as officers provide reasonable justifications for their conclusions, the court will not disturb a finding of probable cause for issuance of a search warrant. The information here was sufficiently corroborated, and in light of the totality of the circumstances, the conclusion that probable cause existed was affirmed. St. v. Gray, 2001 MT 250, 307 M 124, 38 P3d 775 (2001). See also St. v. Rinehart, 262 M 204, 864 P2d 1219 (1993).

Investigative Subpoena for Medical Records Not Issued for Overly Broad Time Period: The District Court issued an investigative subpoena related to an accident on January 3, 2000, to compel production of Bilant's medical records back to 1996. The affidavit for subpoena was issued May 10, 2000. The health care provider supplied records back to 1991. Bilant moved to suppress the information on grounds that the subpoena was overly broad in supplying any information after the date of the accident and prior to the date specified in the subpoena. The Supreme Court affirmed the validity of the investigative subpoena. The inclusion of time between January 3 and May 10 did not render the subpoena defective because there was a legitimate nexus between prescriptions issued before January 3 and prescription refills issued during subsequent months. Further, if a health care provider discloses medical information beyond what is allowed by law, the remedy lies with the health care provider and not with law enforcement through a motion to suppress. The question of the production of medical records beyond those required by the subpoena was a matter beyond the scope of Supreme Court review, and receipt by the state of records that contained information outside the scope and time period requested did not justify suppression of those portions of the records sought by and yielded pursuant to an otherwise legally sufficient investigative subpoena. St. v. Bilant, 2001 MT 249, 307 M 113, 36 P3d 883 (2001).

Revealing Limited Medical Information During Police Interview Not Considered Waiver of Constitutional Right to Confidentiality in Medical Records — Voluntary Medical Information Outside Scope of Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine — Adequate Probable Cause for Investigative Subpoena of Medical Records: Bilant was involved in a three-car accident and was subsequently arrested for DUI and a seat belt violation. During an interview following the arrest, Bilant revealed to an officer that he had taken pain medication on the day of the accident. The officer called Bilant's health care provider for confirmation, and the provider confirmed that Bilant had a prescription for a drug similar to the pain medication that he mentioned. The officer then procured an investigative subpoena regarding documentation on all prescriptions issued to Bilant, including any advisory warnings, and the provider sent Bilant's entire medical file. Bilant contended that the state violated both his constitutional right to privacy and the statutory protections of 50-16-535. The state maintained that Bilant waived his claim of confidentiality in his medical information when he voluntarily revealed his use of pain medication to the officer. The Supreme Court agreed with Bilant. Medical records are quintessentially private and deserve the utmost constitutional protection. None of the statutory prerequisites for disclosure of the medical records were met. In deciding to reveal limited medical information in a police interview, Bilant did not forfeit his constitutional right to subsequently claim confidentiality in his medical records. The officer conducted an illegal search in seeking the constitutionally protected private medical information without probable cause and the benefit of an investigative subpoena under 46-4-301, and the information gleaned from the telephone call should have been suppressed. Bilant then contended that the use of the illegally obtained information formed an improper basis for the investigative subpoena and that the results of the subpoena should also have been suppressed pursuant to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, which forbids the use of evidence that comes to light as the result of an initially illegal act. However, on this point, the Supreme Court disagreed with Bilant. One exception to the doctrine is that the derivative evidence is admissible if it is obtained from an independent source. Here, Bilant himself provided the source by giving voluntary medical information from other than the illegal telephone inquiry. The Supreme Court recognized that an investigative subpoena seeking constitutionally protected medical information requires greater justification for state access than the administration of justice rationale used to obtain public information under 46-4-301, so in reviewing the probable cause basis for constitutionally protected material, the court excised the illegal evidence from the application and reviewed the remaining information de novo to determine whether probable cause existed for issuing the subpoena. In this case, even when the information subject to suppression was excised, the remaining evidence established probable cause that a DUI was committed and underscored a compelling state interest in medical records related to prescription medicines in order to confirm Bilant's initial admission to the officer. Thus, the subpoena was issued in accordance with the statutory requirements for constitutionally protected medical records, and Bilant's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bilant, 2001 MT 249, 307 M 113, 36 P3d 883 (2001). See also St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), and St. v. Nelson, 283 M 231, 941 P2d 441 (1997).

Suppression Hearing — Court to Consider Totality of Circumstances: In a suppression hearing, a court must consider the totality of the circumstances, and in evaluating the totality of the circumstances, a court should consider the quantity or content and quality or degree of reliability of the information available to the officer. St. v. Bauer, 2001 MT 248, 307 M 105, 36 P3d 892 (2001). See also St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147 (1999).

Sufficiency of Law Enforcement Officer's Independent Corroboration of Anonymous Tip — Failure to Corroborate Probability of Criminal Activity — Evidence of Search Properly Suppressed: Bozeman police received an anonymous tip that Griggs was conducting a mushroom-growing operation in his home. The informant also included a physical description of Griggs, his address, a description of his vehicle, the fact that Griggs had recently improved the wood trim on his residence, and the facts that he was a member of the armed forces, was a sharpshooter, and possessed several weapons. Detectives were able to corroborate all the personal information and incorporated it into a search warrant application, but did not corroborate that alleged criminal activity was occurring. Nevertheless, a warrant was issued by a District Court Judge and executed the following day, resulting in the seizure of contraband and Griggs's arrest. Griggs moved to suppress, arguing that the warrant was issued without sufficient probable cause, and a different District Court Judge granted the motion on grounds that because there was no independent police investigation that corroborated the caller's statements about the drug activity, sufficient probable cause for the warrant did not exist. The state appealed, contending that the further law enforcement investigation required under the standards in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), do not necessarily require corroboration of any criminal activity at all and need not extend to any incriminating information regarding alleged criminal activity supplied by an informant. The Supreme Court disagreed. A defendant may challenge whether independent corroboration or investigation was sufficient within the context of a court's totality of the circumstances analysis. Upon review, an appellate court must look solely to the information given to the impartial magistrate and to the four corners of the entire warrant application, rather than examining the application sentence by sentence. An anonymous informant's information regarding criminal activity always requires law enforcement corroboration in order to supply a sufficient substantial basis for a probable cause determination, although information supplied by a "concerned citizen" whose identity is known, who personally observes the alleged criminal activity, and who openly risks liability by accusing another person of criminal activity may not need further law enforcement corroboration. What is critical in the corroboration of an informant's information, when corroboration is in fact required, is that innocent noncriminal activity or evidence subjected to further investigation by officers ripens into suspicious behavior in light of the tip concerning criminal activity. A warrant application must state facts sufficient to support probable cause to believe that a criminal offense has been committed, as well as facts supporting probable cause to believe that evidence, contraband, or persons connected with the offense may be found. The necessary indicia of suspicion that results from police corroboration of otherwise innocent information must reveal a pattern of human behavior associated with the alleged criminal activity or activity necessary to carry out the activity that, when viewed as a whole, is consistent with the criminal activity. It is possible that in order to reveal this indicia of suspicious conduct, officers may investigate and corroborate otherwise innocent, noncriminal activity with further observations of otherwise innocent, noncriminal activity, but in Griggs's case, none of the subsequent investigations served to supply the magistrate with any indicia of conduct even remotely associated with the criminal activity alleged by the informant. Thus, probable cause did not exist, and the fruits of the search were properly suppressed. St. v. Griggs, 2001 MT 211, 306 M 366, 34 P3d 101 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Deskins, 245 M 158, 799 P2d 1070 (1990), and St. v. Hook, 255 M 2, 839 P2d 1274 (1992), and followed in Hauge v. District Court, 2001 MT 255, 307 M 195, 36 P3d 947 (2001). See also U.S. v. Mendonsa, 989 F2d 366 (9th Cir. 1993).

Failure of District Court to Properly Consider Prior Supreme Court Decision Regarding Suppression of Evidence as Law of Case — Grant of Request for Further Evidentiary Hearing Reversible Error: In St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147 (1999) (Gilder I), the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court erred when it denied Gilder's motion to suppress evidence obtained during the stop of Gilder's vehicle because the investigating officer did not have a particularized suspicion to justify the stop; however, the Supreme Court did not remand for further proceedings. Following the issuance of remittitur in Gilder I, the state requested an evidentiary hearing to present additional evidence to meet its burden of establishing particularized suspicion, arguing that a hearing was appropriate because Gilder I had referenced the District Court's failure to conduct an evidentiary hearing prior to its original denial of the motion to suppress. The request for an evidentiary hearing was granted over Gilder's objection, and the arresting officer was allowed to testify and supplement the evidence offered by the state in Gilder I. The District Court then issued an order again denying Gilder's motion to suppress, and Gilder appealed. The state's interpretation of Gilder I as an invitation for further proceedings on the suppression issue was incorrect. Although the District Court could have properly revisited factual determinations in regard to other issues, the suppression issue in Gilder I was foreclosed from further consideration. Gilder I constituted the law of the case regarding the lack of particularized suspicion for the investigative stop and the suppression of evidence obtained from the stop, and the District Court abused its discretion by not properly treating Gilder I as the law of the case and by conducting further evidentiary hearings on a matter that was conclusively decided by the Supreme Court in the previous proceedings. St. v. Gilder, 2001 MT 121, 305 M 362, 28 P3d 488 (2001), following Zavarelli v. Might, 239 M 120, 779 P2d 489 (1989).

Search Warrant Based in Part on Illegal Information — Motion to Suppress Denied — Reviewing Court to Conduct De Novo Review of Search Warrant Application: Police officers went to defendants' trailer home to check out a tip about marijuana being grown in the home. Defendants were arrested after the officers saw a marijuana pipe on a shelf. An officer went down the hall and saw and seized marijuana plants growing in a bedroom. The officers then got a search warrant and seized additional drug evidence. Defendants moved to suppress the plants seized without a warrant and the additional evidence seized pursuant to the warrant on the basis that it was tainted. The District Court granted the motion to suppress the plants on the basis that no exception to a warrantless search excused the illegal search and denied the motion to suppress the evidence seized with a search warrant. The Supreme Court held that when the issuance of a search warrant is based in part on illegally obtained information, the reviewing court shall excise the illegally obtained information from the application for search warrant and review the remaining information de novo to determine whether probable cause supported the issuance of a search warrant, overruling the use of the "great deference" standard of review in such cases. The Supreme Court held that the marijuana pipe and the citizen tip established probable cause for the issuance of the search warrant. The test is not to determine whether each individual fact presented in the application for search warrant establishes probable cause, but to determine from the totality of the circumstances whether there is probable cause. St. v. Kuneff, 1998 MT 287, 291 M 474, 970 P2d 556, 55 St. Rep. 1173 (1998).

Presence of Arresting Officer Needed to Prove Particularized Suspicion: A highway patrol officer stopped Angeline on suspicion of violating the basic rule and subsequently arrested him for driving under the influence. Angeline moved to suppress any evidence obtained after the stop on the basis that the arresting officer had no grounds to make the initial stop. At the suppression hearing, the state presented no witnesses, not even the arresting officer. Angeline presented evidence as to why he believed that his actions in passing two cars at 80 miles an hour on a two-way road did not violate the basic rule. The lower court held that Angeline's testimony was sufficient to demonstrate the facts that the arresting officer relied upon to achieve a particularized suspicion that Angeline had violated the basic rule. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that without the arresting officer's testimony, the lower court could only speculate as to the objective data that the officer may have observed before the investigatory stop and further that no evidence was introduced regarding the officer's experience and training that would allow the court to evaluate his observations, inferences, and resulting suspicions that led to the stop. St. v. Angeline, 1998 MT 139, 289 M 222, 961 P2d 1251, 55 St. Rep. 556 (1998), followed in St. v. Gilder, 1999 MT 207, 295 M 483, 985 P2d 147, 56 St. Rep. 808 (1999).

Seizure of Items Not Described in Search Warrant: Based on an informant's tip, a search warrant was issued for respondent's home, and marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana were seized. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court reversed, holding that there was probable cause to support the warrant. Items or things other than those described in the warrant may be seized so long as a reasonable relationship is demonstrated between the search authorized by the warrant and the seizure of the thing not described. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988).

Motion to Suppress Results of Breathalyzer Test Denied — Affirmed on Appeal — No Transcript Forwarded: Charged with driving under the influence of alcohol, defendant moved to suppress results of Breathalyzer test. The Justice of the Peace denied the motion. In a bench trial the Justice Court found defendant guilty. On appeal to the District Court, defendant renewed his suppression motion on a set of stipulated facts. Motion was denied and defendant was convicted by a jury of violating 61-8-406, but was acquitted of charges under 61-8-401. On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant stated that no trial transcript was being forwarded since the appeal of the denial of the suppression motion could be reviewed upon the face of the stipulated facts. The state included excerpts of the trial transcript that buttressed the lower court's decision on the suppression motion. The Supreme Court approved the state's approach since the suppression motion denial was not final and could be reversed at any time. St. v. Sharp, 217 M 40, 702 P2d 959, 42 St. Rep. 1009 (1985).

Weapon Seized in Home Without Warrant — Statement by Defendant Without Miranda Warnings — Evidence Suppressed: Defendant charged with aggravated assault moved to suppress evidence. The trial court granted defendant's motion on grounds that defendant felt compelled to give officers access to his home without warrant, and thus seizure of weapon in plain view was not justified; statements by defendant in response to officers' questions were not admissible since defendant was considered to be in custody at the time and did not receive Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court upheld the trial court's order suppressing the evidence, noting factors that required the officers to obtain a search warrant. St. v. Osteen, 216 M 258, 700 P2d 188, 42 St. Rep. 789 (1985), followed in St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355, 51 St. Rep. 262 (1994).

Standing by Overnight Guest to Contest Search of Dwelling: The defendant appealed his denial of standing to contest a search of a dwelling that resulted in evidence against him. The defendant was an overnight guest in the dwelling searched, and that fact coupled with his lack of ownership interest in the dwelling is a factor to consider in determining standing, but it is not the controlling factor. Another factor to consider is whether the defendant had a reasonable expectation of freedom from government intrusion. Here, the dominion over the dwelling exercised by the defendant as the sole occupant at the time of search and the fact that evidence was seized in areas where he slept and stored his belongings were sufficient to grant standing to the defendant. St. v. Isom, 196 M 330, 641 P2d 417, 39 St. Rep. 137 (1982).

Electronic Monitoring: Carrier, an undercover drug investigator, was outfitted with a concealed microphone and a body monitor during six meetings with the defendant. Court orders permitting the monitoring were obtained for the last three meetings but not for the first three. The transcripts of the last three meetings were admitted into evidence over the defendant's objection. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that the application for electronic monitoring authorization was based on Carrier's own personal observations which supplied adequate independent information. The application made no reference to the fact that the earlier conversations were monitored or recorded, and the later recordings were not tainted by the earlier unauthorized recordings. St. v. Bassett, 189 M 28, 614 P2d 1054 (1980).

Undercover Investigators — No Need to Meet Requirement to Be Deputy: Carrier worked as an undercover drug investigator in Billings for Yellowstone County. Carrier was a Deputy Sheriff even though he may not have met all the technical statutory qualifications. To require all law enforcement officials to be fully clothed with all statutory requirements in all instances would seriously jeopardize the success of law enforcement in circumstances such as those presented in this case. St. v. Bassett, 189 M 28, 614 P2d 1054 (1980).

Standing to Suppress Evidence — Person Living in Searched Apartment Rented by Another: The defendant had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the apartment searched. He shared it with his girlfriend and except with respect to her had complete dominion and control over the apartment and could exclude others from it. The defendant had standing to contest the legality of a search and seizure within the apartment. St. v. Allen, 188 M 135, 612 P2d 199 (1980).

Constitutionality: Defendant cited no authority for his position that this subsection is unconstitutional and therefore failed to overcome the presumption of constitutionality. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Hearing — Requirements: "Hearing", as contemplated by this section, is a full judicial hearing with a record made. No "hearing" was held when the only record was the clerk's docket entry, notwithstanding the court's later statement that both parties had agreed to proceed without a court reporter. St. v. Fetters, 162 M 204, 510 P2d 1 (1973).

EVIDENCE OBTAINED PRIOR TO ARREST

Motion to Suppress Statements and Related Evidence — Waiver and Voluntariness — Applicability to Custodial Interrogation: The District Court granted a motion to suppress all statements made by defendant and any evidence obtained as a result of the statements, citing Smith v. Ill., 469 US 91, 83 L Ed 2d 488, 105 S Ct 490 (1984), as decisive of the suppression issue and supportive of the conclusion that defendant's request for counsel at his first interview barred further police interrogation. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Smith rule applied only to instances of custodial interrogation, while in this case defendant was not in custody or under formal arrest at the time he requested counsel. Further, the District Court never addressed the question of whether defendant's confession was voluntarily made; therefore, the case was remanded for hearing on the issues of waiver and voluntariness. St. v. Rorvik, 224 M 104, 728 P2d 419, 43 St. Rep. 2051 (1986).

No Warrantless Search Where Defendant Hands Over Murder Weapon: Where defendant was asked by police officers if a knife was involved in an altercation in which police officers were informed that defendant participated, and defendant answered "yes" and handed the knife to the police, no search by the police was involved and thus no warrantless search and seizure without consent was involved which would justify suppression of the knife. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981).

MOTION DENIED — LAWFUL SEARCH

Signed Arrest Warrant Listing Wrong Offense Considered Inconsequential and Ministerial — Arrest Pursuant to Valid Warrant — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Law enforcement executed a search warrant on Torgeson's residence in Mineral County and found a meth lab. Torgeson was charged in Mineral County with operating a clandestine drug laboratory and the District Court issued a warrant for Torgeson's arrest, but the warrant incorrectly named the charged offense as a violation of bail conditions. Torgeson was subsequently located in Missoula County. Missoula County officers verified the Mineral County charges and confirmed that a warrant was outstanding, and went to Torgeson's residence to arrest him. Torgeson was arrested based on the Mineral County warrant and was read his Miranda rights. A search of the residence revealed another meth lab. Torgeson moved to dismiss or suppress statements he made after being given the Miranda warnings because the arrest was based on an invalid arrest warrant from Mineral County. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Section 46-6-210 provides that a peace officer may arrest a person when the officer reasonably believes that a warrant for the person has been issued, and 46-6-204 provides that a warrant may not be dismissed because of technical irregularities that do not affect the person's substantial rights. Torgeson described no substantial right that was prejudiced by the erroneous charge stated in the Mineral County warrant. The warrant was in writing, was signed by a District Court judge, and was based on an existing felony charge of operating a clandestine drug laboratory. The name of the person to be arrested, the date of the charge, and the amount of bail were all correctly stated in writing, and a complete record of the proceedings leading to issuance of the warrant existed. The irregularity in the warrant did not affect Torgeson's substantial rights, and under these circumstances Torgeson was arrested pursuant to a valid warrant, so the motion to dismiss or suppress was properly denied. St. v. Torgeson, 2008 MT 295, 345 M 415, 191 P3d 448 (2008), distinguishing St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700 (1998).

Sufficient Probabilities Supporting Particularized Suspicion to Justify Investigative Stop — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: McMaster was stopped for investigation after an officer observed apparent traffic violations and erratic driving. The officer was called to make the stop following a police officer's observations of McMaster's possible drug trafficking activities at the Conrad Town Pump. McMaster moved to suppress the fruits of the search on grounds that the officer lacked particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The determination whether particularized suspicion supports an investigative stop does not deal with hard certainties, but rather with probabilities. In this case, McMaster was known by officers to be involved in drug deals, and his furtive conduct at the Town Pump led officers to believe that a possible drug deal was in progress. McMaster was identified as the probable driver of the vehicle through a personalized license plate and by physical description. This evidence, coupled with McMaster's apparent traffic violations and erratic driving, constituted sufficient particularized suspicion that McMaster was involved in criminal activity to justify the investigative stop. St. v. McMaster, 2008 MT 294, 345 M 408, 191 P3d 443 (2008). See also St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981).

Exigent Circumstances in Safety Sweep — Confession Related to Evidence Lawfully Seized Not Subject to Suppression: Officers arrested a suspect at Whisler's motel room, then entered the room in a safety sweep, where drugs were observed in plain view. Whisler was arrested and while at the detention center admitted possessing methamphetamine. Whisler contended that because the drugs were unlawfully seized at the motel room, the methamphetamine evidence should be suppressed as fruits of an unlawful search. However, exigent circumstances existed to warrant the safety sweep of the motel room, so the search was not unlawful, and because Whisler's admission did not stem from an unlawful search, the motion to suppress the methamphetamine evidence was properly denied. St. v. Whisler, 2008 MT 276, 345 M 292, 190 P3d 1098 (2008).

Sufficient Probable Cause for Search Warrant — Motion to Suppress on Grounds of Unreliable Sources Properly Denied: Tucker asserted that fruits of a search of his residence should be suppressed because the warrant application was insufficient to establish probable cause because police failed to corroborate information provided by two informants. The Supreme Court examined the information in light of St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000), and St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006), to determine the reliability of the informants. The first test is whether corroboration was required because the informants were anonymous, and in this case both informants were known to officers. The second test is whether the informants' information was based on hearsay, which requires corroboration, or on personal information. Here both informants had personal information of Tucker's activities. The third test is whether the informants were reliable. Neither informant was a confidential informant, but rather acted as concerned citizens, and the warrant application contained the necessary information to establish the reason for the informants' personal exposure to the evidence as well as their motivation for going to the police. Both informants were thus considered reliable, and any necessity for corroboration was satisfied. Therefore, the warrant application demonstrated the necessary probable cause, and Tucker's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Tucker, 2008 MT 273, 345 M 237, 190 P3d 1080 (2008).

Sufficient Objective Data to Justify Particularized Suspicion Warranting Investigative Stop on Remote Mountain Road Following Burglary: Deputies investigated a break-in and burglary at a cabin in a remote mountain area in winter. There were several cabins in the area, none of which were occupied, but the deputies discovered that another cabin had also been burglarized. The deputies confirmed that all access roads but one in the area were closed by snow. Items left outside the cabin indicated that the burglar would likely return to retrieve the items, so the deputies surmised that the burglar was probably still in the area. When Flemings was observed driving the only vehicle on the only accessible road later that night, a deputy stopped Flemings' vehicle. Flemings was arrested on an outstanding warrant in another county and subsequently made incriminating statements regarding the burglaries. With a warrant, officers searched Flemings' vehicle and residence and seized evidence related to the burglaries, and Flemings was charged with 10 counts of felony burglary, 7 counts of felony theft, 4 counts of misdemeanor theft, and 2 counts of misdemeanor mischief. At trial, Flemings moved to suppress all evidence and statements on grounds that the deputy lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop. The trial court denied the motion, and Flemings was convicted and appealed. The Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. Based on their experience and training, the deputies reasonably inferred that the burglary suspect was still in the area and would return to complete the theft. The deputies observed no other vehicles on the only accessible road. There were no businesses or occupied homes in the area, and there was no reason for persons to be in the area at night at that time of year. Thus, a deputy had sufficient objective data from which to infer that the driver coming down the road at 2 a.m. was or had been engaged in wrongdoing, resulting in a particularized suspicion justifying the investigative stop of Flemings' vehicle. St. v. Flemings, 2008 MT 229, 344 M 360, 188 P3d 1020 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Jarman, 1998 MT 277, 291 M 391, 967 P2d 1099 (1998), and St. v. Fisher, 2002 MT 335, 313 M 274, 60 P3d 1004 (2002).

Warrant Sufficient to Show Probable Cause That Crime Occurring Under Totality of Circumstances — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Wing asserted that evidence seized during a search should be suppressed because the search warrant was not supported by sufficient facts for a finding of probable cause. The trial court denied a motion to suppress the evidence, and Wing appealed. The Supreme Court applied the totality of circumstances test and affirmed. The warrant application contained a narrative account of a confidential informant's alleged controlled purchase of drugs from Wing and of Wing's subsequent arrest. Wing did not argue that the drug purchase was illegal or that it was improperly controlled by law enforcement officials. The warrant application provided facts sufficient to show that a crime was occurring and thus supported the issuance of the warrant, so the trial court did not err in denying Wing's motion to suppress. St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Particularized Suspicion to Confirm Identity of Vehicle Owner Based on Information From License Plate Search on Probationer's Vehicle: A Deputy Sheriff noticed a woman sitting in a vehicle parked in front of the residence of a known drug dealer who was on probation for drug violations. When the woman acted suspiciously, the deputy ran the vehicle's license plate through dispatch. Dispatch confirmed that the vehicle belonged to Thomas, who was also on probation. After 5 minutes, the deputy drove past the vehicle again, and the woman acted furtively. The deputy tried unsuccessfully to contact Thomas's probation officer to inquire about Thomas's status and then approached the vehicle to question the woman. The woman confirmed that she was Thomas and that she was on probation. The deputy returned to his car and successfully reached Thomas's probation officer, who informed the deputy that Thomas was not to have contact with any other person on probation and had recently failed a urinalysis test. The probation officer requested that the deputy search Thomas's vehicle, and the deputy found a drug pipe that later tested positive for methamphetamine. Thomas was charged with felony drug possession but moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was illegal because the deputy lacked particularized suspicion. The motion was denied, Thomas was convicted and appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. As an experienced officer, the deputy could reasonably infer that Thomas was engaged in some sort of criminal activity based on the fact that the deputy knew Thomas was on probation and that Thomas was observed parked in front of the residence of another probationer whom the deputy knew to be a drug dealer. This information, coupled with the deputy's knowledge of the drug history of the resident, comprised the totality of the circumstances and supported the determination that particularized suspicion existed for the deputy's initial investigatory stop of Thomas. Denial of the motion to suppress was affirmedSt. v. Thomas, 2008 MT 206, 344 M 150, 186 P3d 864 (2008), followed in St. v. Neil, 2009 MT 128, 350 M 268, 207 P3d 296 (2009).

Exigent Circumstances Sufficient to Justify Warrantless Search to Avoid Possible Destruction of Drug Evidence: Law enforcement officers were tipped off that defendant was transporting one-half pound of methamphetamine into the state and tracked defendant to another person's apartment in Corvallis. Officers began surveillance of the apartment and observed two individuals who appeared to be watching the officers. Within a minute, two persons left the apartment, and the officers concluded that their presence was known to persons in the apartment. Shortly thereafter, the officers received a call from an officer in Butte informing them that defendant had called an informant in Butte and told the informant that defendant knew he was being watched and asked the informant to come to Corvallis to help get rid of the drugs. The officers then discussed the possibility that defendant could destroy the drugs before a valid search warrant could be issued in 4 to 7 hours and decided to call for backup and enter the apartment. Upon entering, the officers found defendant and a woman present. Defendant had no drugs on his person, but had $1,500 in his wallet and appeared to be under the influence of methamphetamine. When the warrant eventually arrived, officers found 3½ grams of methamphetamine packaged for sale. Defendant was charged with felony conspiracy to commit criminal distribution of dangerous drugs, felony criminal possession with intent to distribute, felony criminal endangerment, and misdemeanor criminal possession of drug paraphernalia. Defendant pleaded not guilty to all charges and moved to suppress the fruits of the warrantless search. The motion was denied, and defendant was convicted on one confessed count of intent to distribute. On appeal, defendant contended that the warrantless search was unlawful, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The facts that the officers had already witnessed one suspect flee the scene, knew that defendant was aware of the officers' presence, and knew that a third party had been contacted to help defendant get rid of the drugs, combined with the knowledge that procurement of a search warrant would take 4 to 7 hours, established the presence of exigent circumstances sufficient to justify warrantless entry into the apartment to avoid destruction of the alleged one-half pound of methamphetamine. St. v. Ruggirello, 2008 MT 8, 341 M 88, 176 P3d 252 (2008), applying the exigent circumstances test set out in St. v. Stone, 2004 MT 151, 321 M 489, 92 P3d 1178 (2004).

Reasonable Cause for Warrantless Probationary Search — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Smith's live-in girlfriend was arrested on a probation violation for failing to report her change in residence and subsequently tested positive for drugs, which provided reasonable cause for her probation officer to conduct a warrantless search of her new residence—Smith's trailer. The search revealed weapons, drug paraphernalia, items used to manufacture and distribute drugs, and some of the girlfriend's personal items. The officer then decided to search a bus parked near the trailer, and while waiting for a warrant, Smith arrived. Based on the items found in the trailer and an officer's knowledge that Smith's driver's license was suspended, Smith was arrested and found to be in possession of a large amount of cash, drugs, and paraphernalia. More drugs and chemical precursors of methamphetamine were subsequently found in Smith's vehicle and in the bus. Smith moved to suppress all evidence obtained in the searches on grounds that the initial search was unlawful because it was not justified as a probation search or by any other exception to the warrant requirements, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the initial search was a probationary search of the residence of the woman living with Smith and was justified by reasonable cause and because Smith did not challenge the legality of the searches of his person and vehicles, the District Court did not err in determining that the searches were lawful and in denying Smith's motion to suppress the evidence. St. v. Smith, 2008 MT 7, 341 M 82, 176 P3d 258 (2008).

Investigation of Disorderly Conduct — No Expectation of Privacy in Backyard — Fruits of Warrantless Search Properly Admitted: Officers investigated a disorderly conduct complaint at Dunn's residence and found Dunn and six others partying in Dunn's backyard with loud music blaring. Dispatch indicated an outstanding warrant for Dunn, he was searched, officers found drugs and paraphernalia on Dunn's person, and Dunn was arrested. Dunn moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was an unlawful invasion of privacy. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to Whitefish v. Large, 2003 MT 322, 318 M 310, 80 P3d 427 (2003), two factors are considered when determining whether a search was unlawful: (1) whether the person had an actual expectation of privacy that society is willing to recognize as objectively reasonable; and (2) the nature of the state's intrusion. Given the unique circumstances of this case, Dunn did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy. The ongoing disorderly conduct invited officers to investigate the complaint. Blasting loud music at 4 a.m. was not conduct that society would be willing to recognize as objectively reasonable. The unobtrusive investigation by officers accessing the backyard by an open and unobstructed path that would be used by any casual visitor was reasonable. Dunn's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Dunn, 2007 MT 296, 340 M 31, 172 P3d 110 (2007).

Admissibility of Arson Evidence in Plain View Seized Under Exigent Circumstances — Warrant Required for Search for Other Evidence: A Deputy Sheriff responded to a fire call at Lewis's house and entered the building as part of fire suppression efforts. While inside, the Deputy Sheriff noticed evidence of possible arson. The Deputy Sheriff went back to his vehicle for a camera, reentered the building, photographed the evidence, and removed it, placing it in his vehicle. After the fire department arrived and suppressed the fire, the Deputy Sheriff reentered the building a third and fourth time to look for additional arson evidence. At trial, Lewis contended that all the evidence should be suppressed as fruits of unlawful warrantless searches. The trial court allowed introduction of evidence from the first entry because exigent circumstances existed to justify the Deputy Sheriff's entry, but the court denied admission of evidence gathered during the second and subsequent entries because exigent circumstances did not exist, holding that the Deputy Sheriff should have acquired a warrant for further investigative searches. The Supreme Court agreed that exigent circumstances surrounding the fire justified the first entry, but also held that the second entry was a continuation of the first and that evidence in plain view during the first entry could be lawfully seized and was admissible. However, a separate entry to search for or gather evidence pursuant to a criminal investigation requires a separate justification, such as a warrant, consent, or an exigency, and none of those justifications applied to the third and subsequent entries, so the motion to suppress evidence gathered during those searches was properly granted. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 295, 340 M 10, 171 P3d 731 (2007).

Companion's Activity at Defendant's Residence Sufficient to Justify Search of Defendant's Property: Officers obtained a warrant to search Barnaby's residence based in large part on informants' tips that Barnaby's companion, Sheridan, was operating a clandestine drug laboratory at the residence. Barnaby moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search warrant was insufficient because evidence of Sheridan's involvement in methamphetamine production did not establish probable cause to search Barnaby's residence. The Supreme Court cited Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 US 547 (1978), St. v. Gray 2001 MT 250, 307 M 124, 38 P3d 775 (2001), and St. v. St. Marks, 2002 MT 285, 312 M 468, 59 P3d 1113 (2002), for the proposition that the critical element in a reasonable search is not that the owner of the property is suspected of crime but that there is reasonable cause to believe that the specific things to be searched for and seized are located on the property to which entry is sought. Thus, corroboration of criminal conduct by Barnaby's companion, Sheridan, could be imputed to Barnaby, even though Sheridan's mere presence at the residence did not amount to probable cause to search Barnaby's residence. However, Sheridan's involvement in the production of methamphetamine and continued presence at Barnaby's house, coupled with two independent reports that Sheridan operated a drug lab at the house and a report of suspicious activity at the house since Sheridan's arrival, amounted to a substantial basis for determining whether probable cause supported the issuance of a warrant under the totality of the circumstances. The fact that the warrant application did not include a specific account of the circumstances under which some informants viewed the events or whether two citizens based their reports on personal observations did not preclude a court from finding probable cause. Sufficiency of the warrant was affirmed, and Barnaby's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006).

Voluntariness of Consent to Search — Totality of Circumstances: In determining whether consent to search was made voluntarily and was uncontaminated by coercion or duress, the Supreme Court considers the totality of the circumstances. In this case, Copelton was sitting in a car driven by Garcia, and when asked by officers if they could search the vehicle, Garcia shrugged his shoulders and gestured with his hands in an affirmative manner. The search revealed drugs, and Copelton was arrested for felony possession with intent to distribute. On appeal, Copelton asserted that his motion to suppress the fruits of the search should have been granted because Garcia did not knowingly and voluntarily consent to the warrantless search. A native of Mexico, Garcia had limited education with no instruction regarding the American legal system and a limited understanding of English. Copelton also noted that the officers did not inform Garcia of the right to refuse consent to the search and questioned whether a mere shrug of the shoulders was enough to indicate consent. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court affirmed. Garcia testified that he had prior experiences with law enforcement officers, including prior vehicle searches, that he clearly understood what the officer was asking when the officer requested to search the vehicle, and that he consented to the search because he had nothing to hide. Thus, Garcia's limited foreign education and limited ability to speak and understand English did not impede his ability to knowingly and voluntarily consent to the search. Further, lack of knowledge of the right to refuse consent is not determinative that consent was not voluntary in and of itself, and nonverbal consent can be effective when conduct indicates unequivocal consent. Under the totality of the circumstances, Copelton's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Copelton, 2006 MT 182, 333 M 91, 140 P3d 1074 (2006), following St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 269, 323 M 157, 99 P3d 191 (2004).

Admissibility of Liquor Bottle in Plain View During Officer's Attempt to Secure Vehicle When Suspect in Custody for DUI: After receiving a report of a suspected drunk driver, the investigating officer stopped Delao and placed him in custody in the patrol car. Upon securing the vehicle, the officer saw a clear bottle partially covered beneath the center armrest, which the officer recognized as a liquor bottle. The bottle contained vodka, which the officer confiscated and which was entered as evidence in Delao's DUI case. Delao moved to suppress the evidence as the fruit of an unlawful search, but the motion was denied. Following conviction, Delao appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The officer's attempt to secure the vehicle fell within the ambit of the slight duty of care owed to Delao under St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977), and neither the observation nor seizure of the bottle involved any privacy violation because the bottle was in plain view. The officer was lawfully present in the vehicle, and the incriminating nature of the bottle was immediately apparent. St. v. Delao, 2006 MT 179, 333 M 68, 140 P3d 1065 (2006).

Totality of Circumstances, Including Odor of Marijuana, Sufficient Probable Cause to Support Search Warrant: The Department of Public Health and Human Services received a call alleging that Morse was selling drugs in the presence of her juvenile daughter, and the local drug task force received two additional calls alleging that Morse was distributing drugs from her apartment. When police visited Morse's apartment, there were four other people there, all of whom had prior drug-related arrests, including Morse. The officers smelled marijuana and observed an empty electric digital scale in the living room. Morse refused a search of the apartment, so officers obtained a search warrant. In executing the warrant, the officers found drugs and paraphernalia. At trial, Morse moved to suppress the evidence based on lack of probable cause for the warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the totality of the circumstances and affirmed. The smell of marijuana did not in itself establish probable cause, nor did the telephone calls. However, when considered with Morse's drug history, the criminal backgrounds of the other four people, and the presence of the scale, the search warrant application established probable cause, and the motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Morse, 2006 MT 54, 331 M 300, 132 P3d 528 (2006).

Probable Cause for Warrantless Seizure of Vehicle — Odor of Marijuana Coupled With Defendant's Admission That Marijuana Had Been Smoked in Vehicle: Following a single-vehicle accident, the investigating officer discovered that Pierce had over $8,000 in outstanding warrants. Pierce was arrested and placed in the patrol car and then requested that the officer retrieve a telephone book from Pierce's vehicle. When the officer entered the vehicle, he noticed the strong odor of burnt marijuana. Pierce subsequently admitted that someone had smoked marijuana in the vehicle. The officer impounded the vehicle, sealing it with evidence tape. Following an alert by a canine officer 2 days later, the officer obtained a search warrant, discovered drugs and paraphernalia, and arrested Pierce on drug charges. Pierce contended that the state lacked probable cause to impound the vehicle and search it and moved to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court disagreed. The officer used the marijuana odor in conjunction with Pierce's admission that someone had unlawfully smoked marijuana in the vehicle to establish probable cause to seize the truck, and the affidavit for a warrant to search the vehicle contained sufficient information to support a reasonable belief that the offense of possession of dangerous drugs had been committed and that evidence or contraband might be found in the vehicle. Pierce's motion to suppress the evidence was properly denied. St. v. Pierce, 2005 MT 182, 328 M 33, 116 P3d 817 (2005), following St. v. Broell, 249 M 117, 814 P2d 44 (1991), and distinguishing St. v. Schoendaller, 176 M 376, 578 P2d 730 (1978), and St. v. Olson, 180 M 151, 589 P2d 663 (1979).

No Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Garbage Placed for Collection — Warrantless Search of Garbage Affirmed: Following an investigation of Pelvit and based on information that Pelvit was operating a methamphetamine lab, agents conducted a warrantless search of garbage cans in a public alley behind Pelvit's house and discovered discarded materials consistent with the manufacture of the drug. The items formed the basis for a search warrant of Pelvit's residence, pickup, and boat, where additional evidence was found. The state instituted forfeiture proceedings against the pickup, boat, and boat trailer. Pelvit moved to exclude the evidence, arguing that the warrant was not valid because it was based on an unlawful search of the garbage cans. The District Court held that Pelvit had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the garbage and denied the motion to suppress. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court held that Pelvit did not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his trash because he voluntarily relinquished his interest and control over his garbage when he abandoned the property with no express intent to exclude others. In abandoning the trash, Pelvit also abandoned any expectation of privacy in the property, and absent an expectation of privacy, there was neither a search nor a seizure in violation of a constitutionally protected interest. However, the Supreme Court did place certain constraints on the searching of garbage placed for collection, as set out in Litchfield v. St., 824 NE 2d 356 (Ind. 2005): (1) for such a seizure to be reasonable, the garbage must be quickly retrieved by officers in substantially the same manner as the trash collector would take it; and (2) in order to prevent wholesale or random searches, officers must have an articulable individualized suspicion that a crime is being committed in order to justify the garbage seizure. The circumstances in this case met the Litchfield constraints. The state met its burden of proving that Pelvit abandoned the trash, the seizure was conducted in a reasonable and unobtrusive manner, and police had a particularized suspicion that Pelvit was involved in criminal activity to justify the warrantless search. Denial of Pelvit's motion to suppress was not error. St. v. A Blue 1993 Chevrolet Pickup, 2005 MT 180, 328 M 10, 116 P3d 800 (2005), followed in St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 282, 345 M 330, 191 P3d 420 (2008).

Analysis of Federal Knock and Announce Statute — Involvement of Federal Postal Inspector: A postal inspector suspected that a package addressed to Ochadleus contained drugs. The inspector took the package to the Billings DEA office, and a drug-sniffing dog alerted to the package. The inspector obtained a search warrant, and the package was found to contain marijuana. The inspector then obtained a warrant to search the intended destination of the package. The package was delivered by the inspector later that day, and shortly thereafter, state officers executed the search warrant and arrested Ochadleus for possession with intent to distribute. Ochadleus contended that the state officers violated the federal knock and announce statute, 18 U.S.C. 3109, noting that the officers failed to knock. The Supreme Court disagreed. The statute does not directly apply to state law enforcement officers, but rather applies when federal officers are a significant part of a search conducted pursuant to a state warrant, as in this case involving a federal postal inspector and the federal Drug Enforcement Administration. Additionally, the statute does not contain an express requirement that officers actually knock on the door, but rather requires that officers give notice of their authority and purpose. Here, Ochadleus's roommate saw the officers through the window in the door and then backed away. It was reasonable for the officers to assume that the action of backing away was a refusal to admit them, and it would have been futile for the officers to knock before entering. Thus, the federal statute was not violated, the forced entry was lawful, and Ochadleus's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Ochadleus, 2005 MT 88, 326 M 441, 110 P3d 448 (2005).

No Expectation of Privacy for Trespasser — Entry Lawful and Warrantless Search Reasonable: Gilmore kept some belongings in a locked bedroom in Kathie Gilmore's house, and Kathie had no key to the room. Based on a tip from a confidential informant that marijuana plants had been observed in the window of the residence, officers requested and were given permission by Kathie to search the house without a warrant. Although she gave conflicting statements, Kathie stated that some of Gilmore's belongings were in the locked bedroom but he paid no rent, that Gilmore had previously assaulted her and that she was afraid of him, that she did not want him living in the house and had asked him to leave, and that she had no key to the room and advised the officers to kick down the door. Upon entering, the officers observed Gilmore asleep on the couch and drug paraphernalia in plain view. The officers then obtained a warrant and seized drugs and paraphernalia. Gilmore moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was unlawful because Kathie did not have authority to authorize entry into the locked bedroom and that Gilmore had an expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court found that in this case, the officers were acting under the appropriate authority of Kathie to consent to the search and denied the motion to suppress. The Supreme Court held that as a trespasser, Gilmore had no expectation of privacy in the bedroom. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004). See also St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683 (2000).

Investigatory Stop Based on Suspicion of Impersonation of Police Officer: Police stopped Bar-Jonah in the early hours of the morning near a school wearing a police-style jacket and stocking cap. The officer had prior knowledge of Bar-Jonah's history of crimes against children. Bar-Jonah asserted that he was simply walking a few blocks from his home, minding his own business, that the officer lacked a particularized suspicion of criminal activity to warrant the investigatory stop in violation of Bar-Jonah's right against unreasonable search and seizure, and that any evidence should thus be suppressed. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Relying on Fla. v. Bostick, 501 US 429 (1991), the District Court found that the initial stop was not an investigatory stop but merely a police-citizen encounter, but the Supreme Court held that the stop was not a mere police-citizen encounter because Bar-Jonah had no reason to believe that he could leave. Nevertheless, the officer reasonably suspected that Bar-Jonah had impersonated or was about to impersonate a police officer, and coupled with the officer's knowledge of Bar-Jonah's criminal history, the officer had a particularized suspicion of criminal activity warranting the investigative stop. Once Bar-Jonah was lawfully detained, a search of Bar-Jonah's person was justified based on Bar-Jonah's statement that he was carrying a stun gun. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Consent Justification for Warrantless Entry Into House — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Officers in pursuit of DeWitt following an aggravated burglary knew that DeWitt was staying with Bill Robinson. After arriving at Robinson's house, Robinson said that he has just arrived and did not know if DeWitt was there but granted the officers permission to search the house. The officers found DeWitt sitting in the dimly lit basement drinking a beer. DeWitt argued that the search was unlawful and that evidence obtained from the search should be suppressed because Robinson did not have the right to consent to a search of the part of the house that DeWitt was renting. The Supreme Court disagreed. The officers' entry into the house was consensual, and warrantless entry was justified, so denial of the motion to suppress was proper. St. v. DeWitt, 2004 MT 317, 324 M 39, 101 P3d 277 (2004).

Evidence of Motorcycle in Plain View Admissible: Officers in pursuit of DeWitt following an aggravated burglary found DeWitt's truck in another person's driveway, noticed a light on in the garage, and knocked on the door, which opened on impact. As soon as the door opened, officers noticed the smoke and odor of a two-stroke engine recently being started and surmised that DeWitt had been at the home and left on a motorcycle shortly before their arrival. DeWitt contended that the search of the garage was unlawful and that evidence obtained from the search should be suppressed. The Supreme Court disagreed. Evidence regarding the motorcycle was in plain view and fell within the plain view exception to the right against unreasonable search and seizure. St. v. DeWitt, 2004 MT 317, 324 M 39, 101 P3d 277 (2004).

Objective Manifestation to Support Investigation Following Traffic Stop — Time of Stop Extended: Following a traffic stop and observation of Nelson's behavior, officers conducted a DUI investigation, performed field sobriety tests and arrested Nelson for DUI, and then searched Nelson's car and discovered drugs and paraphernalia. Nelson contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because the officers did not give the stop advisory required in former 46-5-402 (repealed 2003) or a Miranda advisory and because the DUI investigation at the scene exceeded the scope of the investigative stop. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The stop advisory issue was not contested, and the Supreme Court declined to address it. Nelson was not entitled to a Miranda warning because the Miranda protections are afforded during a custodial interrogation but do not apply to an investigative stop. In addition, as in St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998), the initial investigatory stop took on the quality of an escalating situation in which additional information gave rise to further suspicions and enlarged the scope of the investigation to that of a possible DUI. The officers had a particularized suspicion to conduct the DUI investigation, properly extending the time of the stop. Although the Supreme Court has not established specific time parameters to which an officer must adhere when conducting an investigative stop, the 24 minutes taken to conduct the investigative stop in this case was reasonable and not excessive. St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 310, 323 M 510, 101 P3d 261 (2004).

Authority of Properly Appointed Substitute Justice of the Peace to Issue Search Warrant: A search warrant was issued by a substitute Justice of the Peace, and Beaupre contended that the fruits of the search should be suppressed because no attempt was made to call in another Justice of the Peace or City Judge and because the substitute was not properly appointed. The Supreme Court dismissed the claims. The regular Justice of the Peace had letters from judges in nearby cities indicating that they were not available should the Justice of the Peace be absent, and the letters were updated every 6 months in accordance with the Attorney General's recommendations in 48 A.G. Op. 11 (2000). Further, the substitute was timely designated during the second term of the regular Justice of the Peace, and incorrect wording on the waiver of training form was inconsequential and did not affect the authority of the substitute to act. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319 (1994), and St. v. Vickers, 1998 MT 201, 290 M 356, 964 P2d 756 (1998).

Information Provided by Citizen Informant — Sufficient Warrant Application: Beaupre contended that the fruits of a search should be suppressed because the warrant application was based on uncorroborated information provided by a confidential informant unknown to the officer who applied for the warrant and that the application was based on impermissible hearsay. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The informant was part of a cleaning crew hired by Beaupre to clean up damage after a fire at Beaupre's residence. During the cleanup, the informant observed drug paraphernalia and suspected drug lab materials, photographed the items, and gave the photographs to police. The informant remained confidential, but was not anonymous, and was acting as a concerned citizen. Questions regarding the informant's involvement and motivation were answered by the application and thus provided probable cause without further corroboration. The informant's information was not considered hearsay because the observations of fellow officers were a reliable basis for a warrant applied for by another officer. St. v. Beaupre, 2004 MT 300, 323 M 413, 102 P3d 504 (2004). See also St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950 (1989), and St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Admission of Unrelated Criminal Activity by Informant — Independent Corroboration Unnecessary: An informant who was known to police told the authorities that Meyer was in possession of illegal explosives after witnessing the explosives being delivered to Meyer. The informant admitted several instances of criminal activity, including use and possession of methamphetamine and being present when the explosives were delivered. Meyer sought to suppress evidence of the explosives because the informant's statements were not corroborated, the informant was not charged with transporting illegal explosives, and the drug charges were unrelated to the explosives investigation. The motion to suppress was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Independent corroboration is not required for a reliable informant whose identity is known to law enforcement and whose information is not based on hearsay, and an informant who gives an unequivocal admission against interest is considered reliable without further corroboration. Because corroboration was not necessary, the court declined to address whether admissions unrelated to the underlying offense may be classified as an admission against interest. St. v. Meyer, 2004 MT 272, 323 M 173, 99 P3d 185 (2004), following St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83 (2000).

Suspect's Conduct and Officer's Knowledge of Suspect's Criminal History Sufficient Probable Cause for Warrant to Search Vehicle for Drugs: When officers arrested Frasure on an outstanding warrant, Frasure acted jittery and nervous, spoke with choppy, accelerated speech, and was sweating. Based on their training, the officers knew Frasure's actions were consistent with a person under the influence of methamphetamine. The officers also knew from previous contact that Frasure was a methamphetamine addict who had previously been arrested for methamphetamine offenses. A pat-down search incident to the arrest revealed a marijuana pipe in Frasure's pocket. Frasure denied consent to search the vehicle that he was in when arrested, but the vehicle was impounded and a warrant was obtained to search the vehicle. The search revealed drugs and paraphernalia, and Frasure moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that there was insufficient probable cause for the search warrant. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers' knowledge and Frasure's conduct constituted sufficient evidence to support the officers' belief that Frasure had committed an offense, so sufficient probable cause existed to support the vehicle search, and denial of Frasure's motion to suppress was not erroneous. St. v. Frasure, 2004 MT 242, 323 M 1, 97 P3d 1101 (2004).

No Privacy Interest in Rental Car by Unauthorized Driver Who Disavows Ownership of Contents: Hill was stopped for speeding and ticketed. After the stop was completed, the officer engaged Hill in small talk, inquiring where Hill was going and where his traveling clothes were. Hill replied that it was a quick trip, so no extra clothes were needed. Although no bags or clothes were in sight, the officer asked if Hill was carrying anything illegal. Hill said no, and the officer asked if Hill would consent to a search of the vehicle, to which Hill initially consented. In going over the terms of the consent form, Hill related that the car had been rented by a friend and that a search of the trunk was probably not a good idea because Hill did not know what the friend might have placed there. The officer then checked on the origin of the car and discovered that it had been acquired through a rental agency, but that the car was 2 days late in being returned, and that Hill was not an authorized driver. The agency asked that the car be impounded and gave permission for a search. The officers found two bags in the trunk, but Hill disclaimed ownership of the bags. A search of the bags revealed drugs and Hill's cell phone charger. Hill was then charged with drug crimes and later moved to suppress the evidence, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Hill had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the car's contents because he was not an authorized driver, had no relation to the car's owner or renter, and voluntarily disclaimed knowledge and ownership of anything in the car. Hill could not expect privacy in a car he illegally possessed, and once Hill waived control over the bags, he implicitly granted permission for the bags to be accessed. The search of the trunk was reasonable because permission was granted by the car owner, and the trunk contents were effectively surrendered by Hill, making the car owner's permission to search the vehicle sufficient to permit a full search of items found in the car. St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), and St. v. Tackitt, 2003 MT 81, 315 M 59, 67 P3d 295 (2003).

Search Incident to Conversation After Traffic Stop Concluded Considered Voluntary — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Officers stopped Merrill for investigation following an improper lane change. A license plate check showed that Merrill was not the vehicle owner. However, the vehicle was owned by a person suspected by one of the officers to be involved with dangerous drugs. The officer told Merrill that he was just giving her a verbal warning and that she was free to go. Stepping away from the vehicle, the officer noticed that Merrill seemed unusually nervous. Suspicious about the report regarding the vehicle owner, the officer again approached the vehicle and asked Merrill if he could talk to her. Merrill answered affirmatively. The officer then asked if he could search the vehicle. Merrill again answered affirmatively. Merrill stepped out of the car, and the officer asked if he could search her person, including her pockets. Merrill again answered affirmatively, and the officer discovered drugs in her pocket. Merrill contended that she had been unlawfully detained subsequent to an investigatory stop and that the evidence should be suppressed. The trial court concluded that the search was voluntary and denied the suppression motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Once the officer completed the investigation of the improper lane change, the investigatory stop was concluded and Merrill was free to leave. What followed was neither a subsequent investigatory stop nor an extension of the first stop, but rather a voluntary exchange, and nothing prevents an officer from engaging a citizen in a voluntary conversation. A purely voluntary conversation intrudes on no constitutionally protected interest, so Merrill was accorded no constitutional protection related to the search and seizure, and denial of the motion to suppress was appropriate. St. v. Merrill, 2004 MT 169, 322 M 47, 93 P3d 1227 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2004 MT 184, 322 M 165, 94 P3d 752 (2004).

Threat of Cruelty to Animals Sufficient Exigent Circumstance to Justify Warrantless Entry of Probationer's Home — Entry Authorized by Probation Officer: Stone ran an animal zoo at his home. A neighborhood boy who assisted in feeding animals and cleaning cages notified authorities that some animals had died and that numerous others appeared to be without food or water. When officers arrived on Stone's posted property, they confirmed that numerous animals were dead and others had no food or water. Stone was not home, but the boy informed the officers that there were other animals in the house. The officers also learned that Stone was on probation and notified Stone's probation officer, who authorized entry into the house so that the animals inside could be cared for. Stone was convicted of animal cruelty and appealed on grounds that he had an expectation of privacy and that, although probable cause existed, the entry was unlawful because of the absence of exigent circumstances, so the evidence should have been suppressed. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court concluded that the unrefuted imminent threat to the lives and well-being of the animals and the prevention of needless suffering and death of the animals were adequate exigent circumstances to justify warrantless entry into the house so as not to frustrate legitimate law enforcement efforts in preventing animal cruelty. Having reasonable cause to suspect that Stone was violating probation by committing cruelty to animals inside the house, the warrantless entry was also considered a justifiable probation search, and denial of the motion to suppress was proper. St. v. Stone, 2004 MT 151, 321 M 489, 92 P3d 1178 (2004). See also Tuck v. U.S., 477 A2d 1115 (1984), St. v. Bauer, 379 NW 2d 895 (1985), Pine v. St., 889 SW 2d 625 (1994), and People v. Thornton, 676 NE 2d 1024 (1997).

Sufficient Particularized Suspicion for DUI Stop Based on Anonymous Tip and Officer's Observations: An officer received an anonymous tip that Brander was driving while intoxicated. The tipster named Brander, described the vehicle, including a license number and model, and gave Brander's direction of travel and suspected destination. The officer encountered a vehicle that mostly matched the description and followed, observing that the vehicle was moving slowly, meandering in its lane, crossing the fog line, partially crossing into the left lane without signaling, and then moving back into the right lane. The officer initiated a stop and noticed a number of cases of beer in the back of the truck that were both opened and unopened. Brander failed field sobriety tests and was arrested. Brander contended that the officer did not have reasonable grounds for making the stop based on the anonymous tip and moved to suppress the DUI evidence. The suppression motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Brander's argument failed because the stop was not based solely on the tip with no independent observation of suspicious activity. In fact, the officer was not even initially sure if the vehicle that he was stopping was the one described in the tip, but based on the officer's training and experience, the erratic driving supported a particularized suspicion that the driver was under the influence sufficient to warrant the stop and the administration of field sobriety tests. St. v. Brander, 2004 MT 150, 321 M 484, 92 P3d 1173 (2004), followed in St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005). See also Hulse v. St., 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998).

Sufficient Objective Police Data to Warrant Investigative Stop of Burglary Suspect — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: Following a tip from a former parole officer and a background check, Eixenberger became a potential suspect in a string of burglaries in Kalispell area casinos. Eixenberger had received two citations while driving a red Thunderbird in the area and became a primary suspect when the car was seen about 200 yards from a casino about 9 minutes before the casino was burglarized. The car was subsequently spotted several times, with either Eixenberger or a friend driving, during early morning hours when the burglaries occurred. One early morning, a casino was burglarized. Police checked Eixenberger's friend's residence and found neither Eixenberger nor the car and then stopped Eixenberger in the car a short distance from and within minutes of another casino burglary. Police found rocks and tools consistent with the burglaries. Eixenberger moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the police lacked a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the totality of circumstances in this case, the police had sufficient objective data to support a suspicion that Eixenberger was or had engaged in wrongdoing, so the investigative stop was appropriate. St. v. Eixenberger, 2004 MT 127, 321 M 298, 90 P3d 453 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lafferty, 1998 MT 247, 291 M 157, 967 P2d 363 (1998).

No Expectation of Privacy in Animal Cape Taken to Taxidermist: Bowman took an elk cape to a taxidermist for mounting, but the cape was seized without a warrant when wildlife officials received a tip that Bowman had taken the elk out of season. Bowman contended that the evidence should be suppressed because the search was unlawful. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that a determination of whether a search is lawful depends in part on whether a person has an actual expectation of privacy that society is willing to recognize as reasonable and that one factor in determining a legitimate expectation of privacy is the extent to which the person took measures to shield the property from public view. Here, any expectation of privacy that Bowman had in the cape was relinquished when, without taking any measures to preserve a claim of privacy, the cape was taken to a public business and placed in possession of a third party, even if the transfer was only temporary. St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004).

Warrants Based on Anonymous Tip Sufficiently Corroborated by Inculpatory Information — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: Wildlife officials received an anonymous tip that Bowman had taken an elk out of season and seized evidence at a taxidermy shop and at Bowman's home pursuant to two warrants. Bowman moved to suppress the evidence, contending that the warrant applications did not state probable cause. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. After receiving the anonymous tip, the wildlife officials obtained independent data that revealed inculpatory information corroborating the criminal conduct disclosed by the tip, which provided a substantial basis to determine that probable cause existed to issue the warrants. Bowman's motion to suppress was properly denied. St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004).

Reasonable Cause for Investigative Stop and Pat-Down Search — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Denied: An officer discovered a youth behind a car about 11 p.m., apparently working on the vehicle's license plate. The officer suspected that the youth was removing the plate, but when asked, the youth claimed to be installing it. The officer recognized the youth from prior law enforcement contacts and knew that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car. Based on these circumstances, the officer conducted a pat-down search and discovered a marijuana pipe. At about that time, the youth's girlfriend came out of the residence and told the officer that she had requested that the youth put the license plate on the vehicle. The youth later moved to suppress the drug paraphernalia on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion to make the investigative stop, exceeded the scope of the investigative stop, and did not have probable cause to conduct a frisk. The Supreme Court affirmed denial of the motion to suppress. Applying the two-part test from St. v. Gopher, 193 M 189, 631 P2d 293 (1981), the court held that the officer had sufficient objective data to form a particularized suspicion that the youth was engaged in wrongdoing to justify the investigative stop. Then, once the officer recognized the youth, suspicions were heightened, so the pat-down search remained within the context of the initial stop, and the officer did not exceed the scope of the stop. Finally, because of the officer's prior dealings with the youth and knowing that the youth did not live at the residence or own a car, the officer had reasonable cause: (1) to believe that the youth was committing an offense and might be armed; (2) for concern for the officer's safety; and (3) to conduct a frisk. The officer did not have to accept the youth's seemingly innocent explanation of why he was working behind the car late at night. In re D.R.B., 2004 MT 90, 320 M 516, 88 P3d 808 (2004). See also St. v. Collard, 286 M 185, 951 P2d 56 (1997), and St. v. Dawson, 1999 MT 171, 295 M 212, 983 P2d 916 (1999).

Use of DNA Sample From Unrelated Investigation Not Violative of Right to Privacy — Waiver of Privacy Upon Consent to Particular Search: Notti contended that the use of a DNA profile from an unrelated sexual assault case, in which he was convicted, violated the right to privacy on a subsequent charge of deliberate homicide. The argument failed because Notti had consented to the withdrawal of a blood sample to be used for DNA testing, and a defendant's voluntary consent to a search constitutes waiver of any reasonable expectation of privacy with respect to the place searched (or blood or DNA), and the permitted search is lawful. St. v. Notti, 2003 MT 170, 316 M 345, 71 P3d 1233 (2003). See also St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993).

Erratic Driving at Night in Proximity to Bars — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Traffic Stop: Shortly after midnight, an officer observed Loiselle's vehicle drifting across the right traffic lane, crossing the white fog line, making several turns without signaling, and weaving. The officer pulled Loiselle over for an investigative stop, which resulted in a DUI charge. At trial, Loiselle moved to suppress evidence obtained during the stop, but the motion was denied, and Loiselle appealed. To make an investigatory stop, an officer must have a particularized and objective basis for suspecting criminal activity, and whether particularized suspicion exists is a question of fact determined by considering the totality of the circumstances. In this case, the totality of the circumstances justified the stop. Loiselle did not merely touch the fog line, but actually drove over it and proceeded on the shoulder of the road for at least 3 seconds. The behavior was preceded by erratic driving that caught the officer's attention and that occurred late at night in the proximity of several nearby bars. Irrespective of Loiselle's failure to use turn signals, to a 5-year veteran of the Sheriff's office, there was sufficient objective data from which the officer could suspect that the occupant of the vehicle had engaged in wrongdoing and commence an investigatory stop. St. v. Loiselle, 2001 MT 174, 306 M 166, 30 P3d 1097 (2001).

Lack of Evidence That Investigating Officers Went Above High-Water Mark to Obtain Photograph of Marijuana Plant on Private Property — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: An anonymous caller informed the Rosebud County Sheriff's office that Mogen was growing marijuana on Mogen's private land abutting the Yellowstone River. A Sheriff's officer and a game warden traveled by boat down the river to begin surveillance operations. The officers did not have a search warrant or permission to be on Mogen's property, nor was the property posted along the river. The Sheriff testified that the game warden came along to identify and prevent trespass above the ordinary high-water mark, below which public access is allowed pursuant to Mont. Coalition for Stream Access, Inc. v. Curran, 210 M 38, 682 P2d 163, 41 St. Rep. 906 (1984). The officers used binoculars to view the suspected marijuana plant and took photographs of the plant from a point that they testified was below the ordinary high-water mark. Mogen moved to suppress the evidence, asserting that the officers must have crossed above the ordinary high-water mark, without an invitation or warrant, to observe and take the photographs in a portion of his property where he had an expectation of privacy and that the evidence was thus illegally seized. The District Court denied the motion to suppress. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding nothing in the record to indicate that the District Court's finding of fact was clearly erroneous or incorrectly applied. St. v. Mogen, 2000 MT 14, 298 M 87, 993 P2d 699, 57 St. Rep. 82 (2000), following St. v. Siegal, 281 M 250, 934 P2d 176, 54 St. Rep. 158 (1997).

Application for Search Warrant Signed by Deputy County Attorney of Another County — Search and Seizure Not Illegal if Any Irregularity Has Not Affected Substantial Rights of Accused — Exclusionary Rule Not Automatically Applied: The Deputy County Attorney of Lake County signed an application for a search warrant to be executed in Sanders County. The defendant moved to suppress all evidence seized as a result of the warrant. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court did not address the question of the authority of a Deputy County Attorney from one county to apply for a search warrant to be executed in another county. Because the warrant was sufficient under the constitution, the fact that the application for the warrant was signed by the Deputy County Attorney of another county did not affect the defendant's substantial rights under the constitution, the search and seizure was not illegal, and the evidence should not have been suppressed. The exclusionary rule should not be automatically applied when there is a technical violation of a statutory requirement. St. v. West, 1998 MT 282, 291 M 435, 968 P2d 289, 55 St. Rep. 1155 (1998).

Facts Provided by Nonconfidential Informant Self-Authenticating — Omissions and Misstatements Raised by Defendant Held Immaterial for Purposes of Determining Necessity for Franks Hearing — Issues Not Raised on Appeal Held Nonreviewable: Dotts was arrested for assault and disorderly conduct and, in the course of an interview with a detective, offered information on a marijuana-growing operation that was being run by Adams, in exchange for leniency on the charges. Dotts subsequently disclosed, without any commitments from the police, that Adams ran the marijuana-growing operation at a certain location, which Dotts himself helped establish, and that Adams and his son drove certain vehicles described by Dotts. The house and the vehicles were subsequently confirmed by detectives, a search warrant was obtained, a marijuana-growing operation was discovered, and Adams was arrested. Adams sought to suppress the evidence, arguing that a detective's statement in the warrant application that "Mr. Dotts asked for nothing . . . and I have offered him nothing . . ." in the way of leniency was untrue and that certain facts contained statements that were made by Dotts and that turned out to be incorrect. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255 (1992), and St. v. Kaluza, 272 M 404, 901 P2d 107 (1995), explaining that, unlike those cases, the case before it involved a nonconfidential informant whose identification was known to the police. Declining to follow a procedure urged by defendant Adams that would establish a policy of "zero tolerance" for intentional misstatements or omissions in applications for search warrants because the argument was raised for the first time on appeal, the Supreme Court followed the procedure outlined in Franks v. Del., 438 US 154 (1978), and applied in Montana in St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691 (1983), which requires a defendant to make a substantial showing that false statements were knowingly or intentionally made, requires the reviewing court to disregard any such statements, and then requires the court to determine if the remaining facts demonstrate probable cause. Following St. v. Garberding, 245 M 356, 801 P2d 583 (1990), and other cases, the Supreme Court found that the misstatements and omissions in the warrant application raised by Adams did not, in light of Dotts' admission against interest that he helped set up the marijuana-growing operation, cast doubt on the credibility of the other information given by Dotts. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that the misstatements and omissions were immaterial in determining Dotts' credibility and that, even if Dotts had been a confidential informant, the information that he gave was sufficiently corroborated to establish probable cause. Adams also raised the issue that the search warrant was overbroad, but relying upon St. v. Henderson, 265 M 454, 877 P2d 1013 (1994), the Supreme Court held that because the issue had been raised by Adams for the first time on appeal, the Supreme Court would not consider the issue. St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997), followed in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), and St. v. Worrall, 1999 MT 55, 293 M 439, 976 P2d 968, 56 St. Rep. 225 (1999).

Totality of Circumstances — Search Sustained on Legally Obtained Evidence Supporting Search Warrant — Evidence Gathered by Ruse Irrelevant: Detectives were informed by a previously reliable confidential informant that Holstine conducted a marijuana growing operation in his house in the Big Sky area. The information provided by the informant about the location and description of Holstine's home was independently verified by detectives. Posing as a skier, one detective then gained entrance to Holstine's home, and smelled marijuana smoke inside the home. The same detective also smelled growing marijuana near an outside corner of Holstine's home and observed a boarded window near the place where the informant had said the growing operation was located inside Holstine's home. A search warrant was obtained based upon all of the information gathered by the detectives. Marijuana plants were confiscated from Holstine's home, and Holstine was convicted of felony possession of marijuana. The Supreme Court held that under the "totality of the circumstances" test adopted by St. v. Campbell, 254 M 425, 838 P2d 427 (1992), and St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255 (1992), the information gained from the confidential informant, together with the testimony of the detective concerning the window and smell of marijuana from outside the residence, was sufficient information constituting probable cause to support the application for the search warrant. The information gained by the detectives by use of the skier ruse was of no value. St. v. Holstine, 260 M 310, 860 P2d 110, 50 St. Rep. 1063 (1993).

Informant's Tip and Record of Electricity Consumption — Probable Cause Readily Ascertainable: Electricity consumption records consistent with a marijuana growing operation that were presented to the reviewing judge in conjunction with an application for a search warrant, coupled with a statement of personal observation of the operation by a reliable informant, constituted a substantial basis for the District Court's conclusion that probable cause for issuing the warrant was readily ascertainable. St. v. Deskins, 245 M 158, 799 P2d 1070, 47 St. Rep. 1951 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Griggs, 2001 MT 211, 306 M 366, 34 P3d 101 (2001).

Electricity Consumption as Probable Cause: The defendant argued that the officer obtaining the search warrant had failed to set forth the average electricity consumption by marijuana growers and that therefore no probable cause existed to issue the warrant. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's issuance of the warrant on the basis that three separate locations on the defendant's property consumed more power individually than a family of four would consume. St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215, 47 St. Rep. 614 (1990).

Exclusionary Rule Not Extended to Investigative Subpoenas: The defendant argued that the officer obtaining the investigative subpoena had misread a warranty deed and alleged that the defendant had paid the sellers of his residence $10,000 in addition to his downpayment, when in reality the document stated that consideration of only $10 had been paid. The Supreme Court stated that the erroneous conclusions contained within the application did not invalidate the remaining information and declined to extend the exclusionary rule to investigative subpoenas. St. v. Baldwin, 242 M 176, 789 P2d 1215, 47 St. Rep. 614 (1990).

Informant's Tip — Admissions Against Interest: An investigating officer obtained a search warrant based on information from a self-admitted marijuana user. Before obtaining the warrant, the officer corroborated all the information through public records. A search of the respondent's residence resulted in the seizure of marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court reversed and held that there was probable cause to support the warrant. The affidavit supporting the warrant was sufficient not only under the "totality of the circumstances" test, but also because the informant admitted his marijuana use. Admissions of crime, like admissions against proprietary interests, carry their own indicia of credibility—sufficient at least to support a finding of probable cause to search. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988), followed in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Probable Cause — Informant's Tip — "Totality of Circumstances" Test — "Four Corners of the Warrant Application": An investigating officer obtained a search warrant based on information from a self-admitted marijuana user. Before obtaining the warrant, the officer corroborated all the information through public records. A search of the respondent's residence resulted in the seizure of marijuana plants and materials used to cultivate marijuana. The District Court granted respondent's motion to suppress the evidence. The Supreme Court reversed and held that there was probable cause to support the warrant. To determine whether there is probable cause to issue a search warrant, one must look only at information contained in the four corners of the application. The test for determining probable cause for issuance of a search warrant is the "totality of the circumstances" test set forth in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317. Legally unimpeachable findings of probable cause may rest upon evidence that is not legally admissible at the criminal trial itself. After-the-fact scrutiny by the reviewing court should not take the form of de novo review. St. v. Sundberg, 235 M 115, 765 P2d 736, 45 St. Rep. 2235 (1988), followed in St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991).

Informant's Tip — Aquilar-Spinelli and Gates Tests: A search warrant was based upon a tip from an informant (who was reliable in three previous tips), and part of the tip resulted in the seizure of marijuana from a car specifically described in the tip and that had apparently originated from the defendant's residence. There was sufficient probable cause to issue a search warrant for the search of the defendant's residence under the Aquilar-Spinelli test because there was sufficient "self-verifying" detail in the tip to inform the issuing magistrate of the circumstances underlying the informant's basis of knowledge and the informant's specific information, corroborated by the details concerning the automobile, was sufficient evidence of the informant's veracity. Since the stringent requirements of the Aquilar-Spinelli test were met, probable cause also existed under the "totality of the circumstances" test set forth in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213, 76 L Ed 2d 527, 103 S Ct 2317, 51 U.S.L.W. 4709 (1983). St. v. Erler, 207 M 88, 672 P2d 624, 40 St. Rep. 1915 (1983).

No Expectation of Privacy in Forest Service Campground: Defendant sought to suppress evidence seized from a Forest Service campground. The primary test for determining standing to challenge the legality of a search and seizure is "a legitimate expectation of privacy", although factors such as disclaimer of ownership and whether one is on the premises searched legitimately and the permanence of such presence are also factors. In this case, the defendant did not have an expectation of privacy and therefore had no standing to challenge the legality of the search. St. v. Dess, 201 M 456, 655 P2d 149, 39 St. Rep. 2231 (1982).

Blood Alcohol Test Found Voluntary: The admissibility of the results of the blood alcohol test in this case is not based on implied consent to the withdrawal of the defendant's blood under 61-8-402. Instead, it is based on the actual consent of the defendant, which he admits. The issue turns on whether the defendant's consent was voluntary or was coerced by psychological means. The court held that there was substantial evidence that the defendant's consent was free and voluntary and that the lower court committed no error in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the results of the blood alcohol test. St. v. Kirkaldie, 179 M 283, 587 P2d 1298 (1978).

Constitutionality of Burden of Proof: The Supreme Court held that the language "The burden of proving that the search and seizure were unlawful shall be on the defendant." from 46-13-302(4) is not unconstitutional. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Probationer Search Clause: Execution of a probationer search clause by law enforcement personnel, being instrumental in achieving the objectives of probation, is a proper condition of probation. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Standing to Challenge Constitutional Violations: The rule in Montana is that a defendant does not have standing to challenge violations of the constitutional rights of a codefendant or third party by law enforcement authorities. Furthermore, codefendant's consent to a search made it a lawful search. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Juveniles — Suppression of Statements and Evidence: In the trial of a juvenile for shooting a police officer, a motion for suppression of evidence, obtained under authority of a lawful inspection and statements voluntarily made, was erroneously granted. However, statements made after a waiver of counsel, which were void because of lack of counsel for the underaged defendant, were properly suppressed. St. v. District Court, 176 M 257, 577 P2d 849 (1978).

"Open Fields" Doctrine: Marijuana plants discovered in an old corral on unrestricted property were in an area not constitutionally protected from unreasonable search and seizure because of Montana's recognition of the "open fields" doctrine. St. v. Charvat, 175 M 267, 573 P2d 660 (1978).

Affidavit for Warrant — Informant's Oral Testimony to Establish Reliability: When an affidavit for a search warrant is wholly sufficient to establish probable cause but is based on hearsay from an untested informant, the reliability of that informant may be checked by a magistrate and the informant's oral testimony to the magistrate is not considered as supplementing probable cause to support the affidavit but merely as providing a direct test of the informant's reliability as to the hearsay contained in the affidavit. St. v. Thompson, 169 M 158, 545 P2d 1070 (1976).

Consent Valid When Defendant Arrested Previously: The defendant's consent to the search of his car was voluntary even though he had spent the night in jail and was still in custody because the defendant had previously been arrested and knew his rights. State ex rel. Kotwicki v. District Court, 166 M 335, 532 P2d 694 (1975).

Test of Voluntariness: Voluntariness is to be determined from the totality of the circumstances, and consent was voluntary under the circumstances of this case. State ex rel. Kotwicki v. District Court, 166 M 335, 532 P2d 694 (1975).

Search Without Warrant Based on Probable Cause: Police officers who had been given a description of an automobile and its occupants, who were suspected of having recently robbed a pharmacy, had probable cause to believe the vehicle was carrying stolen property, and evidence obtained in a search of the automobile without a warrant was admissible. St. v. Spielmann, 163 M 199, 516 P2d 617 (1973), distinguished in St. v. Amor, 164 M 182, 520 P2d 773 (1974), followed in St. v. Evjen, 234 M 516, 765 P2d 708, 45 St. Rep. 2096 (1988) (distinguishing U.S. v. Parr, 843 F2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1988)), and in St. v. McCarthy, 258 M 51, 852 P2d 111, 50 St. Rep. 420 (1993).

Lawful Inspection — Plain View: The Sheriff, who was called to search for a prowler, was justified under this section in seizing items in plain view during such search. St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Disclaimer — Evidence Admitted: Evidence discovered during a search of the house occupied by the defendant's mother was properly admitted on a charge of burglary since the defendant disclaimed any interest in the property recovered from the search and had no possessory interest in his mother's home. St. v. Dess, 154 M 231, 462 P2d 186 (1969).

Consent Following Miranda Warnings: When the appellant, convicted of robbery, had been given three Miranda warnings during the course of the investigation, evidence obtained from the appellant's apartment after he gave consent to the police to go there was not the product of an unlawful search and seizure. St. v. Braden, 154 M 90, 460 P2d 85 (1969).

Waiver of Right to Object:

When the defendant had taken the Sheriff to his house and turned over the alleged murder weapon to the Sheriff, there was no illegal search and seizure since the defendant voluntarily consented to turning over the rifle. St. v. Williams, 153 M 262, 455 P2d 634 (1969).

Any right which the defendant may have had to complain of a seizure at the time of his arrest was waived when he voluntarily surrendered the evidence to police officers upon request. St. v. Nelson, 130 M 466, 304 P2d 1110 (1956).

One consenting to a search of his premises without a warrant cannot complain that it was illegal. State ex rel. Muzzy v. Uotila, 71 M 351, 229 P 724 (1924).

UNLAWFUL SEARCH

Search of Residence on Permission of Minor Child Violative of Parent's Right to Privacy — Evidence Properly Suppressed — Exception: Police were dispatched to a residence in response to a report of a sexual assault on a young woman, who was discovered to be a minor. Following questioning in the living room, the girl led the police to her bedroom, where an alleged assault by her father had occurred. Because police believed that the minor had lawfully granted permission to search the residence, they seized items from the bedroom, including the sheets, comforter, and blanket from the bed and the victim's pajamas. They also had the victim change clothes so they could take possession of the underwear that the victim was wearing at the time of the alleged assault. The girl later signed a form granting permission to search the residence. The father's DNA was found on the bedding and he was charged with felony sexual assault. The father argued that the search and seizure were unconstitutional because they were conducted without his consent or a search warrant. The state contended that in a case such as this where the child granting entrance to the home was the possible victim of a sexual assault, a warrant was unnecessary. The District Court, citing St. v. Schwarz, 2006 MT 120, 332 M 243, 136 P3d 989 (2006), held that because the minor did not have actual authority to consent to a search, police were obligated to obtain consent from the parent or a search warrant prior to seizing items from the bedroom. Because neither consent nor warrant was obtained, the court suppressed all evidence seized from the house. The state appealed. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008), for the factors used to determine whether a state action constitutes an unreasonable or unlawful search or seizure: (1) whether the person challenging the state's action has an actual subjective expectation of privacy; (2) whether society is willing to recognize that subjective expectation as objectively reasonable; and (3) the nature of the state's intrusion. The court also noted that warrantless searches conducted inside a home are per se unreasonable, subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions, none of which were present here. The court affirmed the holding in Schwarz, holding that the child did not have authority to consent to the search of her parent's home. The focus was on the violation of the privacy rights of the parent in control of the home, not the general privacy rights of the child, except where, as with the underwear the victim was wearing during the alleged assault, society would recognize as reasonable a person's privacy interest in the intimate apparel that she was wearing at the time. Therefore, the evidence seized from the residence must be suppressed because it was the product of an illegal search and seizure, with the exception of the daughter's underwear, because the father did not have an actual subjective expectation of privacy in the underwear that his daughter was wearing at the time the alleged assault occurred that society would find objectively reasonable. The District Court did not err in granting the motion to suppress all the evidence, with the exception of the underwear. The case was remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Ellis, 2009 MT 192, 351 M 95, 210 P3d 144 (2009).

Admissibility of Evidence From Independent Source Following Illegal Warrantless Search: Deputies conducted an illegal warrantless search that resulted in defendant receiving a minor in possession charge. Immediately after the illegal entry, defendant began defiantly chugging alcohol in the deputies' presence. Nevertheless, defendant contended that evidence of the alcohol possession should have been suppressed because the search was illegal. The District Court denied the suppression motion, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Evidence is admissible notwithstanding a search violation when the evidence is obtained from an independent source. By continuing to consume alcohol after the warrantless entry, defendant provided deputies with an independent source for evidence that was excluded from the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, and the evidence was properly admitted. In re B.A.M., 2008 MT 311, 346 M 49, 192 P3d 1161 (2008). See also St. v. Ottwell, 239 M 150, 779 P2d 500 (1989), St. v. Courville, 2002 MT 330, 313 M 218, 61 P3d 749 (2002), and St. v. Rookhuizen, 2007 MT 312, 340 M 148, 172 P3d 1257 (2007).

Admissibility of Arson Evidence in Plain View Seized Under Exigent Circumstances — Warrant Required for Search for Other Evidence: A Deputy Sheriff responded to a fire call at Lewis's house and entered the building as part of fire suppression efforts. While inside, the Deputy Sheriff noticed evidence of possible arson. The Deputy Sheriff went back to his vehicle for a camera, reentered the building, photographed the evidence, and removed it, placing it in his vehicle. After the fire department arrived and suppressed the fire, the Deputy Sheriff reentered the building a third and fourth time to look for additional arson evidence. At trial, Lewis contended that all the evidence should be suppressed as fruits of unlawful warrantless searches. The trial court allowed introduction of evidence from the first entry because exigent circumstances existed to justify the Deputy Sheriff's entry, but the court denied admission of evidence gathered during the second and subsequent entries because exigent circumstances did not exist, holding that the Deputy Sheriff should have acquired a warrant for further investigative searches. The Supreme Court agreed that exigent circumstances surrounding the fire justified the first entry, but also held that the second entry was a continuation of the first and that evidence in plain view during the first entry could be lawfully seized and was admissible. However, a separate entry to search for or gather evidence pursuant to a criminal investigation requires a separate justification, such as a warrant, consent, or an exigency, and none of those justifications applied to the third and subsequent entries, so the motion to suppress evidence gathered during those searches was properly granted. St. v. Lewis, 2007 MT 295, 340 M 10, 171 P3d 731 (2007).

Suspect Interrogated in Home Without Miranda Warning — Motion to Suppress Improperly Denied: Following a lead of methamphetamine use at Munson's home, detectives went to the home and, without giving Munson a Miranda warning, questioned Munson for 1 ¾ hours before Munson confessed to possessing methamphetamine paraphernalia. Munson was arrested for criminal possession of dangerous drugs and paraphernalia, and at trial, Munson moved to suppress the evidence and statements made to the officers, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The officers created a custodial atmosphere, and Munson's freedom of action was significantly restricted. Under the totality of the circumstances, a reasonable person in Munson's position would not have felt free to terminate the interview and leave or to ask the officers to leave, so for purposes of Miranda, Munson was in custody and subjected to an interrogation. Therefore, failure of the officers to give Munson a Miranda warning rendered Munson's statements inadmissible. Because Munson's consent to a search was not given freely and without duress or coercion, all evidence seized under the guise of consent was also inadmissible. St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007), following St. v. Osteen, 216 M 258, 700 P2d 188 (1985), and St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355 (1994).

Knock and Announce Rule — Exigent Circumstances Exception — Futility Exception — Warrant Requirements: Without knocking and announcing its presence, a SWAT team broke down the doors of a rental home, discovered a methamphetamine lab, and arrested the occupants, including Anyan. Anyan contended that the entry was illegal and that evidence seized should be suppressed. Following a guilty plea, Anyan appealed on grounds of the illegality of the no-knock entry. Absent state statutory or case law, the Supreme Court examined extensive federal precedent, concluding that pursuant to the right of privacy and the right to be free from illegal search and seizure, an officer serving a search warrant must comply with the knock and announce requirement unless there are exigent circumstances that would present a threat of physical violence or the likelihood that evidence would be destroyed. Mere suspicion or evidence that firearms are present in the residence or that a particular resident is armed is not sufficient to create an exigency; rather, there must be specific information to lead the officer to a reasonable conclusion that the presence of firearms raises a concern for officer safety. Another exception to the knock and announce requirement, known as the futility exception, arises when police have a reasonable suspicion that the occupants know of the police presence and purpose prior to entry and that knocking and announcing would be futile. In addition, the decision to make a no-knock entry should ordinarily be made by a neutral and detached magistrate as part of the application for a search warrant, along with any foreknown exigent circumstances justifying a no-knock entry, but an investigating officer may make the decision if unexpected exigent circumstances arise at the scene. The knock and announce rule is flexible, and courts must determine whether an unannounced entry was reasonable under the particular circumstances of each case, including the time that an officer must wait prior to forced entry. However, unless exigent circumstances exist, the failure of officers to knock and announce their presence renders evidence procured during execution of the search warrant inadmissible. Thus, the officers' no-knock entry into Anyan's house violated federal and state constitutional rights to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and failure of the District Court to suppress the evidence seized during the search was reversible error. St. v. Anyan, 2004 MT 395, 325 M 245, 104 P3d 511 (2004), followed in St. v. Ochadleus, 2005 MT 88, 326 M 441, 110 P3d 448 (2005), in which the Supreme Court reiterated that no-knock entry into a residence is the exception and not the rule. The Anyan futility exception was also applied in St. v. Hill, 2008 MT 260, 345 M 95, 189 P3d 1201 (2008), where officers responding to a domestic disturbance call did not knock but announced their presence through the open door of a trailer and observed defendant moving aggressively toward the back of the trailer, but defendant ignored their order to stop. The officers had a reasonable suspicion that the trailer occupants knew of their presence and purpose prior to entry. A woman screaming in the trailer indicated an ongoing domestic disturbance, and continuing to wait at the open door after defendant failed to respond would have been superfluous, futile, and dangerous.

Transient Party Guest's Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Host's Bathroom During Warrantless Search — Community Caretaker Doctrine Inapplicable: When officers executed a warrantless search of Tash's apartment based on a complaint of a loud party, Smith, an 18-year-old transient party guest, was in the bathroom vomiting. An officer opened the closed bathroom door, smelled what was believed to be an intoxicating substance, concluded that Smith was intoxicated, and charged Smith with being a minor in (former?) possession of alcohol. Smith moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the search was illegal and that the officer violated Smith's expectation of privacy in Tash's bathroom. The state contended that Smith lacked the requisite standing to challenge the officers' initial entry into the apartment because Smith was a guest and had no reasonable expectation of privacy in the common rooms of the apartment. Applying the factors in St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004), the Supreme Court agreed with the state. The state also argued that an officer's intrusion into the closed bathroom was justified under the community caretaker doctrine. On this point, the Supreme Court reversed. The community caretaker doctrine stands for the proposition that officers have a duty to investigate uncertain situations in order to ensure public safety, but the facts in this case did not warrant the officer's intrusion absent objective, specific, articulable facts supporting a conclusion that Smith was in need of officer assistance. Smith had a legitimate expectation of privacy in Tash's bathroom and was entitled to constitutional privacy protections. St. v. Smith, 2004 MT 234, 322 M 466, 97 P3d 567 (2004), followed, with regard to a guest's lack of standing to challenge a search of common areas of another person's apartment, in St. v. Redlich, 2004 MT 235, 322 M 476, 97 P3d 1090 (2004), and St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 282, 345 M 330, 191 P3d 420 (2008).

Lack of Exigent Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Search of Fanny Pack — Motion to Suppress Evidence Properly Granted: After Lanegan was arrested for obstructing a peace officer and handcuffed, the officer proceeded to conduct a warrantless search of Lanegan's fanny pack and discovered drugs and drug paraphernalia. Lanegan was then charged with drug crimes. Lanegan moved to suppress the evidence, and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A search incident to arrest may be conducted under the conditions in 46-5-102, but in this case, none of the conditions were present. The search would not have protected the officer or prevented Lanegan's escape because Lanegan was already handcuffed, nor would the search have resulted in discovery of anything that could have been used in or fruits of the crime of obstructing a peace officer. Warrantless searches are per se unreasonable, but one exception is when there are exigent circumstances that would cause a reasonable person to believe that prompt action is necessary to prevent physical harm, destruction of relevant evidence, escape, or some other consequence improperly frustrating legitimate law enforcement efforts. However, the search in this case did not rise to the level of exigent circumstances to allow a warrantless search, and the motion to suppress was properly granted. St. v. Lanegan, 2004 MT 134, 321 M 349, 91 P3d 578 (2004).

Reasonable Expectation of Privacy in Lost Wallet — Evidence Obtained From Search of Lost Wallet Subject to Suppression: Hamilton's lost wallet was turned into the Bozeman police, who opened it to determine ownership. In doing so, the police discovered prescription drugs. Hamilton confessed that the drugs were not prescribed for her, and she was arrested and convicted. On appeal, Hamilton asserted that she retained an expectation of privacy in the lost wallet and that the fruits of the search of the wallet should be suppressed. The Supreme Court agreed. In determining whether an unlawful search of the wallet occurred, the court applied St. v. Scheetz, 286 M 41, 950 P2d 722 (1997), looking at whether Hamilton had an actual expectation of privacy that society was willing to recognize as objectively reasonable and at the nature of the state's intrusion. When a person intentionally abandons property, the expectation of privacy is abandoned as well. However, when property is not intentionally or voluntarily abandoned, the expectation of privacy remains substantially intact. Thus, Hamilton's expectation of privacy was diminished only to the extent necessary for the police to determine ownership. The police search exceeded what was necessary to determine ownership of the wallet and was not justified by any exception to the warrant requirements. Therefore, the warrantless search was illegal, and the evidence obtained as a result of the search should have been suppressed. Hamilton's conviction was reversed. St. v. Hamilton, 2003 MT 71, 314 M 507, 67 P3d 871 (2003).

Justifiable Stop for Daytime Check of Temporary Window Sticker Warranted — Further Police Intrusion Not Warranted Once Limited Purpose of Stop Accomplished: Following weeks of surveillance instigated by a confidential tip intimating drug activities, the Billings police observed no suspicious drug-related activities conducted by defendants, but after receiving a tip that defendants would be driving from Billings to Bozeman to sell marijuana, officers stopped defendants' vehicle because there were no license plates displayed, although a temporary sticker could be seen but not read in the tinted rear window. When the officers approached the vehicle, they noticed that the temporary sticker properly displayed in the window was current. Nevertheless, in a short time, additional officers arrived with a drug-sniffing dog. The dog indicated the presence of drugs, the vehicle was searched, marijuana was found, and defendants were arrested. Defendants contended that the evidence should be suppressed because there was no particularized suspicion to make the stop. The Supreme Court agreed that the investigative stop was warranted because the officers' inability to read the expiration date on the temporary sticker provided an objective basis to infer that the sticker was not valid. However, a quick check of the properly displayed sticker in bright daylight confirmed the sticker's validity. Defendants had committed no traffic offense or violated any other criminal law of which the officers were aware. An investigative stop is a temporary detention that may not last longer than necessary to effectuate the purpose of the stop. Once the limited purpose of the investigative stop was accomplished, no further police intrusion was warranted, and the investigative stop related to drug possession was not justified. The District Court committed reversible error in refusing to suppress the evidence of the subsequent vehicle search. St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003), following St. v. Henderson, 1998 MT 233, 291 M 77, 966 P2d 137 (1998). See also St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Absence of Exigent Circumstances — Warrantless Search Unjustified: Logan was one of two passengers in a vehicle that was stopped for failure to have the rear license plate illuminated. The officer recognized the driver, who had a history of carrying weapons and of violence toward police officers, and called for backup. The officer then approached the vehicle but did not smell or observe any illegal drugs or drug paraphernalia or observe any behavior that led the officer to believe that anyone in the vehicle was under the influence of drugs. After obtaining identification from the driver and passengers, the officer ran a check for outstanding warrants on all the parties and learned that all three persons had past drug arrests and that an extreme officer caution alert was in effect for the driver. The officer then called for another officer who had a drug-sniffing dog. The dog alerted to the passenger-side door of the car, and the officer removed a purse from the back seat containing drug paraphernalia and a paper bindle. The dog entered the vehicle and indicated additional drugs. Logan was subsequently arrested for possession of dangerous drugs but moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the officer did not have a particularized suspicion of the presence of drugs to support a canine sniff search of the vehicle. The Supreme Court agreed. In St. v. Elison, 2000 MT 288, 302 M 228, 14 P3d 456 (2000), the Supreme Court held that there is no automobile exception to constitutional search warrant requirements and that the mobility of a vehicle, without more, is not sufficient to justify a warrantless search. In addition to particularized suspicion, a warrantless search of a vehicle requires probable cause and a generally applicable exception to the warrant requirement, such as plain view search, a search incident to arrest, or exigent circumstances, which was the only applicable exception at issue here. The District Court held that the exigent circumstance in this case was that allowing Logan to reenter the vehicle to retrieve the purse would have provided the opportunity to destroy the evidence. However, the officer testified that there was nothing that prevented obtaining a search warrant, and that testimony itself belied the fact that exigent circumstances existed. Because the state failed to meet the heavy burden of proving exigent circumstances, the District Court erred in denying Logan's motion to suppress, so the case was reversed. St. v. Logan, 2002 MT 206, 311 M 239, 53 P3d 1285 (2002).

Invalid Third-Party Consent to Warrantless Search of Private Residence — Consenting Party to Have Actual Authority to Consent to Search: A warrantless search conducted inside a home is per se unreasonable, subject to only a few exceptions, one of which is when the search is conducted pursuant to consent that is freely and voluntarily given. The state may justify a warrantless search by showing that permission was obtained from defendant or from a third party who possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effect sought to be inspected, but the state has the burden of showing that consent was voluntary. However, for third-party consent to be valid, the consenting party must have actual authority to consent, as opposed to apparent authority. In the present case, McLees lived with his father, Scott, in an apartment owned by his grandfather, Earl, and investigating officers obtained Earl's voluntary consent before searching the residence. The District Court held that Earl had common authority to consent to the search and denied McLees' motion to suppress incriminating evidence found in the search. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under U.S. v. Matlock, 415 US 164, 39 L Ed 2d 249, 94 S Ct 988 (1974), common authority may not be implied from the mere property interest of a third party in the property to be searched. Rather, the authority that justifies third-party consent rests on the mutual use of the property by persons having joint access or control for most purposes. Here, the record was insufficient to show that Earl had common authority over McLees' apartment. Earl never went to the apartment unless Scott was there. Earl did not have free access to and was not a cohabitant of the apartment and did not share in its use. The fact that Earl owned the property was not dispositive when McLees had a reasonable expectation of privacy by living there. Earl therefore did not have a sufficient relationship with the apartment that would give him actual authority to consent to a warrantless search. While declining to address whether the seized evidence was admissible under the independent source rule or the inevitable discovery rule, the Supreme Court held that it was inadmissible under the third-party consent rule and reversed for further proceedings. St. v. McLees, 2000 MT 6, 298 M 15, 994 P2d 683, 57 St. Rep. 25 (2000), following St. v. Sorenson, 180 M 269, 590 P2d 136 (1979), St. v. Lopez, 896 P2d 889 (Hawaii 1995), and St. v. Hubbel, 286 M 200, 951 P2d 971, 54 St. Rep. 1373 (1997), distinguishing Ill. v. Rodriguez, 497 US 177, 111 L Ed 2d 148, 110 S Ct 2793 (1990), and followed, with regard to third-party authority to consent to search, in St. v. Gilmore, 2004 MT 363, 324 M 488, 104 P3d 1051 (2004), and St. v. Lacey, 2009 MT 62, 349 M 371, 204 P3d 1192 (2009).

No Particularized Suspicion — Stop Illegal — Evidence Suppressed: At 3:30 a.m. on a cold morning in a high-crime area, a police officer who was searching for a participant in a domestic disturbance observed defendant talking on a pay phone. When the police officer drove back by the phone, the phone was off the hook and defendant was gone. When he spotted defendant leaving a parking lot in the area, the police officer made a traffic stop and discovered a knife in plain view on the front seat of the car and illegal drugs and a gun on defendant's person. Defendant moved to suppress all the evidence. The District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court reversed. A person's presence in a high-crime area does not alone give the police a particularized suspicion to stop the person. The facts did not rise to the level of a reasonable and articulable suspicion that defendant was, had been, or was about to engage in criminal activity. Because the stop was illegal, all evidence must be suppressed. St. v. Jarman, 1998 MT 277, 291 M 391, 967 P2d 1099, 55 St. Rep. 1133 (1998), distinguished in St. v. Flemings, 2008 MT 229, 344 M 360, 188 P3d 1020 (2008).

Warrantless Search of Home — Voluntary Consent — Totality of Circumstances Test: Warrantless searches and seizures conducted inside a home are per se unreasonable, subject only to a few carefully drawn exceptions, including instances in which a citizen has knowledgeably and voluntarily consented to a search. In order for consent to be voluntary, it must be uncontaminated by any duress or coercion, express or implied, as determined by the totality of the circumstances. In this case, defendant was told that he was not required to consent to the search, but that factor was not controlling. Other circumstances mitigating against voluntariness included: (1) the fact that defendant had made a highly incriminating admission that was extracted improperly without Miranda warnings after entry to the home was gained without a warrant; (2) coercion arising from the fact that defendant was promised that if consent was given for the search, he would not be arrested or incarcerated, which constituted an implication that if cooperation was not given, incarceration would result; and (3) a statement by the investigating officer that if consent was not given, officers would remain in the house for a number of hours until a search warrant was obtained. Based on the totality of the circumstances, defendant's consent was coerced rather than given freely and voluntarily and evidence obtained during the subsequent search was inadmissible. St. v. Rushton, 264 M 248, 870 P2d 1355, 51 St. Rep. 262 (1994), following Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 US 218, 36 L Ed 2d 854, 93 S Ct 2041 (1973), and followed in St. v. Doyle, 1998 MT 195, 290 M 287, 963 P2d 1255, 55 St. Rep. 819 (1998), St. v. Wetzel, 2005 MT 154, 327 M 413, 114 P3d 269 (2005), and St. v. Shults, 2006 MT 100, 332 M 130, 136 P3d 507 (2006).

Elements of Intimidation Present in Threat to Third Party — Probable Cause for Search: Defendant intimidated victims by pointing a gun at them in his car. Defendant also indicated the presence of another weapon in the trunk of the car and indicated his intention to use it to harm a third party. Victims viewed a second gun in the trunk but were not directly threatened with it. The District Court suppressed evidence found in the trunk after finding a sufficient nexus did not exist for probable cause because defendant gave no indication he intended to use the gun in the trunk to intimidate victims and because the second gun was not alleged to be contraband. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that defendant produced a fear in the victims that he intended and had the ability to harm the third party, constituting intimidation, and that viewing of the gun in the trunk established sufficient probability to authorize a search of the trunk. St. v. Hembd, 235 M 361, 767 P2d 864, 46 St. Rep. 55 (1989).

Evidence Not Suppressed as "Fruit of the Poisonous Tree": A Deputy Sheriff illegally seized a bag of marijuana from the passenger compartment of defendant's vehicle after his arrest on DUI charges. The court held that this illegal search did not taint the subsequent legal seizure of cocaine in the vehicle or the seizure of marijuana found under the chair occupied by defendant in the Sheriff's office. There was knowledge independent of the illegal search that supported probable cause, thus the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine did not bar admission of the seized evidence. St. v. Pearson, 217 M 363, 704 P2d 1056, 42 St. Rep. 1253 (1985).

Unauthorized Recording of Telephone Call — Third Person's Right to Privacy Invaded: Recording of telephone conversation by police undercover officer of a call received from an acquaintance of defendant setting up a drug sale did not taint all evidence against defendant even though the recording was not authorized by court order. The undercover officer personally contacted police regarding the setting up of the drug buy which resulted in defendant's conviction. Furthermore, a defendant cannot invoke a breach of right of privacy of his acquaintance; he must assert his own privacy rights. The recording was not introduced into evidence, but the undercover officer testified concerning it. St. v. Hanley, 186 M 410, 608 P2d 104 (1980).

Fruits of Involuntary Confession: The defendant's confession was obtained involuntarily. Under the "fruit of the poisonous tree" doctrine, evidence obtained as a result of an involuntary confession must be suppressed unless: (1) the evidence is attenuated from the constitutional violation so as to remove its primary taint; (2) the evidence is obtained from a source independent of the defendant's confession; or (3) it is inevitable that the evidence would have been discovered apart from the defendant's confession. The Supreme Court found that none of the exceptions applied and that the evidence should have been suppressed. St. v. Allies, 186 M 99, 606 P2d 1043 (1979).

Requirements for Electronic Surveillance: Under Title III of the Federal Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, states are required to have a specific statutory scheme for electronic surveillance before public officials can lawfully monitor oral and wire communications in the state. If a state chooses to allow electronic surveillance by adopting a statutory scheme, the scheme must be at least as or more restrictive than the regulations of Title III. Montana statutes 45-8-213, defining the offense of violating privacy in communications, and 46-5-202 (renumbered 46-5-221), setting forth the grounds for issuance of a search warrant, fail to meet the minimum requirements of Title III or the standard enumerated by the U.S. Supreme Court in the Berger and Katz decisions. Among other things, Montana's statutes fail: (1) to require a showing of exigent circumstances to overcome the defect of not giving prior notice; (2) to state what items of information should be included in the application for a warrant; and (3) to outline the general procedures by which law enforcement officials obtain warrants for electronic surveillance. In St. v. Brackman (since overruled in St. v. Brown, 232 M 1, 755 P2d 1364, 45 St. Rep. 818 (1988)), the court held that in view of Montana's constitutional right of privacy, law enforcement officials must first obtain a warrant before intercepting any communication. This will no longer suffice, since the requirements of Title III are not met. Any evidence seized by electronic surveillance must be suppressed since Montana's statutory scheme for allowing such surveillance does not meet the federal requirements. St. v. Hanley, 185 M 459, 605 P2d 1087 (1979), followed in St. v. Lynch, 1998 MT 308, 292 M 144, 969 P2d 920, 55 St. Rep. 1278 (1998). Lynch was followed in St. v. Pizzichiello, 1999 MT 123, 294 M 436, 983 P2d 888, 56 St. Rep. 499 (1999).

Suspicion of Officer Insufficient for Probable Cause: Evidence obtained when officers stopped a vehicle on the pretext of a traffic violation and arrested the defendant without probable cause was properly suppressed. Suspicion of an officer alone, unsubstantiated by some evidence upon which to base a belief that a crime is or has been committed, is not enough to establish probable cause, no matter what the subsequent search discloses. St. v. Rader, 177 M 252, 581 P2d 437 (1978).

Parking Meter Violation — Unlawful Search — Ordinance Unconstitutional: The search of the defendant's person under a warrant of arrest issued by a police magistrate for a parking meter violation was an unreasonable search since evidence at a suppression hearing did not disclose any basis for a mandatory custodial arrest. Furthermore, the city ordinance involved was unconstitutional to the extent that it precluded the defense that the defendant was not driving the vehicle when the parking violation occurred, depriving him of due process. St. v. Jetty, 176 M 519, 579 P2d 1228 (1978).

Odor of Marijuana — Not Probable Cause: A police officer's detection of the odor of marijuana emanating from inside an automobile, absent evidence of visible content, was insufficient probable cause for a warrantless search and subsequent arrest of the occupants on the basis of evidence seized in the search. St. v. Schoendaller, 176 M 376, 578 P2d 730 (1978).

No Probable Cause — Unreliability of Tip: Police detectives did not have probable cause to enter an upstairs room of an inn, arrest defendants for participating in a card game on unlicensed premises, and search the room because of the inability of the informant's tip to satisfy the two-pronged Aguilar test. St. v. Robey, 176 M 298, 577 P2d 1226 (1978).

"Plain View" Doctrine — Elements: A warrantless seizure of evidence under the "plain view" doctrine is justified only if the police officer had a prior justification for an intrusion in the course of which he inadvertently viewed contraband and exigent circumstances existed to render immediate seizure imperative. In this case the officer's valid visual observation merely furnished probable cause for issuance of a warrant; thus, the trial court was correct in granting a motion to suppress evidence. St. v. Lane, 175 M 225, 573 P2d 198 (1977), overruled in part in St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Inventory Search — Not Justified: Contraband found under a seat during an inventory of an automobile held in police custody was not in plain view, thus it was seized in violation of individual privacy and freedom from unreasonable searches. The inventory search was not justified by protection of the contents for the owner's benefit or protection of the police from claims for lost property beyond articles in plain view from outside the vehicle. St. v. Sawyer, 174 M 512, 571 P2d 1131 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Pastos, 269 M 43, 887 P2d 199, 51 St. Rep. 1441 (1994).

Inadmissible Evidence in Alleged Bomb Threat: The trial court properly declared inadmissible that evidence which was seized in a warrantless search of the defendant's curtilage and secured by a wiretap of the defendant's phone and all testimony relating thereto. The State's reliance on the "plain view" doctrine and the theory that the telephone company personnel were authorized to secure the evidence was unsuccessful. St. v. Lewis, 173 M 1, 565 P2d 642 (1977).

Search Without Voluntary Consent or Warrant: When the defendant was held incommunicado until he consented to a search and probable cause did not exist, a search of a car trunk was unlawful and marijuana seized was properly suppressed. St. v. Brough, 171 M 182, 556 P2d 1239 (1976).

Invalid Consent: When the Sheriff confiscated the defendant's truck without his knowledge after arrest and later obtained the defendant's signature on a consent form which did not purport to be retroactive, while the defendant was held in jail in the absence of counsel, material taken from the truck was illegally obtained and inadmissible. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Consent Search — Requirements — Burden of Proof:

Equivocal conduct by a defendant is not a sufficient basis for an inference that he consents to a search because the consent to a search must be freely given, and unequivocal and specific consent must be shown by clear positive evidence. St. v. LaFlamme, 170 M 202, 551 P2d 1011 (1976).

A search and seizure may be made without a search warrant if the individual freely and intelligently gives his unequivocal and specific consent to the search, uncontaminated by any duress or coercion, express or implied. The State has the burden of proving that such consent was given. St. v. Tomich, 332 F2d 987 (9th Cir. 1964).

No Prior Justification: Marijuana and hashish found in a search of the defendant's purse were excluded since there was no valid reason for the officer to inspect the contents of defendant's purse and the "plain view" doctrine was not applicable. St. v. Hough, 163 M 47, 516 P2d 613 (1973).

Disclaimer — Evidence Suppressed: Suppression of evidence found in the car in which the defendant was riding at the time of arrest was not error when the vehicle belonged to the defendant's companion and the defendant disclaimed any ownership or right to possession of it or any of the property taken from it. St. v. Nelson, 130 M 466, 304 P2d 1110 (1956).

CITIZEN SEARCHES

Looking Through Crack in Door of Defendant's Locked Shed: Kloberdanz told the Sheriff that he believed that Henderson was storing a stolen red Peterbilt truck in a shed on his property. Kloberdanz told the Sheriff that he had received a letter from his friend Herrick reporting the theft of his truck from Colorado over Memorial Day weekend. The letter contained a detailed description and sketch of the truck. Two of Kloberdanz's coworkers had mentioned that they had seen a new red Peterbilt in Henderson's shed while picking up some equipment at Henderson's property. Kloberdanz took advantage of an opportunity to go to the Henderson property to pick up equipment for his employer and while there looked through a crack in the door of the locked shed. He told the Sheriff that he had seen a truck that matched the description and sketch of the truck stolen from Herrick. The information Kloberdanz obtained by looking through the crack in the door of the locked shed was obtained in violation of Montana law. U.S. v. Henderson, 721 F2d 662 (9th Cir. 1983).

Exclusionary Rule and Judicial Integrity: The Montana Constitution provides that "the right of individual privacy is essential to the well-being of a free society and shall not be infringed without the showing of a compelling state interest". The judicial system must not become an accomplice to constitutional violations by admitting illegally obtained evidence. Therefore, evidence obtained by a private citizen in violation of the state constitutional right to privacy is subject to the exclusionary rule and may not be admitted into evidence in a criminal trial in Montana. St. v. Van Haele, 199 M 522, 649 P2d 1311, 39 St. Rep. 1586 (1982).

Search of Unit by Manager of Rental Storage Unit Business: After renter of storage unit entered his unit, manager of the storage unit rental business wanted to know how much longer he would be on the premises and wondered what renter was doing, as the unit's door was closed and there were no windows or lights in the unit. She opened the door after a knock and calling out to renter produced no result. Renter was sitting on the floor pointing a gun at the manager and had two suitcases behind him in the dim interior of the unit. Manager left. Pursuant to a suggestion of the business' home office, the manager removed the hinge pins on the door, cut off the padlock, entered, opened a suitcase, found a number of bottles of pills, and called the police. Based on the manager's information the police obtained a search warrant, found over 100 bottles of pills in the suitcases and a purse, and renter was arrested, charged, and convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell them. On appeal it was found that the evidence was obtained in violation of renter's state constitutional right to privacy and should have been excluded. The conviction was reversed because it was not supported by the remaining evidence or the law. St. v. Van Haele, 199 M 522, 649 P2d 1311, 39 St. Rep. 1586 (1982).

Entry to Defendant's Porch — No Private Search Conducted: There was testimony that two men entered the defendant's porch while the defendant was not at home. The same two men returned and talked to the defendant. The two men returned for a third time with a Deputy Sheriff. After obtaining a search warrant, the Deputy Sheriff searched the defendant's premises. After certain stolen items were found, the defendant was arrested and later convicted of theft. The court rejected the defendant's argument that the two men conducted an unlawful search the first time they entered his porch in violation of the defendant's right of privacy. St. v. Brown, 199 M 472, 649 P2d 1306, 39 St. Rep. 1531 (1982).

Landlord Search of Apartment: The defendant, who had signed a lease allowing his landlord the right to enter the defendant's apartment, borrowed a vacuum cleaner from the landlord, who, upon entering the defendant's room to retrieve the vacuum, saw light coming from a closet and inadvertently discovered marijuana and drug paraphernalia. The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to suppress the evidence taken after a search warrant was obtained. The landlord was justified in entering the room to show it to prospective lessees or to retrieve the vacuum. Once the landlord was in the apartment, he was justified in inspecting the closet to see if the cause of the light constituted a fire hazard. The landlord could, under the circumstances, permit the police officer to observe the items in the closet, and the officer's observation could be used as a basis for the warrant. St. v. Sayers, 199 M 228, 648 P2d 291, 39 St. Rep. 1309 (1982).

Citizen Search Without Probable Cause Unlawful Warrantless Search: In appeal by the state from a motion suppressing all evidence resulting from an unreasonable search and seizure, the Supreme Court affirmed. A warrantless search is per se unreasonable unless it falls within one of the defined exceptions. Before the warrantless search, neither private citizen searcher could have obtained a valid search warrant because he was not possessed, through his own knowledge or through demonstrably reliable informants, of facts sufficient to establish probable cause, an essential ground for the issuance of a warrant. Since the warrantless search here was per se unreasonable, it was unconstitutional under our federal and state constitutions and therefore unlawful. St. v. Hyem, 193 M 51, 630 P2d 202, 38 St. Rep. 891 (1981).

Warrantless Citizen Search of House — Defendants' Right of Privacy Violated: A warrantless citizen search of house violated defendants' right of privacy without the showing of a compelling state interest. Since the citizens were acting in their individual capacities and not for the state, state action was not involved, and the searchers could never be in a position of showing a compelling state interest, which is the only exception to the restriction against the invasion of individual privacy. Citizens gained entry by pretending to be interested in purchasing the house. Although defendants were aware that their rented house was for sale and being shown to prospective buyers in their absence, defendants did not consent to the search under their bed which turned up stolen skis and thereby waive their right of privacy. St. v. Hyem, 193 M 51, 630 P2d 202, 38 St. Rep. 891 (1981).

Search Warrant and Search Based on Marijuana Obtained by Trespassing Neighbor Illegal: The issuance of a search warrant and the subsequent search based solely on a sample of marijuana obtained by the defendant's curious neighbor by means of an illegal trespass were improper and illegal. The evidence obtained by the search was properly suppressed by the District Court. St. v. Helfrich, 183 M 484, 600 P2d 816 (1979).

Search by Private Citizens — Exclusionary Rule:

The exclusionary rule for suppression of evidence must also apply to searches by private citizens such as security guards, private detectives, political investigators, or any citizen who conducts an unreasonable search or illegal intrusion into the privacy of another. St. v. Coburn, 165 M 488, 530 P2d 442 (1974).

The motion to suppress evidence was properly granted when the employer removed marijuana from the defendant's coat in a search without a warrant. St. v. Coburn, 165 M 488, 530 P2d 442 (1974).

INSUFFICIENT SEARCH WARRANT

Failure to Prove Falsity of Warrant Application — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: Shelton moved to suppress evidence from a drug search based on the assertion that the warrant application mischaracterized statements upon which the application was based. The Supreme Court found that the alleged mischaracterization was merely a difference in semantics, not proof of a false statement in the application. The trial court gave Shelton the opportunity to challenge the veracity of the application but denied the motion to suppress, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 282, 345 M 330, 191 P3d 420 (2008). Following conviction on drug charges in a different county but stemming from the same incident, Shelton raised an identical claim of the insufficiency of the search warrant based on false information. Having considered and dismissed the argument in Shelton, id., the Supreme Court denied review of the claim under res judicata. Further, there was no indication that the District Court in the subsequent case considered information not contained in the warrant application, so Shelton's second conviction was also affirmed in St. v. Shelton, 2008 MT 321, 346 M 114, 193 P3d 943 (2008).

Clarification of Corroboration Necessary to Verify Information Provided by Anonymous or Confidential Informant — Confidential Informant's Information Corroborated by Anonymous Tip Considered Insubstantial Basis for Determination of Probable Cause: A confidential informant provided police with firsthand information on alleged drug-related activities at a trailer home in Big Sky occupied by a person named Hoge, but there was no mention that Reesman lived at the trailer or was involved in any way. There was no indication that the informant had provided reliable information in the past. Police also received information from an anonymous citizen, who had reportedly provided reliable information in the past, regarding similar activity at the trailer home. However, there was no indication that the citizen's information came from personal observation or in what context prior reliable information had been received. Police took no further steps to corroborate the information supplied by either informant. Nevertheless, a warrant was issued for the entire trailer home and executed 2 days later. Police found Reesman and three other persons there and, upon searching Reesman's bedroom without his valid consent, discovered more than 100 doses of LSD. Reesman was charged with criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell, but he pleaded not guilty and moved to suppress the evidence on grounds that the warrant lacked probable cause and was overbroad. The District Court determined that corroboration of the confidential informant's firsthand, detailed information by an anonymous tip weighed heavily in favor of the informant's reliability and provided a substantial basis for a finding of probable cause; therefore, the court refused to suppress the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the totality of circumstances test set out in Ill. v. Gates, 462 US 213 (1983), to determine the sufficiency of the warrant application based on information supplied by anonymous or confidential informants, examining extensive case law. In obtaining a search warrant based on a tip from an anonymous informant or one based on hearsay, independent corroboration of the information is necessary. If an informant is not anonymous, but the information is not based on personal observation of the described criminal activity, independent corroboration is also required. In the case of a confidential informant with information based on personal observation, that person must have provided reliable and accurate information in the past in order for the information to serve as a basis for determining probable cause without further corroboration. If an informant makes an unequivocal admission against interest, further corroboration is unnecessary for warrant purposes. If an informant is motivated by good citizenship and the information demonstrates a sufficient degree of the nature of the circumstances under which the information became known, the informant's disclosures are considered a reliable basis for determining probable cause. A citizen informant is generally presumed reliable, and that reliability is shown by the very nature of the circumstances under which the incriminating evidence became known. Under the circumstances in Reesman's case, the confidential informant's information, which required further corroboration, could not serve as a source of independent corroboration or investigation that transformed the other informant's information into a basis for establishing probable cause. Thus, without further independent corroboration or investigation, the confidential informant's information in the search warrant application failed to supply the magistrate with the substantial basis for probable cause. The District Court erred in denying Reesman's motion to suppress the evidence, and the Supreme Court reversed. St. v. Reesman, 2000 MT 243, 301 M 408, 10 P3d 83, 57 St. Rep. 1017 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Rydberg, 239 M 70, 778 P2d 902 (1989), St. v. Deskins, 245 M 158, 799 P2d 1070 (1990), and St. v. Oleson, 1998 MT 130, 289 M 139, 959 P2d 503 (1998), and followed in St. v. Palmer, 2003 MT 129, 316 M 46, 68 P3d 809 (2003). See also St. v. Walston, 236 M 218, 768 P2d 1387 (1989), and St. v. Martinez, 2003 MT 65, 314 M 434, 67 P3d 207 (2003).

Stale Information, Lack of Informant Veracity, and Failure to Investigate as Insufficient Basis for Probable Cause — Motion to Suppress Proper: An application for a search warrant was based on five tips, including three that were stale, ranging in time and age from 11 months to over 7 years, and two that were anonymous and confidential Crimestoppers tips that did not allow for proper assessment of the credibility of the informant or his sources. None of the tips were subjected to prompt or adequate law enforcement investigation. The application did not contain sufficient facts and circumstances to meet the Gates test for probable cause, and a motion to suppress evidence seized as a result of the warrant should have been granted. St. v. Valley, 252 M 489, 830 P2d 1255, 49 St. Rep. 30 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Adams, 284 M 25, 943 P2d 955, 54 St. Rep. 717 (1997).

Search Warrant Based on Informant's Statement: The court properly granted the defendant's motion to suppress evidence seized in the search of his home when the application for a search warrant before the Justice of the Peace failed to set forth the underlying circumstances necessary to enable him to independently judge the validity of the informant's conclusion that the defendant was in possession of dangerous drugs unlawfully and with intent to sell. St. v. Leistiko, 176 M 434, 578 P2d 1161 (1978).

Warrant Issued by Tribal Court: The Supreme Court declined to address the applicability of Montana law versus that of the Blackfeet Tribal Law and Order Code to the admissibility in a state prosecution of a non-Indian of evidence seized on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation by Blackfeet tribal police acting under authority of a search warrant issued by the Blackfeet Tribal Court because both the State and the defendant agreed that under either law the search warrant and affidavit were defective and the evidence must be suppressed. St. v. Stenson, 175 M 523, 575 P2d 72 (1978).

Defective Warrant Addressed to Any Peace Officer: Having previously disapproved the practice of directing search warrants "to any peace officer of this state", the court ordered the suppression of evidence seized under such a warrant in the present case. State ex rel. Sanford v. District Court, 170 M 196, 551 P2d 1005 (1976). See also St. v. Meidinger, 160 M 310, 502 P2d 58 (1972); St. v. Snider, 168 M 220, 541 P2d 1204 (1975).

Sufficiency of Affidavit for Warrant: Contemporaneous oral declarations to a magistrate cannot be used to bolster an insufficient affidavit in the attempt to establish probable cause, unless such declarations are sworn, signed, reduced to writing, and made a part of the affidavit for the issuance of the search warrant. An affidavit which omits reference to the time of the criminal event cannot establish probable cause and is therefore deficient. State ex rel. Townsend v. District Court, 168 M 357, 543 P2d 193 (1975).

Issuance of Warrant by City Judge: A City Court Judge does not have the statutory authority to issue search warrants, and the trial court correctly suppressed evidence obtained under color of a search warrant executed by a City Court Judge. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975), applied, with regard to substitute judges, in Potter v. District Court, 266 M 384, 880 P2d 1319, 51 St. Rep. 853 (1994).

MOTION DENIED — LAWFUL ARREST

Reasonable Mistake in Arrest of Misidentified Person and Subsequent Seizure of Incriminating Evidence — Admissibility of Evidence: The landlady of a rental apartment asked police to come and talk to her about her tenant, whom she identified as Thomas Bateman, and gave the officers Bateman's physical description, approximate age, and a description of Bateman's suspicious activity. The officer radioed in for an outstanding warrant check on Thomas Bateman and discovered that Thomas Bateman had an outstanding warrant for misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. The warrant information matched the description provided by the landlady. When officers knocked on Bateman's door and asked if he was Thomas Bateman, Bateman replied affirmatively. The officers said they had a warrant for his arrest and attempted to handcuff Bateman, and Bateman dropped a bag of Gummy Bears and what appeared to be a marijuana pipe. Bateman then told the officers that there was another Thomas Bateman and that there had been police confusion regarding them in the past. Officers checked Bateman's identification, radioed to dispatch for further information, and determined that although their ages and physical descriptions were similar, the arrestee was indeed not the Thomas Bateman with the outstanding warrant. Because the officers saw Bateman drop the marijuana pipe and noticed the odor of smoke and other drug paraphernalia in the living room, they had probable cause at that point to arrest him. Also in the apartment was another man who did have an outstanding warrant. Officers then obtained a warrant to search the apartment and discovered a methamphetamine lab in the crawl space. Bateman moved to dismiss the charges because the evidence resulted from an illegal arrest. The motion was denied, and Bateman appealed. Citing Hill v. Calif., 401 US 797 (1971), the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers acted reasonably, albeit mistakenly, in arresting Bateman. Because the arrest was reasonable, the subsequent discovery of incriminating evidence was legal and admissible. St. v. Bateman, 2004 MT 281, 323 M 280, 99 P3d 656 (2004).

Passenger Not Unlawfully Detained During Lawful Stop of Driver — Motion to Suppress Evidence Found in Search of Passenger Properly Denied: Roberts was a passenger in a vehicle that was lawfully stopped. When he tried to exit the vehicle, Roberts was told to remain inside. After volunteering his name, the officer ran a warrant check and found that Roberts was wanted on an outstanding warrant. Roberts was arrested and searched, and a quantity of controlled substances was found on his person. Roberts moved to suppress the evidence of the search on the grounds that he was unlawfully detained when he was directed to remain in the vehicle, but the motion was denied. The Supreme Court applied U.S. v. Vaughan, 718 F2d 332 (9th Cir. 1983), in holding that it is not a constitutional violation to detain a passenger when a vehicle has been lawfully stopped because a warrant is outstanding for the driver. Even though officers had no reason to believe that the passenger had engaged in any criminal activity, they were permitted to detain the passenger while a search was conducted of his companions. Based on Roberts' own version of the events, the detention, arrest, and search of his person were justified and lawful, and the motion to suppress was therefore properly denied. St. v. Roberts, 284 M 54, 943 P2d 1249, 54 St. Rep. 745 (1997).

Parolee's Wallet at Scene of Homicide — Probable Cause for Arrest: There was probable cause or reasonable grounds to believe accused committed acts constituting a violation of his parole conditions where his wallet was found at the scene of a criminal homicide. Accused could not successfully contend on appeal following deliberate homicide conviction that statements made to police should be suppressed for being the result of an arrest without probable cause. St. v. Plouffe, 198 M 379, 646 P2d 533, 39 St. Rep. 1064 (1982).

Warrantless Arrest — Evidence Obtained Pursuant to Arrest — Collective Police Information Considered — Exceptional Circumstances: On appeal from a conviction for conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs, the defendant attacked his arrest as being without probable cause and unlawfully warrantless. The Supreme Court found the arrest was based on probable cause and lawful. Therefore, the evidence seized after the arrest was admissible at trial. An officer could make an arrest without a warrant when he believed on reasonable grounds that the person had committed an offense and the existing circumstances required immediate arrest. "Reasonable grounds" to arrest is synonymous with "probable cause" to arrest. Probable cause may be found in a case such as this by evaluating the collective information of the police, not just that of the arresting officer. Here the court found more than the defendant's mere presence at the scene of the crime, and it found probable cause had existed. On the issue of the necessity of immediate arrest, the court compared the situation to the "exceptional circumstances" that allow police to enter a residence without a warrant to search and arrest. Considering the possibilities of the defendant's fleeing and the likelihood that the evidence of the buy, which easily could have been destroyed or disposed of, might be found on the defendant because he was present at delivery, the court held that the officers were reasonable in their belief that an immediate arrest was necessary. St. v. Davis, 190 M 285, 620 P2d 1209, 37 St. Rep. 1958 (1980).

Search Incident to Arrest — Admissible Evidence: The facts and circumstances within the officers' personal knowledge at the time of the defendant's arrest would justify a man of reasonable caution to believe that an offense had been or was being committed, and there was sufficient probable cause to arrest the defendant. Thus, the seizure of a grocery sack in his possession and in plain view was made pursuant to a valid lawful arrest, justifying denial of a motion to suppress this evidence. St. v. Petko, 177 M 229, 581 P2d 425 (1978).

Marijuana Odor — Probable Cause for Warrantless Arrest and Search: Law enforcement officers had probable cause to believe an offense was being committed in the defendants' residence and, because of the presence of exigent circumstances, were justified in entering and arresting the defendants and searching the defendants and the premises immediately under their control. Thus, the constitutionality of the warrantless search and seizure condition of parole and probation status was irrelevant. St. v. Means, 177 M 193, 581 P2d 406 (1978).

Complaint Not Defective: When a complaint was issued in one county but the offense was committed in another, it was not defective since the purpose of the complaint was not to charge the offense but to establish the basis for an arrest warrant. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977).

MOTION DENIED — NO ARREST

Identification Testimony — Transport of Accused Prior to Arrest: Identification testimony derived from the transportation of defendant for the purpose of exhibiting him to a witness was not suppressible as a fourth amendment violation. The record supports the District Court's conclusion that defendant agreed to accompany the officers and had not been "arrested" prior to his formal arrest upon identification by a witness. On the issue of an identification of defendant in the back seat of a police car, the Supreme Court stated that it could not conclude that the identification was so unreliable as to constitute a violation of due process. Considering the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court held that while the identification procedure was suggestive, it did not create a situation in which there was a substantial likelihood of misidentification. St. v. Jenkins, 192 M 539, 629 P2d 761, 38 St. Rep. 922 (1981).

MOTION DENIED — NO PREJUDICE

Voluntariness of Confession — Totality of Circumstances: When a defendant moves to suppress a confession or admission on grounds that it was given involuntarily, the prosecution must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it was voluntary. On appeal, the Supreme Court will review denial of a suppression motion to determine whether findings of fact were clearly erroneous and correctly applied as a matter of law. A finding of fact is clearly erroneous if: (1) it is not supported by substantial evidence, which must be more than a scintilla of evidence but may be less than a preponderance of the evidence; (2) the trial court misapprehended the effect of the evidence; or (3) the Supreme Court has a definite or firm conviction that a mistake was made. When a determination of voluntariness depends on the credibility of witnesses, the Supreme Court will defer to the trial court. The emphasis in determining voluntariness is on whether the confession was the product of free choice or compulsion, which must take into account the totality of the circumstances, including the defendant's age and education, whether the defendant was advised of Miranda rights, the defendant's prior experience with the criminal justice system and police interrogation, the defendant's background, experience, demeanor, coherence, articulateness, and capacity to make full use of faculties, the length and method of interrogation, and whether the confession or admission was extracted through force, violence, or improper influence or by direct or implied promises. If the confession or admission was involuntary, its use violates self-incrimination and due process. Here, the Supreme Court considered the totality of the circumstances and found substantial credible evidence that Hoffman's confession was voluntary. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003). The standard of review of denial of a motion to suppress was also applied in St. v. Munson, 2007 MT 222, 339 M 68, 169 P3d 364 (2007), and St. v. Hurlbert, 2009 MT 221, 351 M 316, 211 P3d 869 (2009).

Defendant Present in Apartment Where Methamphetamine Lab Found — Totality of Circumstances Justifying Warrantless Arrest: Officers raided Savage's apartment, identified by an anonymous tip as a suspected methamphetamine laboratory. Nalder was also present, and although officers had no previous suspicions regarding Nalder, they arrested her after hearing a toilet running and observing her standing in the kitchen, which was adjacent to the bathroom, near what appeared to be a jar filled with a substance in the first stage of the methamphetamine-producing process. During an interview, Nalder admitted to flushing substances used to make methamphetamine down the toilet when she heard the officers announce themselves. Nalder was charged with tampering with physical evidence, but Nalder moved to suppress the statements and the charge on grounds that probable cause did not exist for her warrantless arrest. The motion was denied, and Nalder was convicted and appealed, contending error in denial of the motion to suppress based on certain findings that were allegedly incorrect. The Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court's finding that the officers announced their presence twice before entering the apartment, contrary to Nalder's claim that she did not hear any knocking, was supported by the evidence and not clearly erroneous because failure to hear did not constitute evidence contradicting the officers' testimony that they announced themselves. The trial court's finding that the officers broke down the door was not supported by substantial evidence and was thus erroneous, but the error was not prejudicial in light of the totality of the circumstances. Nalder correctly asserted that her mere presence at the scene did not justify arrest and that there must be some connection with criminal activity before her warrantless arrest was justified. However, considered in light of the totality of the circumstances and the trained officers' knowledge, there was sufficient probable cause for Nalder's arrest. The officers received extensive training in what to reasonably expect while raiding a methamphetamine laboratory, and evaluated in accordance with the officers' perceptions, they could reasonably believe that Nalder was committing, and had just committed, a crime. St. v. Nalder, 2001 MT 270, 307 M 280, 37 P3d 661 (2001).

Failure to Make Return — Effect: The defendant failed to demonstrate any prejudice to his substantial rights by an officer's failure to make a return of an item of evidence; therefore, it was not rendered inadmissible. St. v. Lenon, 174 M 264, 570 P2d 901 (1977).

DELAY IN APPEARANCE

Evidence Excluded: Failure to provide the defendant with a prompt initial appearance necessitated exclusion of evidence obtained and statements allegedly made after the defendant's arrest when he established that the delay was unnecessary and the prosecution failed to meet the burden of showing that such evidence and statements were not reasonably related to the delay. St. v. Benbo, 174 M 252, 570 P2d 894 (1977). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672, 56 St. Rep. 1346 (1999).

MOTION DENIED — UNTIMELINESS

Failure to Meet Statutory Duty to Bring Defense, Objection, or Request at or Before Omnibus Hearing Constituting Waiver: A party has a statutory duty to bring any defense, objection, or request that is capable of determination without trial of the general issue, including motions to suppress, at or before the omnibus hearing or by a later date if ordered by the court, and failure to do so constitutes a waiver. Here, defendant's motion to suppress was filed after both the date of the omnibus hearing and a later deadline for motions set by the District Court, but 6 months before the actual trial. Nevertheless, the motion was untimely as a matter of law, and the District Court did not err in denying relief from the waiver. St. v. VonBergen, 2003 MT 265, 317 M 445, 77 P3d 537 (2003), followed in St. v. Adkins, 2009 MT 71, 349 M 444, 204 P3d 1 (2009).

No Error in Denial of Untimely Midtrial Motion to Suppress Evidence: Motions to suppress are expressly among pretrial matters that must be raised at or before the omnibus hearing. Griffing indicated an intent to file motions to suppress his confession and physical evidence pursuant to 46-13-301 and this section, but the motions were not made until trial had commenced. Failure to raise the issues at or before the omnibus hearing constituted a waiver under 46-13-101. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying the midtrial motion to suppress as untimely. St. v. Griffing, 1998 MT 75, 288 M 213, 955 P2d 1388, 55 St. Rep. 309 (1998), following St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975 (1997).

Timeliness of Objection to Evidence: If evidence was obtained by unlawful search and seizure, it was necessary for the accused, who desired to exclude such evidence from his trial, to make a timely objection to its introduction and not wait until the first day of trial after voir dire of the jury. St. v. Briner, 173 M 185, 567 P2d 35 (1977), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997).

Waiver for Appeal: The defendant's failure to make a timely motion to suppress evidence waived the search and seizure issue for appeal, notwithstanding his objection to the introduction of the evidence seized. St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973).

Waiver of Right to Object: If accused has had opportunity to suppress illegally obtained evidence before trial and fails to do so, objection to the evidence at trial will not avail him. St. v. Gotta, 71 M 288, 229 P 405 (1924).

TIMELY MOTION

Excusable Delay: When confusion between the parties and the District Court over the State's intention to drop or continue prosecution after the defendant's conviction on an assault charge caused delay in the defendant's filing a motion to suppress illegally seized evidence, the motion was neither improper nor untimely. St. v. Bentley, 156 M 129, 477 P2d 345 (1970).

Part 4
Motion for Dismissal

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part establishes two provisions intended to govern the practice of a motion for dismissal. These statutes are modeled after and are chiefly a restatement of the 1987 code. None of the provisions are intended to alter established procedure.

46-13-401. Dismissal at instance of court or prosecution.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is primarily a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-13-201. Subsection (1) allows either the prosecutor or the court to move for the dismissal of a criminal charge. The 1985 amendment to the section, requiring that the reasons for the dismissal of a felony charge be stated on the record, is retained. Minor changes not significantly affecting established procedure have been adopted. Compare subsection (1) and 1987 MCA 46-13-201(1).

Subsection (2) combines the provisions found in the remainder of 1987 MCA 46-13-201. The resulting statute affirmatively states that misdemeanor charges not brought to trial within 6 months may be dismissed with prejudice. The statute remains discretionary in order that a delay caused by the defendant or for other good reasons can prevent dismissal. The statute accurately reflects those two code provisions without substantive change.

No substantive change. [Note subsequent amendments.]

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (2) inserted "After the entry of a plea upon a misdemeanor charge", after "dismissed" inserted "with prejudice", and after "6 months" deleted "after entry of plea upon a complaint, information, or indictment charging a misdemeanor"; and deleted (3) that read: "(3) An order for the dismissal of an action as provided in this chapter is a bar to any other prosecution for the same offense if it is a misdemeanor, but it is not a bar if the offense is a felony"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendment: In (1), near beginning after "order", deleted "an action", after "dismissed", inserted "however, the court may not order a dismissal of a complaint, information, or indictment, or a count contained therein, charging a felony, unless good cause for dismissal is shown", and made minor wording changes in remainder of subsection.

Case Notes

Generally 463
Dismissal on Application of Prosecution 465
Speedy Trial 466

GENERALLY

No Triple Jeopardy in Prosecution of Misdemeanor Absent Prosecutorial Intent to Provoke Mistrial: At Mouat's misdemeanor DUI trial, the city prosecutor presented a videotape of Mouat's arrest, which showed the arresting officer asking Mouat about previous DUI arrests. Mouat moved for and was granted a mistrial. The trial court found that admission of the offending statement was an inadvertent oversight by both parties and ordered the city to redact the statement from the tape. Nevertheless, despite the city's efforts, at the next trial, the statement was still slightly audible, and Mouat again moved for and was granted a mistrial. Mouat then asserted that, based on double jeopardy and fundamental fairness grounds, the prosecution should not be granted a third trial in a misdemeanor case when the cause was negligence on the part of the government. The Supreme Court disagreed, citing St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), for the proposition that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial. Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008).

Probability of Mootness — Writ of Supervisory Control Appropriate When Issue Likely to Arise Again — Appeal Inadequate Remedy: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that the case was likely to be dismissed under subsection (2) of this section, which requires dismissal of misdemeanor prosecutions if not brought to trial within a certain time period, thus making the issue of waiver of a jury trial moot. The Supreme Court found that there was a justiciable controversy because the issue would very likely arise in future proceedings. The court further concluded that the case was appropriate for the exercise of supervisory control, an extraordinary remedy exercised when a court is proceeding under a mistake of law that, if uncorrected, would cause significant injustice and the remedy of appeal is inadequate. The appeal process in this matter would have provided an inadequate remedy for the state because, upon appeal, the state would have already lost its right to consent or object to waiver of a jury trial. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007).

Violation of Motion In Limine in First Trial Not Grounds for Double Jeopardy Dismissal in Second Trial: Mallak contended that the state goaded him into moving for a mistrial by purposely violating a motion in limine prohibiting testimony of Mallak's prior violent conduct and that under Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667 (1982), and St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721 (1986), a second trial was a violation of double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed. The part of the testimony that Mallak objected to was a product of the prosecutor's inadvertence, not intention, and did not inevitably lead to a violation of the motion in limine, unlike the inherently violative questioning in Laster. Thus, double jeopardy did not apply, and the trial court did not err in denying Mallak's motion to dismiss the charges. St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), followed in Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008), regarding the principle that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial, and followed in Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009), to the extent that it is insufficient to bar a retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the double jeopardy clause, even when the prosecutor's conduct prompting the mistrial motion constitutes harassment or overreaching.

Reasonable Mistake in Arrest of Misidentified Person and Subsequent Seizure of Incriminating Evidence — Admissibility of Evidence: The landlady of a rental apartment asked police to come and talk to her about her tenant, whom she identified as Thomas Bateman, and gave the officers Bateman's physical description, approximate age, and a description of Bateman's suspicious activity. The officer radioed in for an outstanding warrant check on Thomas Bateman and discovered that Thomas Bateman had an outstanding warrant for misdemeanor possession of dangerous drugs. The warrant information matched the description provided by the landlady. When officers knocked on Bateman's door and asked if he was Thomas Bateman, Bateman replied affirmatively. The officers said they had a warrant for his arrest and attempted to handcuff Bateman, and Bateman dropped a bag of Gummy Bears and what appeared to be a marijuana pipe. Bateman then told the officers that there was another Thomas Bateman and that there had been police confusion regarding them in the past. Officers checked Bateman's identification, radioed to dispatch for further information, and determined that although their ages and physical descriptions were similar, the arrestee was indeed not the Thomas Bateman with the outstanding warrant. Because the officers saw Bateman drop the marijuana pipe and noticed the odor of smoke and other drug paraphernalia in the living room, they had probable cause at that point to arrest him. Also in the apartment was another man who did have an outstanding warrant. Officers then obtained a warrant to search the apartment and discovered a methamphetamine lab in the crawl space. Bateman moved to dismiss the charges because the evidence resulted from an illegal arrest. The motion was denied, and Bateman appealed. Citing Hill v. Calif., 401 US 797 (1971), the Supreme Court affirmed. The officers acted reasonably, albeit mistakenly, in arresting Bateman. Because the arrest was reasonable, the subsequent discovery of incriminating evidence was legal and admissible. St. v. Bateman, 2004 MT 281, 323 M 280, 99 P3d 656 (2004).

No Error in Failure to Consider Pro Se Motion for Dismissal When Defendant Represented by Counsel: It is not error for a District Court to refuse pro se motions for dismissal from a defendant who is represented by counsel. St. v. Weaver, 2001 MT 115, 305 M 315, 28 P3d 451 (2001), following St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517 (1986).

Conditions for Dismissal of Misdemeanor: A misdemeanor may be dismissed pursuant to this section only if: (1) defendant has not asked for a postponement; and (2) the state has not shown good cause for delay. St. v. Pollack, 1998 MT 105, 288 M 436, 958 P2d 75, 55 St. Rep. 403 (1998), following St. v. Fitzgerald, 283 M 162, 940 P2d 108 (1997).

Premature Dismissal of Felony Assault (Now Assault With a Weapon) Charge — Case Reversed: Pinkerton was charged with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and misdemeanor domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault). He moved to dismiss on grounds of insufficient evidence to convict on felony assault (now assault with a weapon), based on apparently conflicting testimony of his wife, and also moved to dismiss the accompanying misdemeanor charge because the case had not been brought to trial within 6 months. The District Court agreed and dismissed the felony charge, and because without the adjoining felony charge the misdemeanor charge must stand on its own, the lesser charge was also dismissed for failure to prosecute. Upon review, the Supreme Court held that the trial court abused its discretion in dismissing the information prior to trial because there was no way to know what wife's actual testimony would be at trial. There was no independent examination of wife's prior statements made to law enforcement, thus the court relied solely on the parties' interpretation of the statements. It was unclear whether the potential prior inconsistent statement would be the state's sole basis for seeking a conviction or whether the statement could be corroborated by other evidence. Without allowing the state to present its case in chief, dismissal of the felony charge was premature, and the dismissal of the charge, along with the related misdemeanor charge, was reversed and remanded. St. v. Pinkerton, 270 M 287, 891 P2d 532, 52 St. Rep. 186 (1995).

Dismissal Not in Furtherance of Justice: The District Court judge dismissed a criminal proceeding after he had ordered a legal intern from the courtroom because the judge considered the intern to be inappropriately attired and when the judge could not locate the appropriate criminal charge in the court file. The Supreme Court held that the dismissal was not in the furtherance of justice and was an abuse of discretion. In balancing the interests of the court to enforce its own rules against the interests of society in proceeding with a case in which a plea bargain had been arranged, the balance weighs in favor of the interests of society. St. v. Schwictenberg, 237 M 213, 772 P2d 853, 46 St. Rep. 746 (1989).

Reinstatement of Dismissed Information Impermissible: Defendant filed a brief in support of dismissal based on a lack of District Court jurisdiction. Absent any reply brief or request for extension, the court found the challenge to jurisdiction well-taken and dismissed the information and the charges. The order of dismissal was filed, but through oversight the order was not served on the attorneys. Counsel subsequently filed briefs, including a motion to set aside dismissal, but not until after the time for appealing the dismissal had expired. The court nevertheless held a hearing on the motion and reinstated the information, upon which defendant was then convicted. The Supreme Court reversed, noting that 46-13-106 (renumbered 46-13-402) does not provide for reinstatement of a dismissed information. The reinstatement was a reversal of the District Court's decision on the motion to dismiss and was impermissible. Because a valid information did not exist, defendant's trial, conviction, and sentence under the reinstated information were invalid. St. v. Onstad, 234 M 487, 764 P2d 473, 45 St. Rep. 2071 (1988), followed, with regard to dismissal "with prejudice" in a criminal case, in St. v. District Court, 265 M 445, 877 P2d 1008, 51 St. Rep. 599 (1994), in which it was held that an order of dismissal in a criminal case, while not technically a judgment as that term is defined in the code of criminal procedure, is nevertheless a final adjudication of the case, is conclusive of the rights of the parties as is a final judgment, and is not subject to continuing jurisdiction by the trial court.

Authority to Dismiss: A judge had no authority under 46-13-101 to grant the defendant's motion to dismiss based on a defense that went to the general issue to be determined at trial or under 46-13-201 (renumbered 46-13-401) because he did not set forth the reasons for dismissal in an order entered on the minutes. St. v. Cole, 174 M 380, 571 P2d 87 (1977).

"In Furtherance of Justice": Since the Legislature did not define the phrase "in furtherance of justice", as used in the predecessor to this section, it is left for the court's judicial discretion, exercised in view of a defendant's constitutional rights and the interests of society, to determine what particular grounds warrant dismissal of a pending criminal action, and mandamus will not issue to control the court's discretion. State ex rel. Anderson v. Gile, 119 M 182, 172 P2d 583 (1946).

Procedure After Indictment Dismissed: After dismissal of an indictment because of substantial defects therein, the District Court may, but is not required to, submit the case to another grand jury or permit or order the County Attorney to file an information charging the defendant with the same offense ineffectually sought to be charged against him by the indictment. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

DISMISSAL ON APPLICATION OF PROSECUTION

Failure to Grant Praecipe to Dismiss Misdemeanor Charge to Allow Pursuit of Felony Charge — Reversible Error: The state filed a praecipe in Justice's Court to dismiss a misdemeanor domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault) charge on the basis that a felony sexual assault charge was being prosecuted in District Court. The Justice of the Peace did not rule on the praecipe at the time that it was filed, instead proceeding to sentence defendant on the lesser offense. In moving for dismissal of a misdemeanor charge, the state need only show that dismissal would be in the furtherance of justice, and having met that standard, the court may not deny the motion to dismiss. Failure to grant the state's praecipe to dismiss constituted reversible error. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Responsibility for Dismissal: Absent fraud or misrepresentation, a County Attorney is not criminally responsible for the dismissal of a criminal matter when the District Court has given its approval and accomplishes the dismissal through its order. State ex rel. Forsythe v. Coate, 171 M 377, 558 P2d 647 (1976).

Constitutes Amendment of First Information: Where defendant did not move to dismiss or demur to second information which was filed after defendant had pleaded to first information, and thus was improperly filed under this section as it read at that time, but rather entered plea to second information and moved to dismiss first information, and where defendant entered no objection to second information at subsequent trial and did not question the information on appeal, defendant waived any right he may have had to object to second information as improper amendment to first information. Gransberry v. St., 149 M 158, 423 P2d 853 (1967).

SPEEDY TRIAL

Trial Delay of 432 Days Without Showing of Compelling Reason — Case Dismissed: Hardaway was arrested for criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to distribute. After more than 200 days without trial, Hardaway moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. The majority of delay was attributed to the state as institutional delay, and because Hardaway was not prejudiced, dismissal was denied. Subsequently, after 432 days had elapsed without trial, Hardaway again moved to dismiss on speedy trial grounds. This time the District Court analyzed the delay pursuant to St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), and concluded that the state failed to meet its burden to provide compelling justification for the delay, so Hardaway's motion to dismiss was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court weighed the length of delay, the state's failure to provide a compelling reason for the delay, Hardaway's two timely speedy trial complaints, and the presumption of prejudice and correctly concluded that Hardaway was deprived of a speedy trial, and on appeal the state failed to demonstrate that the District Court's conclusions were wrong. St. v. Hardaway, 2009 MT 249, 351 M 488, 213 P3d 776 (2009).

Delay of 507 Days From Accusation to Trial — Greater Delay Caused by Defendant — No Speedy Trial Violation: Following a 507-day delay between accusation and trial, Rose contended that his right to a speedy trial was violated. Applying the speedy trial analysis set out in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), the Supreme Court examined the well-developed record and found no violation. Of the 507 days, 199 days were attributable to the state, but all of that delay was institutional delay, and it was Rose that caused the greater portion of the delay while the state was concerned with protecting Rose's right to a speedy trial, so the length of delay did not in itself violate the speedy trial right. Although Rose suffered some discomfort while in jail, that discomfort was not oppressive, nor was Rose's ability to defend himself impaired by the delay between arrest and trial. Pursuant to the Ariegwe criteria, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by dismissing Rose's speedy trial argument. St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009).

Applicability of Speedy Trial Statute to Potential Misdemeanor Partner or Family Member Assault Charge: Martz was convicted of partner or family member assault in 2002. In January 2006, Martz was charged with misdemeanor second offense and felony third offense partner or family member assault, and in May 2006 Martz was charged with felony fourth offense partner or family member assault. The second and third offense charges were dismissed in August 2006 and were subsequently refiled in September 2006. The refiling had the effect of Martz being tried for the felony fourth offense before trial for the misdemeanor second and felony third offenses. Martz contended that the order in which the charges came to trial meant that the fourth offense charge was in fact the second offense tried and that because second offense partner or family member assault is a misdemeanor, the speedy trial provisions of 46-13-401 should apply. The state argued that because Martz was charged with felony partner or family member assault, the speedy trial statute did not apply. The District Court held that if Martz was convicted on the fourth charge but not on the second and third charges, the fourth offense would be treated as a misdemeanor for sentencing purposes, and denied the speedy trial motion. Martz was subsequently convicted on the fourth charge and, the following day, on the second charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that although Martz was first found guilty of the fourth offense, he was not convicted of that charge and sentenced until March of the following year, after sentence for the second offense was imposed, which made the charged fourth offense a felony conviction, so the speedy trial provisions did not apply. However, the state's argument that the speedy trial provisions could never apply was clarified by the Supreme Court. The speedy trial statute could have applied because the fourth offense had the potential of being reduced to a misdemeanor depending on the outcome of the trial on the second and third offenses. Because that contingency did not occur, dismissal of the speedy trial motion was affirmed. St. v. Martz, 2008 MT 382, 347 M 47, 196 P3d 1239 (2008).

Length of Speedy Trial Interval When Dismissal Granted: The date that a court grants a speedy trial dismissal motion becomes the date of the case's disposition and the end date of the speedy trial interval for purposes of appeal. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

Prejudice From 278-Day Delay Warranting Speedy Trial Dismissal: Billman was incarcerated 278 days awaiting trial for felony DUI and misdemeanor driving charges. His motion for dismissal on speedy trial grounds was granted and the state appealed. The Supreme Court applied the Ariegwe speedy trial analysis and affirmed on the following grounds: (1) the entire 278-day delay was attributable to the state; (2) Billman never waived the right to a speedy trial and sincerely wanted a speedy trial; (3) lengthy incarceration coupled with relatively simple charges against Billman established prejudice from the pretrial delay; (4) pretrial incarceration unduly prolonged the disruption to Billman's life and aggravated Billman's anxiety and concern; (5) Billman's memory faded during incarceration, impeding his ability to accurately recall past events and to prepare a defense. Because all the speedy trial factors weighed in Billman's favor and the state failed to persuasively show that the pretrial delay did not prejudice Billman, the District Court's conclusion that Billman was denied a speedy trial was correct. St. v. Billman, 2008 MT 326, 346 M 118, 194 P3d 58 (2008).

Speedy Trial Decision Remanded for Ariegwe Analysis: The District Court held that a delay of 894 days, without the state disproving prejudice, violated Madplume's right to a speedy trial. The state appealed, but before Madplume responded to the state's opening appeal brief and the state replied, the Supreme Court announced a new speedy trial analysis in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007). In Madplume's case, the parties had applied the test in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), which was partially overruled in Ariegwe. In order to allow the District Court to apply the new Ariegwe test, the case was remanded without prejudice for further speedy trial analysis. St. v. Madplume, 2008 MT 37, 341 M 321, 176 P3d 1071 (2008).

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test: Although acknowledging the general approach for analyzing speedy trial claims articulated in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and the subsequent clarification of the Barker framework in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court noted that Bruce does not actually involve a balancing test, but rather that the first three factors, i.e., length of delay, reason for the delay, and defendant's timely assertion of the right to a speedy trial, act to channel the focus of the analysis to the issue of the fourth factor of prejudice, rendering the second and third factors relatively inconsequential. Because an actual balancing test of the four factors is more likely to produce an accurate assessment of a speedy trial claim, the court revisited the process and revised the analytical framework. None of the factors deserves greater consideration in the balancing. Rather, each factor's significance varies from case to case, and because of the case-specific nature of speedy trial claims, a given factor may outweigh all the others in one case but be of little consequence in another. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), followed in St. v. Howard, 2008 MT 173, 343 M 378, 184 P3d 344 (2008). The Ariegwe speedy trial balancing test was applied in St. v. Hendershot, 2009 MT 292, 352 M 271, 216 P3d 754 (2009).

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor One: Factor one of a speedy trial analysis is the length of the delay, which requires two inquiries, and until there is some delay that is presumptively prejudicial, there is no necessity for inquiry into the other three factors. The first inquiry, a threshold matter, is whether the interval between accusation and trial is sufficient to trigger a speedy trial analysis, which is measured without regard to the fault for the delay and is necessarily dependent on the particular circumstances of the case. A speedy trial claim lacks merit if the interval is less than 200 days, and the interval runs not to the date on which the accused's motion is considered by the court, but rather to the scheduled trial date or the date on which a guilty plea is entered, whichever date represents the date of the disposition of the case. If the interval is 200 days or more, the second inquiry is the extent to which the delay stretches beyond the trigger date. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the court adopted a bright-line 275-day rule of presumptive prejudice beyond which the state was required to provide evidence that the delay was not prejudicial, and if shown, the accused was then required to show evidence of prejudice. However, the Supreme Court decided not to retain the Bruce 275-day rule and instead concluded that the presumption of prejudice exists as of the 200-day trigger date, at which point prejudice is minimal, and escalates over time. Both parties should come forward with evidence regarding prejudice or the lack thereof, and the trial court must weigh each party's evidence. The state's burden to justify the delay increases with the length of the delay. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), following Doggett v. U.S., 505 US 647 (1992).

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor Two: Under the second factor of the speedy trial test, the court first identifies each period of delay in bringing the accused to trial, without considering any actions by the accused or the state that did not result in a postponement of the trial date, and then attributes each period of delay to the appropriate party. The state bears the burden of explaining pretrial delays. Any delay not demonstrated to have been caused by the accused or affirmatively waived by the accused is attributed to the state by default. After identifying and attributing each period of delay in bringing the accused to trial, the court assigns weight to each period based on the specific cause and motive for the delay, depending on the party's culpability in causing it. Thus, the function of factor two in the overall balancing is no longer to conclusively establish a burden shift for the determination of prejudice, but rather the significance is in the specific cause and culpability for each delay. Because the primary burden to ensure that cases are brought to trial is on the courts and prosecutors, the further the delay stretches beyond the 200-day trigger date, the more compelling the state's justification for the delay must be. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), following McNeely v. Blanas, 336 F3d 822 (9th Cir. 2003).

Revised Speedy Trial Balancing Test — Factor Three: The third factor in the speedy trial balancing test is the accused's assertion of the right to a speedy trial. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court established a bright-line rule that no further analysis of this factor was necessary as long as the accused asserted the right to a speedy trial at any time prior to the commencement of trial. However, the court determined here that the overall accuracy of the balancing test is enhanced when the totality of the accused's responses to pretrial delays is considered, thus departing from the nonweighted Bruce approach and restating the factor as the accused's responses to the delay. Whether the accused actually wanted to be brought to trial promptly is an important consideration in ascertaining whether the right to a speedy trial has been violated. Useful indicators of whether and how the accused asserted the speedy trial right are the frequency and force of the accused's objections to pretrial delays and the reasons for any acquiescence by the accused in pretrial delays. Factor three will no longer be considered a procedural formality, but rather will serve as an indicator of whether the accused actually wanted a speedy trial, which in turn informs the inquiry into whether there has been a deprivation of the right. Therefore, under factor three, a trial court must evaluate an accused's responses to the delay, and the totality of the various responses to delays in trial should then be considered together with the other three balancing factors, including the timeliness and persistence of an accused's objections to pretrial delays in determining whether prejudice occurred. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Revised Speedy Trial Test — Factor Four: The fourth factor in a speedy trial analysis is prejudice to the accused, which should be assessed in light of the interests of defendants that the speedy trial right was designed to protect. In Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court expressed those interests as: (1) to prevent oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) to minimize anxiety and concern of the accused; and (3) to limit the possibility that the defense will be impaired by dimming memories and loss of exculpatory evidence. Here, the Supreme Court reaffirmed those considerations as pertinent when evaluating prejudicial delay to an accused and reaffirmed that prejudice may be established based on "any or all" of those considerations. In assessing whether pretrial incarceration is oppressive, the court must consider all circumstances of incarceration. The longer the pretrial incarceration, the more likely it is oppressive and prejudicial, but the complexity of the charged offense is also relevant, and the length of pretrial incarceration that is oppressive is less for a relatively simple offense than for a more complex charge. However, there is no bright-line date on which pretrial incarceration becomes oppressive because that determination varies from case to case based on the specific circumstances of the incarceration. Minimizing anxiety and concern is more subjective and difficult to demonstrate but is nevertheless an interest protected by the speedy trial right and is a pertinent consideration under factor four. The crucial question is whether the delay in bringing the accused to trial has unduly prolonged the disruption of the accused's life or aggravated the anxiety and concern inherent in being accused of a crime. Last, impairment of one's defense is the most difficult form of speedy trial prejudice to prove, so in the absence of affirmative proof that a delay has impaired the accused's ability to present an effective defense, impairment must be assessed based on other analytical factors, such as length of delay, the accused's responses to the delay, and the duration of pretrial incarceration. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

No Prejudice Shown by 338-Day Delay — Speedy Trial Motion Properly Denied: A 426-day delay triggered review of LaGree's speedy trial claim, even though only 338 days were properly attributed to the state. LaGree properly asserted the right to a speedy trial, and the burden was on the state to demonstrate that LaGree was not prejudiced by the delay. In this case, the state met its burden. LaGree did not demonstrate that his pretrial incarceration was extraordinarily prejudicial, that his anxiety was more than marginal, or that defense was prejudiced by the delay. The District Court's denial of LaGree's motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial was affirmed. St. v. LaGree, 2007 MT 65, 336 M 375, 154 P3d 615 (2007), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998).

No Impairment of Defense Following Pretrial Delay of 802 Days: Bowser contended that his defense to drug charges was impaired after a pretrial delay of 802 days and moved to dismiss. The District Court denied the motion, and Bowser appealed. In this case, the state preserved all physical evidence, all of Bowser's witnesses were available to testify at trial, and the state memorialized its evidence through written reports, videotape, and photographs. Bowser offered no evidence and cited no instances in which the pretrial delay impaired his defense, other than a general allegation that witness memory is impaired and a claim of increasing paranoia. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

Trial Delay of 273 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Claim Dismissed Absent Showing of Prejudice by Defendant: Blair was arrested on September 10, 2002, and his trial was eventually held August 18 and 19, 2003. Following conviction, Blair argued that more than 275 days of delay between arrest and trial were attributable to the state, requiring the state to prove that Blair was not prejudiced by the delay, and that the state's failure to carry that burden of proof violated Blair's right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court applied the test in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), to analyze the speedy trial claim. The second Barker factor is the reason for the delay, which attributes delay to either the state or the defendant on a case-by-case basis and determines which party carries the burden to prove prejudice. In this case, the state was responsible for 273 days of delay. The bright line rule established in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), is 275 days, and although the difference was nominal, the burden to show prejudice nevertheless rested with Blair. Blair was unable to prove that he was prejudiced by the pretrial incarceration, that his anxiety and concern were prejudicial, or that the delay impaired his defense, so his speedy trial claim failed. St. v. Blair, 2004 MT 356, 324 M 444, 103 P3d 538 (2004), followed in St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

Failure of State to Demonstrate Good Cause for Trial Delay in Misdemeanor Case — Reversible Error: Defendant was charged with misdemeanor DUI and pleaded not guilty. At the omnibus hearing, a trial date was set, and the Justice's Court set a date for production of evidence and a deadline for defendant to file a jury waiver. Defendant filed nothing in response to the deadlines. Ten days before the trial date, the state moved to vacate and reset the trial date because the County Attorney would be out of town. Efforts to contact defense counsel were unsuccessful, so the court sent a letter to counsel advising of the state's motion and extending the deadline for waiver of a jury trial. More than 7 months after defendant was charged, the case came to trial. Defendant gave no opening statement and presented no evidence or testimony in defense, but instead moved for dismissal for failure to prosecute within 6 months as required in this section. The motion was denied on grounds that any delay was caused by defendant and defense counsel. On appeal to District Court, the motion was again denied. On appeal to the Supreme Court, defendant contended that denial of the dismissal motion was in error because defendant never asked for a trial postponement and because the state did not show good cause for the delay. The state argued that good cause was shown in defendant's lack of compliance with court orders, including the failure to file a waiver of a jury trial and to comply with discovery requests. However, the record revealed no connection between defendant's failure to comply with the court's orders and the failure to prosecute the case within 6 months. The state's request for continuance did not reference defendant's failure to comply with court orders or that the failure to do so necessitated a continuance beyond the 6-month deadline. Thus, because the state failed to show good cause for the delay, the motion to dismiss should have been granted, so the Supreme Court reversed the District Court and dismissed the charge. St. v. Bertolino, 2003 MT 266, 317 M 453, 77 P3d 543 (2003).

Original Misdemeanor Charges Dismissed and Refiled With Felony Charge — Joinder of Charges Establishing New Case: Following an automobile accident, Topp was charged in Justice's Court with two misdemeanors to which he pleaded not guilty. The charges were subsequently dismissed, and the state filed a new information in District Court recharging Topp with the misdemeanors plus felony criminal endangerment. Topp argued that the misdemeanor charges should be dismissed because they were not prosecuted within 6 months, as required by this section. The Supreme Court held that this section did not apply in this case. When the original misdemeanor charges were dismissed, there were no longer charges pending against Topp, so there was no requirement for prosecution. As set out in St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), as long as Justice's Court jurisdiction is exhausted within 6 months by some action that authorizes appeal de novo to the District Court, this section is satisfied. Thus, when the charges were joined in District Court, the action became a case de novo, so the District Court did not err in denying Topp's motion to dismiss the misdemeanor charges on speedy trial grounds. St. v. Topp, 2003 MT 209, 317 M 59, 75 P3d 330 (2003).

Burden of Proof Erroneously Applied to Speedy Trial Analysis — Remand: The District Court improperly attributed less than 275 days of trial delay to the state and then erroneously held that the burden was on defendant to prove that the delay was prejudicial. On appeal, both parties conceded that the state was responsible for more than 275 days, thus the burden should have shifted to the state to show that defendant was not prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court was unable to conduct a meaningful review of the evidence when the burden was erroneously applied by the trial court, so the case was remanded so that the trial court could reconsider its speedy trial analysis after properly acknowledging that the burden of proof was with the state rather than with defendant. St. v. Ray, 2003 MT 171, 316 M 354, 71 P3d 1247 (2003), following Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972).

Trial Delay of 342 Days — No Speedy Trial Violation Given Sufficient Rebuttal of Presumption of Prejudice: Following a delay of at least 342 days, Stiffarm moved to dismiss assault charges on grounds that his right to a speedy trial was violated. Applying Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court analyzed the four factors used in determining whether a defendant is denied the constitutional right to a speedy trial. The first three factors were conceded or undisputed, so the court considered the fourth factor—whether the defense was prejudiced by the delay. Regarding pretrial incarceration, the court agreed that most of any prejudice Stiffarm suffered was due to the natural consequences of Stiffarm's prior and alleged conduct. Stiffarm had to remain in jail because of the inability to meet the $150,000 bail, which was set at that amount because of the severity of the charged offense, because Stiffarm was on probation for a prior felony when the alleged offense occurred, and because of Stiffarm's extensive prior criminal record. Any presumption of prejudice from pretrial anxiety was adequately rebutted by testimony that Stiffarm had been depressed prior to incarceration and that with medication and counseling received in jail, the depression had actually improved. Finally, with respect to impairment of defense based on the alleged unavailability of witnesses, the state presented affidavit testimony of witnesses who indicated that their memories of the alleged incident were intact and that all evidence held by the state was preserved. Thus, the state adequately rebutted the presumption of prejudice, and absent any demonstration of further prejudice by Stiffarm, denial of the motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds was affirmed. St. v. Stiffarm, 2003 MT 70, 314 M 499, 67 P3d 249 (2003).

Defendant Out of State for Six Years — Speedy Trial Right Preserved by Diligent Good Faith Prosecution: Longhorn was charged with felony sexual assault, and a warrant was issued for his arrest. However, Longhorn was in Oklahoma, and the warrant was not served until 6 years later. At trial, Longhorn moved to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, but the motion was denied, and Longhorn was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the test in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if Longhorn's speedy trial rights were violated. The court noted that the right to a speedy trial commences when a defendant becomes an accused, and if an accused is out of state, the state must act diligently and in good faith to acquire jurisdiction. The District Court found that the state acted diligently, and the Supreme Court concurred. The prearrest time was properly attributed to Longhorn, and he bore the burden of showing that he was prejudiced by the delay. The Supreme Court applied St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001), in evaluating the potential prejudice based on the three interests that speedy trials are designed to protect: (1) prevention of oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) minimization of the defendant's anxiety and concern; and (3) avoidance of impairment of the defense. The court concluded that Longhorn did not prove prejudice, so the speedy trial motion was properly denied. St. v. Longhorn, 2002 MT 135, 310 M 172, 49 P3d 48 (2002).

Delay of 391 Days Attributable to State — Speedy Trial Analysis Triggered — Remand for Determination of Whether State Can Prove Lack of Prejudice: A.G., a juvenile charged with felony vehicle theft, being a runaway, and curfew violation, moved to dismiss the charges for lack of a speedy trial 2 months before a scheduled hearing. The District Court subsequently attributed 229 of 392 days of delay to the state, concluded that the right to a speedy trial was not violated, and placed the burden on A.G. to show that the delay was prejudicial. Applying the criteria in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), the Supreme Court found that the District Court incorrectly calculated the length of delay, which was actually 455 days. As established in Billings v. Bruce, any delay over 200 days triggers further speedy trial analysis. Because of a miscommunication between the juvenile probation office and the County Attorney, the state neglected to diligently move the case toward prosecution, and A.G. was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case or to help the state avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Further, the District Court mistakenly placed the burden of proving prejudice on A.G., when in actuality, the burden was on the state to prove a lack of prejudice. The Supreme Court remanded for a hearing to determine whether A.G. was prejudiced by the 455-day delay. In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002).

Sufficient Proof of Lack of Prejudice to Defendant Caused by 362-Day Trial Delay — Claim of Lack of Speedy Trial Properly Denied: Good satisfied three of the four speedy trial factors in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514 (1972), and Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998): (1) more than 200 days of delay were attributable to the state, triggering speedy trial analysis; (2) the delay was caused by the state's failure to locate Good's motions, trial court institutional delay, and failure of the state to diligently prosecute; and (3) Good properly asserted his speedy trial right 7 days before trial. However, the fourth factor, a showing that Good was prejudiced by the delay, was not met. Good suffered no pretrial incarceration and conceded that the defense was not impaired by the delay. Good's pretrial anxiety and concern stemmed from the nature of the charges, rather than the delay. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that Good was not denied a speedy trial. St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002).

Burden of Showing Lack of Prejudice in Trial Delay Met by State — Dismissal of Speedy Trial Motion Affirmed: Price was convicted in City Court in July 1994 for DUI and resisting arrest and appealed to District Court. The District Court ruled that the notice of appeal was untimely and dismissed the appeal. Price appealed that dismissal to the Supreme Court, which ruled in 1995 that the appeal was timely and remanded to District Court for trial (see St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084 (1995)). Following remand, trial was delayed until April 1997. Five days before trial, Price moved to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. On the day of trial, the District Court considered the motion, denied it, and proceeded to trial, and Price was convicted of DUI. Price subsequently appealed denial of the speedy trial issue. The Supreme Court applied the revised Barker test set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine whether Price was prejudiced by the delay. Because of the length of delay attributable to the state, the burden shifted to the state to show that Price was not prejudiced by the delay. Applying the Bruce standard, the Supreme Court evaluated prejudice based on the presence of oppressive pretrial incarceration, Price's level of anxiety and concern, and impairment of the defense. In this case, the state met its burden of showing that Price was not prejudiced by the delay. Price was not incarcerated prior to trial, so pretrial incarceration was not a factor. Price's original City Court sentence was stayed pending the de novo appeal to District Court, which prevented the DUI conviction from appearing on Price's driving record and adversely affecting Price's driving privileges or ability to obtain insurance. Thus, Price's life affairs were protected from the impact of the pending charge and conviction, so Price did not suffer more than the normal anxiety and concern associated with the charge. Last, the state reinterviewed the witnesses several times over the course of the proceeding, so witness memories were not diminished, and Price conducted much of the case pro se, so it was obvious that his memory was not diminished either. This constituted sufficient evidence that Price's defense was not impaired by the delay, so the District Court did not err in dismissing the speedy trial claim. St. v. Price, 2001 MT 212, 306 M 381, 34 P3d 112 (2001).

Failure to Show Prejudice in Delayed DUI Trial Based on Pretrial Anxiety: Stuart was arrested for DUI, and after a delay of more than 200 days, moved for dismissal on grounds of denial of a speedy trial. The motion was denied, and Stuart ultimately was convicted, but timely asserted the right to a speedy trial on appeal. The Supreme Court applied the analysis set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if prejudice occurred. No single factor is determinative, and each must be weighed in light of the facts of the case. The only disputed factor was the possible anxiety caused by the pretrial delay that might have placed Stuart's employment as a commercial driver in limbo; however, Stuart conceded that he had received full-time employment as a commercial truck driver about 6 months after the DUI charge. Affidavits from Stuart and his wife addressed the anxiety factor, but did not transcend the generic anxiety inherent in being accused of a crime. Stuart failed to establish prejudice once the state met its burden of showing a lack of prejudice, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Stuart, 2001 MT 178, 306 M 189, 31 P3d 353 (2001).

Trial Delay of 761 Days on Bad Check Charges — Facts Discharging State's Burden of Disproving Prejudice: Boese's trial for issuing bad checks was delayed 761 days, sufficient to bring about a speedy trial analysis. A total of 176 days was attributable to the state because the arresting officer failed to return the served arrest warrant, and 289 days were institutional delay, also attributable to the state. Boese asserted the right to a speedy trial in a timely manner, so the burden shifted to the state to show that the delay was not prejudicial. Boese contended that the burden was not properly shifted, but the order regarding Boese's motion to dismiss demonstrated otherwise. Thus, the Supreme Court applied the analysis set out in Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), to determine if prejudice occurred, examining pretrial incarceration, anxiety caused by the pretrial delay, and whether Boese's defense was damaged by the delay. Because Boese was incarcerated on other charges for most of the time prior to trial, the pretrial incarceration was not oppressive based on the charges in this case. The likelihood of anxiety from delay was contraindicated by the frequency with which Boese changed his plea, adding to the delay, and any increased anxiety was more likely caused by the other, more serious unrelated charges facing Boese. Finally, the nature of the bad check case was not fact-sensitive and depended primarily on documentary evidence and interpretation of that evidence, which was not evanescent and not likely to change because of the trial delay. These facts were sufficient to discharge the state's burden of disproving prejudice, and the District Court did not err in denying Boese's motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001).

Failure to Show That Pretrial Delay Impaired Defense Based on Unavailability or Loss of Exculpatory Evidence — No Prejudice: Ellenburg asserted that his defense was impaired as a result of the delay caused by his incarceration from arrest until trial, which prevented his access to business documents that would have been exculpatory, and that the delay prejudiced him as a result of the state's loss or destruction of the documents seized from his office. However, Ellenburg failed to describe the documents that he could not access or to explain how they could help in his defense, nor did he ask his attorney or anyone else to procure the documents for him, thus also failing to meet the burden of proving that the documents, if they existed, were material and exculpatory. Any delay in bringing the case to trial based on a loss or unavailability of exculpatory evidence was not a prejudicial impairment of the defense. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Failure to Show Prejudice From 230-Day Pretrial Delay Caused by State's Institutional and Unintentional Delays: A pretrial delay of 230 days having triggered a speedy trial analysis, the Supreme Court examined the delay for prejudice to Johnson and found that all 230 days were attributable to the state: 190 days of unintentional delay because of two continuance motions necessary to secure the appearance at trial of prosecution witnesses and 40 days of institutional delay because of the District Court's sua sponte continuance because of calendar conflicts. Docket delays weigh less heavily against the state than purposeful delays, of which there was no evidence. The delay was not the result of intentional or purposeful foot-dragging on the part of the state, nor was there any indication that the state harbored any motive for delaying Johnson's trial; therefore, the degree of fault of the state was minimal. Johnson was thus not unduly prejudiced by the pretrial delay in and of itself, so the state did not bear the burden of rebutting presumptive prejudice, proof of which fell on Johnson. After weighing the four prongs of the Barker test (407 US 514), the Supreme Court affirmed denial of Johnson's motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds, holding that Johnson failed to show adequate proof of prejudice because of pretrial incarceration, economic hardships, or impairment of defense. St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998), and distinguishing St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494 (1982).

Anxiety During Preindictment Period Insufficient to Trigger Prejudice Establishing Due Process or Speedy Trial Violation: In January 1996, Burt's former employer filed suit to recover more than $250,000 that Burt allegedly stole while employed as office manager and bookkeeper for the business. In January 1997, the state filed an information charging Burt with five counts of felony theft. In October 1998, Burt was convicted on all counts and later appealed, alleging that the preindictment delay between the time when the state could have filed charges and the time when the information was actually filed violated her due process rights and that she suffered actual prejudice in the effect of the delay on her health and emotions. Applying the two-step analysis in St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773 (1998), the Supreme Court held that, without more, Burt was not prejudiced by the preindictment delay simply because of her anxiety. Anxiety, no matter how real, does not in itself impair the accused in defending against a charge and thus does not qualify as prejudice in the due process context. The delay did not cause a loss of witnesses or evidence, nor did requiring Burt to stand trial violate the fundamental conceptions of justice that lie at the base of our civil and political institutions and that define the community's sense of fair play and decency. Burt was not incarcerated. Her stress was not excessive. Her economic hardship, the stigma of being charged with a crime for the first time, and her recourse to a psychiatrist could not be considered consequences of the pretrial delay. Although a total of 208 days of institutional delay was chargeable to the state, the remainder was chargeable to Burt. Absent a showing of prejudice, the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Burt, 2000 MT 115, 299 M 412, 3 P3d 597, 57 St. Rep. 482 (2000), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866 (1998). See also St. v. Mouser, 806 P2d 330 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991).

Reasonable Delay Because of Complex "Eve of Trial" Motion Attributable to Defendant — Court Delay Attributable to State — 433-Day Delay Prejudicial: When a defendant files an "eve of trial" motion that raises a complex legal issue or requires an evidentiary hearing, making the original trial date impracticable, the reasonable period of delay caused thereby is attributable to the defendant. Here, Kipp's motion to quash was heard 19 days before the original trial date. At that time, the District Court vacated the trial date and stated that another date would be set after the motion to quash was considered. The court set a briefing schedule, but no new trial date. When a trial court, for its own reasons, vacates a trial date and does not set a new date, the delay is attributable to the state; therefore, the delay from the motion to quash until the court issued its decision was institutional delay attributable to the state. Further, the 5-month delay between the court's decision and the state's request for a new trial date was also attributable to the state. With a total of 433 days of institutional delay, the burden shifted to the state to prove that Kipp was not prejudiced. The state offered no evidence to rebut Kipp's contention that she was prejudiced by anxiety and concern because: (1) she was the custodial parent of two minor children; (2) she was faced with potential incarceration; (3) she was denied employment because of the charges; and (4) her defense was impaired because of the loss of a main witness as a result of delay attributable to the state. Kipp's right to a speedy trial was thus violated, so the Supreme Court reversed the conviction and dismissed the charges. St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999), following Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866, 55 St. Rep. 750 (1998). Kipp was distinguished, as to impairment of defense, in St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000).

Six-Month Speedy Trial Limit Inapplicable by Its Terms to Trials De Novo in District Court on Appeal: Stanko was convicted in Justice's Court of reckless driving and appealed to the District Court. Before the Supreme Court, Stanko argued that his case should have been dismissed by the District Court because more than 6 months had elapsed between the time that he filed his appeal to District Court and the time of his trial. The Supreme Court pointed out that the limitation in this section applies only "after the entry of a plea" and that because there is no plea entered in an appeal to District Court, the statute and its 6-month limit was not intended to be applied to those appeals held as a trial de novo. The Supreme Court also held that Stanko's argument that application of the 6-month limit is outmoded because of the requirement for one jury trial contained in 46-17-201 was not persuasive because the method of disposition of the case in Justice's Court is immaterial to the application of the 6-month speedy trial limitation. (Annotator's note: The requirement contained in 46-17-201 for one jury trial was held unconstitutional in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep 1298 (1998).) For these reasons, the Supreme Court said that it would continue to adhere to the rule of St. v. Mantz, 269 M 135, 887 P2d 251 (1994), that the 6-month speedy trial limitation does not apply to trials de novo on appeal from Justice's Court to District Court. St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Revised Speedy Trial Analysis — Barker Test Clarified: In an attempt to harmonize numerous disparate rulings on the right to a speedy trial, the Supreme Court held that the general guidelines for review of claims of denial of a speedy trial contained in Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 33 L Ed 2d 101, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972), are to be applied on a case-by-case basis to the unique circumstances of each claim. The factors to be considered do not have talismanic qualities, and courts must still engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. There is not some magical time for assertion of the right to a speedy trial that should be weighed more favorably to the defendant than some other time. As long as the defendant files a motion to dismiss prior to trial, the right to a speedy trial is properly asserted. To initially calculate the length of delay, the period from the time that charges are filed until the trial date is determined without assignment of fault to either party for the various delays. If the delay is 200 days or more, further speedy trial analysis is triggered. In determining the reasons for the delay, time of delay is assigned to either the state or the defendant. Then the determination is made as to whether the delay attributable to the state is 275 days or more, at which point the burden shifts to the state to demonstrate that the delay has not prejudiced the defendant. The state's proof should take into consideration but need not include the three traditional bases for determining prejudice: (1) pretrial incarceration; (2) anxiety and its attendant considerations; and (3) impairment of the defense. In determining whether the state has met its burden, the court should consider the fact that direct proof of a defendant's state of mind may not always be possible and that the state's ability to anticipate the nature of the defense varies from case to case. The third consideration is whether the right to a speedy trial is properly invoked before trial, either by demand of a speedy trial or by motion to dismiss for failure to provide a speedy trial. Once that motion is made, the District Court must rule on it prior to trial; however, any delay directly attributable to a motion to dismiss that is filed less than 10 days before trial is assignable to the defendant. The fourth consideration, whether the defense was prejudiced, includes the three traditional bases for determining prejudice stated above. In the present case, the city of Billings was responsible for prosecuting the defendant, and a 447-day delay attributable to the state sufficiently prejudiced the defense to warrant reversal of defendant's conviction on speedy trial grounds. The defendant was under no obligation to ensure diligent prosecution of the case against him or to help the city avoid dismissal for failure to timely prosecute. Billings v. Bruce, 1998 MT 186, 290 M 148, 965 P2d 866, 55 St. Rep. 750 (1998), followed in St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998), in which the Supreme Court clarified the second speedy trial factor set out in Billings v. Bruce in holding that if the state can show lack of prejudice on only one of the three traditional bases of prejudice, it must, at a minimum, address the question of whether there has been an impairment of the defense. Hardaway was followed in St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000). If the state satisfies its burden of demonstrating that defendant has not been prejudiced by the delay, the burden shifts to defendant to show prejudice. Billings v. Bruce was also followed in St. v. Olmsted, 1998 MT 301, 292 M 66, 968 P2d 1154, 55 St. Rep. 1235 (1998), St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998), St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999), St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000), St. v. Taylor, 2000 MT 202, 300 M 499, 5 P3d 1019, 57 St. Rep. 794 (2000), St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000), St. v. Highpine, 2000 MT 368, 303 M 422, 15 P3d 938, 57 St. Rep. 1573 (2000), St. v. Boese, 2001 MT 175, 306 M 169, 30 P3d 1092 (2001), St. v. Stuart, 2001 MT 178, 306 M 189, 31 P3d 353 (2001), St. v. Price, 2001 MT 212, 306 M 381, 34 P3d 112 (2001), St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), and In re A.G., 2002 MT 111, 309 M 491, 47 P3d 831 (2002). See also St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134 (1996). The 10-day rule in Billings v. Bruce, providing that any delay directly attributable to a motion to dismiss based on denial of a speedy trial that is filed less than 10 days prior to trial will be assigned to the defendant, was modified in St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007), to provide that any delay directly attributable to the filing of a speedy trial motion less than 30 days prior to a scheduled trial date is chargeable to the accused. The requirement that a motion to dismiss on speedy trial grounds must be ruled on prior to trial was reaffirmed in Ariegwe, and an additional requirement added that the trial court must enter findings of fact and conclusions of law with respect to each of the four speedy trial balancing factors and how the factors were balanced against each other.

Defendant's Motion for Continuance Negating Speedy Trial Provision: The 6-month period for trial of a misdemeanor charge is the general rule. When, as here, defendant moves for a continuance, the expiration of the 6-month period no longer requires dismissal. St. v. Chesarek, 1998 MT 15, 287 M 215, 953 P2d 698, 55 St. Rep. 53 (1998). See also St. v. Ronningen, 213 M 358, 691 P2d 1348 (1984), and St. v. Crane, 240 M 235, 784 P2d 901 (1989).

"Months" Defined as Calendar Months: Under this section, a misdemeanor charge must be dismissed if not brought to trial within 6 months after entry of a plea. The language referring to "6 months" means 6 calendar months, not 180 days. St. v. Hayes, 1998 MT 14, 287 M 210, 953 P2d 700, 55 St. Rep. 51 (1998).

Admissibility of Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Results for Probable Cause Purposes Only — Clarification and Effect of Orders Suppressing Evidence — Grant of Motion to Exclude Inadmissible Evidence Not Considered Order Suppressing Evidence: The state sought to have the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test admitted into evidence in a DUI case. The City Court denied the motion, and the state immediately appealed to District Court, contending that in denying the motion, the City Court had suppressed evidence and that the statutory 6-month limit on trial of misdemeanors in this section was thus exhausted. The Supreme Court noted that the results of a preliminary alcohol screening test pursuant to 61-8-409 are not substantive evidence of the amount of alcohol present in a person's body but instead are an estimate of alcohol concentration only for the purpose of establishing probable cause to believe that a person is under the influence of alcohol prior to making an arrest. An order that suppresses evidence is an order that excludes evidence on the grounds that the evidence was illegally obtained and does not include a pretrial order that excludes evidence based on rules of evidence, such as relevancy, probative value, or statutory inadmissibility. Thus, the City Court order excluding preliminary alcohol screening test results was not an order suppressing evidence but rather an order determining that the results were not substantive evidence at all; therefore, there was no statutory basis under 46-20-103(2)(e) for appeal to District Court. Because City Court jurisdiction was not exhausted by some action authorizing appeal to the District Court, subsection (2) of this section was not satisfied and defendant, who made no move to postpone, was entitled to dismissal of the DUI charge with prejudice pursuant to subsection (2) of this section on grounds that he had not received a timely trial. St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997), following St. v. Carney, 219 M 412, 714 P2d 532 (1986), and St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), overruling inconsistent holdings in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428 (1986), and St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543 (1992), and followed, with regard to limited admissibility of preliminary breath test evidence, in St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003). See also St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003), and St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 334, 324 M 173, 103 P3d 503 (2004).

Two-Month Delay in Holding Omnibus Hearing Caused by Defendant — Trial Six and One-Half Months After Charge: Defendant was charged with a misdemeanor on August 23 and on March 7 moved for dismissal for failure to try him within 6 months. The trial date had been set for March 26. Approximately 1 month of the 6 ½-month delay was caused by defendant's failure to appear at an omnibus hearing. Defendant's request for a postponement of the hearing after the originally scheduled hearing was rescheduled caused another 1-month delay. The District Court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. Any pretrial motion for a continuance by defendant that has the incidental effect of delaying the trial beyond the 6-month time limit can be said to postpone the trial for purposes of application of that limit. St. v. Fitzgerald, 283 M 162, 940 P2d 108, 54 St. Rep. 545 (1997).

Delay of 363 Days, With 217 Attributable to Defendant Who Suffered Minor Prejudice From Delay: If denial of a speedy trial is claimed in a case appealed by the state from Justice's Court to the District Court, the time for calculating the length of the delay commences on the date on which the state files its notice of appeal. The state filed its appeal on November 30, 1993, trial was scheduled for May 2, 1994, and the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial was denied on April 25, 1994, 153 days after the state's appeal was filed. Trial was held 363 days after the state's appeal was filed. Defendant was responsible for the last 217 days of the delay because of his motion to dismiss. Moreover, he failed to object to the order vacating the trial date and continuing the evidentiary hearing. However, his motion to dismiss was timely filed. He was not subjected to pretrial incarceration, and the record did not show that he suffered undue anxiety or concern over the delay or that his defense was impaired. The District Court correctly denied the motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Six-Month Rule Not Applicable When Defendant Tried in Justice's Court and Case Appealed to District Court: The 6-month rule in this section does not apply when defendant is tried in Justice's Court and the case is appealed for trial de novo in the District Court. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996), followed in St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Right to Speedy Trial Violated — Dismissal Correct: Defendant was charged with alternate counts of forgery or theft. After a 298-day delay, attributable solely to the state, defendant moved to dismiss for lack of speedy trial, and the District Court granted the motion. The state appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. When the delay resulted from the court's failure to arraign the defendant, from its failure to rule on the defendant's pretrial motions, and from the prosecution's lack of diligence, the District Court was correct in granting the defendant's speedy trial motion and in dismissing the charges with prejudice. The Barker v. Wingo factors applied. St. v. Matthews, 271 M 24, 894 P2d 285, 52 St. Rep. 305 (1995), followed in St. v. Keating, 285 M 463, 949 P2d 251, 54 St. Rep. 1250 (1997).

Six-Month Rule Applicable Only to Initial Trial in Justice's Court: Mantz was found guilty of misdemeanor assault in Justice's Court and appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo on January 22, 1993. On December 7, 1993, Mantz filed a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial, maintaining that under this section, a defendant cannot be brought to trial on a misdemeanor charge after 6 months. As set out in St. v. Sunford, 244 M 411, 796 P2d 1084 (1990), this section is inapplicable to situations in which a case comes from Justice's Court to a trial de novo in District Court. Because the District Court in this case properly applied the Barker v. Wingo test for determining speedy trial in finding that this section applies only to the initial trial in Justice's Court, the motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. Mantz, 269 M 135, 887 P2d 251, 51 St. Rep. 1527 (1994). Sunford and Mantz were followed in St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Remand Not Authorized: This section allows a District Court to dismiss a complaint, information, or indictment, but remand is not authorized. Rickett v. Billings, 262 M 339, 864 P2d 762, 50 St. Rep. 1586 (1993), affirming Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677 (1981).

Failure to Grant Praecipe to Dismiss Misdemeanor Charge to Allow Pursuit of Felony Charge — Reversible Error: The state filed a praecipe in Justice's Court to dismiss a misdemeanor domestic abuse (now partner or family member assault) charge on the basis that a felony sexual assault charge was being prosecuted in District Court. The Justice of the Peace did not rule on the praecipe at the time that it was filed, instead proceeding to sentence defendant on the lesser offense. In moving for dismissal of a misdemeanor charge, the state need only show that dismissal would be in the furtherance of justice, and having met that standard, the court may not deny the motion to dismiss. Failure to grant the state's praecipe to dismiss constituted reversible error. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Failure of District Court to Grant Motions to Dismiss as Directed by Attorney General for Government Misconduct — Violation of Separation of Powers: The Attorney General directed the Lincoln County Attorney to file motions to dismiss charges against certain criminal defendants for the reason that outrageous government misconduct had occurred in the course of the prosecution. The Lincoln County Attorney filed the motions, but they were denied by the District Court. In a proceeding for supervisory control, the Supreme Court held that the Attorney General was within his authority to direct the County Attorney to move to dismiss the charges and held that the Attorney General's conclusion that there had been outrageous government misconduct in the cases served as a basis under subsection (1) of this section for the District Court to dismiss the charges. The refusal of the District Court to dismiss the charges was an abuse of discretion and a violation of the doctrine of separation of powers. By refusing to grant the motions to dismiss, the District Court intruded upon the lawful functions of the County Attorney and the Attorney General, who belong to the Executive Branch of government. State ex rel. Fletcher v. District Court, 260 M 410, 859 P2d 992, 50 St. Rep. 992 (1993). See also St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Reset of Speedy Trial Clock Following Mistrial: When a mistrial is declared, the speedy trial clock is reset and begins to run from the date the mistrial was declared. It was error for the District Court to include the period of time prior to mistrial in its calculation of total elapsed time. St. v. Strong, 258 M 48, 851 P2d 415, 50 St. Rep. 418 (1993). See also St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), adopting in part Section 2.2 of the American Bar Association Project on Minimum Standards for Criminal Justice.

Arrest Two Years and Five Months From Date of Offense — No Denial of Due Process: There was no violation of the statute of limitations or denial of defendant's due process rights when an arrest warrant was executed 1 year and 9 months from the date it was issued (2 years and 5 months from the date of the offense). St. v. Cummins, 257 M 491, 850 P2d 952, 50 St. Rep. 377 (1993).

Client Bound by Attorney's Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial — Purpose of Statute: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that he, the defendant, was not bound by his attorney's waiver. Defendant asserted that 37-61-401 makes the waiver binding only if it was entered with the defendant's knowledge or upon the record in open court. Citing Bush v. Baker, 46 M 535, 129 P 550 (1913), the Supreme Court ruled that 37-61-401 has been applied only as to agreements between attorneys and that the purpose of that section is to relieve the presiding judge of the burden of determining disputes between attorneys concerning their unexecuted agreements. The Supreme Court stated that it would not apply 37-61-401 literally as to agreements between an attorney and the court because to do so would lead to absurd consequences and greatly retard the business of the courts. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was thus bound by his counsel's waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Clock to Start With Date of De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because the clock should have started with the date of his arrest, not the date of appeal to District Court. Citing St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), the Supreme Court noted that it had adopted Standard 12-2.2(c) of the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice. The standard provides that in cases of appeal or an order for a new trial, the time for trial should begin running with the order granting the new trial or, in this case, the date of appeal to District Court. The Supreme Court determined not to abandon that standard and therefore held that defendant's trial was within the 6-month limitation of this section. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Not Denied by Application of Six-Month Speedy Trial Limitation to De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because it is prejudicial to apply the speedy trial standards of this section to an appeal from Justice's Court to District Court. The Supreme Court held that the argument was without merit because the 6-month limit was met in this case, both in the time for trial in Justice's Court and in the time for trial de novo in District Court. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Uncertain Testimony of Defense Counsel Insufficient to Disprove Oral Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial: At the time scheduled for defendant's trial in Justice's Court on a DUI charge, the Justice of the Peace called defense counsel into his chambers and informed him that a different date for trial was necessary because of another trial then in progress. The Justice of the Peace then issued a written order reciting the fact that an oral motion for a continuance was made by defense counsel, along with an oral waiver of defendant's right to a speedy trial. Trial was then set for a date beyond the 6-month limitation provided for in this section. In a de novo appeal to District Court, defendant raised the issue of his right to a speedy trial, and defense counsel testified he could not remember whether he made an oral motion for continuance and a waiver. The Supreme Court found that the Justice's Court's order was presumed correct under 26-1-602(17) and that the testimony of defense counsel did not demonstrate that the order was in error in reciting the waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Prosecution's Failure to Seek Dismissal of Defendant's Appeal Not Denial of Right to Speedy Trial: The defendant filed a notice of appeal with the City Court after being convicted of his fourth DUI. The defendant's attorney failed to complete and return a praecipe to transmit the record to District Court within the 30-day time limit. The request for transmittal was not submitted until a year and a half later. The defendant argued that the prosecution, in failing to bring him to trial or to move to have the appeal dismissed, violated his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court held that the delay was a result of the defendant's attorney's actions and that therefore the state had not violated the defendant's rights. St. v. Speith, 244 M 392, 797 P2d 221, 47 St. Rep. 1630 (1990).

Six-Month Time Limit for Misdemeanor Trial Not Violated When Defendant Requested Delay: The defendant in a DUI case asked for a continuance to enter a guilty plea so that the 5-year period would run on a prior DUI conviction before his guilty plea on the second violation. Subsequently, the defendant pleaded not guilty and moved for dismissal on the basis that the statutory 6-month period to try a misdemeanor had elapsed. The Supreme Court held that the 6-month period did not run when it was the defendant rather than the state who was responsible for the delay. St. v. Crane, 240 M 235, 784 P2d 901, 46 St. Rep. 2082 (1989).

Time Necessary to Adjudicate Pretrial Motions — Delay Justified: Defendant contended that a delay caused by the state mandated dismissal because his speedy trial rights were violated. Part of the delays associated with pretrial controversies regarding appointment of counsel, request for transcript, motion to dismiss, and change of venue motion was properly attributable to the state; however, the delay caused by the pretrial motions and appeals was justified by the complexity and need for evidence in the counsel issue and by the lack of a showing that the prosecution acted intentionally to delay. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494 (1982).

Defendant Liable for 83 of 189 Days — Motion on Day of Trial — No Unfair Prejudice Shown From Denial: The time between arrest and trial was 189 days, and defendant's two granted motions for continuance accounted for 83 days, making the remaining 106 days well within Montana's acceptable delay limit. Asserting the right to a speedy trial on the day of the trial was not timely. No unfair prejudice was shown to result from denial of the motion. The court properly denied a motion to dismiss for lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Walker, 225 M 415, 733 P2d 352, 44 St. Rep. 363 (1987).

Denial of Speedy Trial — Failure to Meet Threshold Test: Kerns appealed forgery conviction, arguing that District Court's denial of motions to dismiss for lack of speedy trial constituted institutional delay and violated his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court ruled that unless there is a period of delay long enough to be presumptively prejudicial, no inquiry is required. Since Kerns failed to meet Montana's four-part threshold test, no presumption of delay attaches. St. v. Kerns, 223 M 172, 725 P2d 1190, 43 St. Rep. 1632 (1986), followed in St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988).

Institutional Delay — No Prejudice When Defendant Already Incarcerated: A 256-day delay triggered the four-part Barker test and shifted the burden to the prosecution to give a reasonable excuse for the delay or show why the delay did not prejudice the defendant. Sixty-one days of the delay were attributable to defendants; the remaining 195 days were attributable to institutional delay, which weighs less heavily against the state in the Barker balancing process. Defendant was not prejudiced by the delay because he was already incarcerated on another charge and there was no evidence of additional or unusual anxiety. St. v. Palmer, 223 M 25, 723 P2d 956, 43 St. Rep. 1503 (1986).

Delay Charged to Defendant — Waiver of Speedy Trial by Defendant: No denial of defendant's right to speedy trial occurred where defendant had previously filed multiple waivers of his right to speedy trial, pending a great number of motions and voluminous supporting briefs, and subsequently was granted an extension to allow substitution of counsel, which resulted in an additional 2-month delay. St. v. Harvey, 219 M 402, 713 P2d 517, 43 St. Rep. 46 (1986).

DUI — 13-Month Delay — Failure to Rebut Presumption of Prejudice: Defendant was not tried on DUI charge for nearly 13 months after being charged. The Supreme Court held that the delay of 13 months was sufficient to shift burden to the prosecution to explain reason for delay and to create a presumption that the delay had prejudiced the defendant. Here the prosecution neither explained the delay nor offered evidence to rebut the presumption of prejudice. Hamilton v. Hayden, 218 M 425, 709 P2d 156, 42 St. Rep. 1708 (1985).

Delay of 52 Days for Transfer to Answer Another County's Charges — No Violation: For speedy trial purposes, a 52-day delay during which defendant was transferred to another county to answer charges filed in that county could not be charged against the state. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

General Extradition Delay Rules: For speedy trial purposes, those days during which an accused resists extradition will be included in the period of delay, and only those days will be charged against the accused. Those days during which the prosecution either does not diligently demand extradition or diligently pursue it will be included in the period of delay and charged against the prosecution. Those days during which the prosecution diligently pursues extradition and the accused does not resist it will not be included in the period of delay, and inclusion of those days, as in St. v. Ackley, 201 M 252, 653 P2d 851, 39 St. Rep. 2091 (1982), is no longer the rule. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

No Presumption of Prejudice — 104-Day Delay: For speedy trial purposes, a 104-day delay was well within the guidelines for acceptable length of delay and was not presumptively prejudicial. Thus, the other three parts of the Barker test need not be considered. St. v. Robbins, 218 M 107, 708 P2d 227, 42 St. Rep. 1440 (1985).

Delay of Nine Months Caused by Defendant: Although the defendant was not brought to trial for 9 months, the State met its burden of showing there was a reasonable excuse for this delay and the defendant was not prejudiced. During that period, defense counsel achieved several substitutions of judges and pursued various defense theories. The defendant was responsible for much of the delay in being brought to trial. His continued incarceration was attributable to actions by defense counsel in preparing a defense. Such incarceration was not oppressive for purposes of the speedy trial right. The delay of the defense will not serve as grounds for denial of the right to a speedy trial. St. v. Cutner, 214 M 189, 692 P2d 466, 41 St. Rep. 2404 (1984).

Defendant Not Prejudiced by 214-Day Institutional Delay: Defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial. He was ready for trial, and the State indicated its readiness for trial in a timely fashion. There were no oppressive tactics employed. The cause for the 214-day delay is narrowed to pure institutional delay, and only that may be balanced against the defendant's prejudice. The State carried its burden of showing lack of prejudice, and, when the burden shifted, the defendant failed to present evidence that he was prejudiced by the delay. St. v. Chavez, 213 M 434, 691 P2d 1365, 41 St. Rep. 2219 (1984), followed in St. v. Haskins, 220 M 199, 714 P2d 119, 43 St. Rep. 290 (1986). See also St. v. Bartnes, 234 M 522, 764 P2d 1271, 45 St. Rep. 2101 (1988).

Prosecution Dismissed When State Does Not Show Good Cause for Six-Month Misdemeanor Delay: On October 12, 1983, the State filed a misdemeanor charge against the defendant. On the same day, he appeared and pleaded not guilty and the court set trial for February 28, 1984, well within the statutory 6-month deadline. On January 15, 1984, the assigned trial judge announced his retirement effective February 3, 1984. On April 12, 1984 (the precise date on which 6 months had expired from the date the defendant had entered his plea), defense counsel moved to dismiss the complaint because the defendant had not been tried within the required 6 months. The charge was properly dismissed because the defendant did not seek a postponement and the State, which had numerous opportunities to request another trial setting but failed to do so, did not demonstrate good cause in not prosecuting within the time limit. St. v. Ronningen, 213 M 358, 691 P2d 1348, 41 St. Rep. 2168 (1984), but see St. v. Belgarde, 244 M 500, 798 P2d 539, 47 St. Rep. 1762 (1990).

"Speedy Trial" Constitutional Tests to Apply Only to Felony Cases: The defendant was charged with a misdemeanor offense. As the State did not prosecute within the 6-month statutory deadline, the charge was dismissed. The State contends that a speedy trial constitutional analysis should be applied in determining whether the State has demonstrated good cause for its failure to meet the 6-month deadline. However, the speedy trial constitutional tests apply only in the case of felonies and will not be applied in misdemeanor cases if, as here, the statutory deadline is more strict than any constitutional analysis would be required to be. The statute contains the sole standard for determining whether good cause for the delay has been shown. St. v. Ronningen, 213 M 358, 691 P2d 1348, 41 St. Rep. 2168 (1984), followed in St. v. Belgarde, 244 M 500, 798 P2d 539, 47 St. Rep. 1762 (1990).

Delay of 396 Days — 360 Days of Institutional Delay: Defendant was tried 396 days after filing the complaint in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court held that 360 to 368 days of that time were caused by state "institutional delays", primarily caused by prosecutorial inaction, and thus, because a defendant has no duty to prosecute himself, the state failed in its duty to speedily try the defendant. In analyzing the four factors adopted in Barker v. Wingo, the court held that the state failed in its burden relating to the length and reason of delay, that the state failed to sufficiently rebut the presumption that the delay resulted in prejudice to the defendant, and that the assertion requirement by the defendant is fulfilled when a defendant asserts his right to a speedy trial at any time before the trial. St. v. Britton, 213 M 155, 689 P2d 1256, 41 St. Rep. 2018 (1984), followed in St. v. Haskins, 220 M 199, 714 P2d 119, 43 St. Rep. 290 (1986). See also St. v. Kipp, 1999 MT 197, 295 M 399, 984 P2d 733, 56 St. Rep. 762 (1999).

Trial De Novo — Statutory Right: The defendant was convicted in City Court of driving under the influence of alcohol. He appealed his conviction to District Court and his trial de novo was not held until 492 days later. On appeal the Supreme Court held that this section is inapplicable to a trial de novo in District Court. The statutory speedy trial requirements of this section were complied with in City Court. However, the defendant's right to a speedy trial guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., and implemented by this section was violated, necessitating reversal of his conviction. St. v. Knox, 207 M 537, 675 P2d 950, 41 St. Rep. 126 (1984), followed, as to inapplicability to a trial de novo in District Court, in St. v. Stanko, 1998 MT 323, 292 M 214, 974 P2d 1139, 55 St. Rep. 1313 (1998).

Eleven-Month Delay — No Prejudice: A petitioner who was tried for a felony 11 months after arrest was not denied a speedy trial. He was released on his own recognizance during that time, and though the state caused the delay, it was not shown to have done so consciously or intentionally. In addition, the petitioner failed to show prejudice to his defense. Creekmore v. District Court, 745 F2d 1236 (9th Cir. 1984).

Judge, Jury, and Prosecutor Failing to Appear for Trial — Not Grounds for Dismissal — Continuance Without Notice: Defendant moved to dismiss because on the date originally set for trial the defendant, his attorney, and witnesses appeared, but for disputed reasons the judge, jury, and prosecution failed to appear. The District Court was correct in denying the motion because there was no delay prejudicing defendant's right to a speedy trial, and although it would be advisable, there is no rule that courts must give notice of continuances. St. v. Roll, 206 M 259, 670 P2d 566, 40 St. Rep. 1635 (1983).

Delays Resulting From Defendant's Refusal to Waive Extradition — Right to Speedy Trial Not Violated: Where the defendant was arrested on burglary and other charges on April 21, decided on May 18 not to waive extradition to Montana, a governor's warrant was issued on June 15, the defendant waived extradition on June 30, had his initial appearance on July 6, an information was filed against him on July 22, he was arraigned on July 29, and trial was begun after several delays on November 2, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss the charges because his right to a speedy trial was violated. The delay caused by the extradition proceedings was a delay of the defendant's own making, so the time period of that delay, 60 days, must be subtracted from the time of total delay. Under the rationale of Barker v. Wingo, 407 US 514, 33 L Ed 2d 101, 92 S Ct 2182 (1972), and St. v. Fife, 193 M 486, 632 P2d 712, 38 St. Rep. 1334 (1981) (concluding that a delay of 194 days was presumptively prejudicial to the defendant's right to a speedy trial), the court could not say that the remaining delay of 135 days was prejudicial to the defendant, and under those cases, his right was therefore not violated. St. v. Smith, 206 M 99, 670 P2d 96, 40 St. Rep. 1533 (1983).

Economic Damage as Prejudice: Defendant quit a job in Indiana to return to Montana to face criminal charges. Economic hardship is recognized as one form of prejudice that can flow from the deprivation of a defendant's speedy trial right. St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494, 39 St. Rep. 2242 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 2000 MT 180, 300 M 367, 4 P3d 654, 57 St. Rep. 727 (2000).

Length of Delay Between First and Second Information: The defendant was charged with attempted sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). The information was dismissed for failure to follow 46-11-203. Several attempts were made by the State to reinstate the information. A new information was eventually filed. Defendant alleged that he was denied a speedy trial and argued that the time between the first and second information should be included in the length of delay. The Supreme Court agreed. During that time the defendant was an accused, thus the right to a speedy trial attaches. St. v. Bailey, 201 M 473, 655 P2d 494, 39 St. Rep. 2242 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Length of Delay — No Prejudice:

When defendant presented no defense at trial and demonstrated no prejudice whatsoever from delay of robbery trial, there was no error in District Court's denial of motion to dismiss for lack of speedy trial, even though: (1) there had been a delay of 319 days (although the defendant had been incarcerated on other charges elsewhere during this time); (2) most of the delay was the fault of the state unrelated to the complexity of the case; and (3) defendant asserted his right to a speedy trial on six separate occasions. A balance of all factors demonstrated defendant was not prejudiced by a lack of a speedy trial. St. v. Worden, 188 M 94, 611 P2d 185 (1980).

While a delay of 350 days between arrest and trial cannot be considered per se a violation of the defendant's right to a speedy trial, it does shift the burden to the prosecution to explain the reason for the delay and to show the absence of prejudice to the defendant. The prosecution's explanation that the delay was attributable to several appearances by the defendant in the Montana Supreme Court, difficulties arising from the defendant's refusal to plead, and problems which arose because the case was the first homicide prosecuted under the new criminal code and new capital punishment scheme was accepted by the court. Both sides had more preparation time before the trial because of the delay, much of which cannot be charged to either party. Under these circumstances, the defendant's right to a speedy trial was not prejudiced. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Factors to Consider:

Applying the factors to be balanced as enumerated in St. v. Puzio & Allen, 182 M 163, 595 P2d 1163 (1979), the Supreme Court required the State to explain the reason for a 382-day delay between arrest and trial and to show the absence of prejudice to the defendant. No prejudice was found since the delay was largely attributable to substitutions of defense counsel that operated to benefit the defendant. St. v. Shurtliff, 187 M 235, 609 P2d 303 (1980).

There are four factors to be considered in determining whether the right to a speedy trial is violated: (1) length of delay; (2) reason for delay; (3) defendant's assertion of the right; and (4) prejudice to the defendant. Length of delay is a triggering mechanism, and a delay of 317 days is sufficient to trigger an inquiry into the other factors. A delay due to the operation of the system is chargeable to the State. An accused must take some affirmative action to obtain a trial to be entitled to a discharge for delay. This burden is satisfied by making an appropriate motion. The incarceration of the defendant for the period of the delay demonstrates affirmative prejudice against him. St. v. Puzio & Allen, 182 M 163, 595 P2d 1163 (1979). See also St. v. Cutner, 214 M 189, 692 P2d 466, 41 St. Rep. 2404 (1984).

Effect of Appeal by State: An appeal by the State of an order for a change in venue must be charged against the State in determining whether the defendant's right to a speedy trial has been violated. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Factors — Burden — Unintentional Delay: The length of the delay, the reason for the delay, the defendant's assertion of his speedy trial rights, and prejudice to the defendant are factors which must all be considered together with other relevant circumstances. The court must engage in a difficult and sensitive balancing process. A delay of 249 days between arrest and trial shifts the burden of explaining the reason for the delay and showing the absence of prejudice to appellant to the State. Unintentional delay, such as the inability of the State to provide a judge to hear the case and the inadvertent scheduling of the trial on a holiday, must be weighed less heavily than intentional delay in determining the validity of a speedy trial claim. Prejudice to the defendant because of delay is ascertained with a consideration of the following interests of a claimant: (1) prevention of oppressive pretrial incarceration; (2) minimization of anxiety or concern of the accused; and (3) limitation of the possibility the defense will be impaired. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142 (1979), following St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979), and St. v. Cassidy, 176 M 385, 578 P2d 735 (1978).

Accrual of Right: To determine whether a defendant has been denied due process because of a lack of a speedy trial, the time begins to run from the day of arrest and not the day the amended information was filed. He was accused of a crime on the day of his arrest, and his right to a speedy trial accrued as of that date. A pretrial delay of 207 days is sufficiently long to trigger a speedy trial inquiry and shift to the State the burden of explaining the delay and showing absence of prejudice. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368 (1979).

Good Cause for Delay: Although the defendant was not brought to trial until 8 months after the entry of a plea, there was good cause for the delay because the defendant made four motions which had to be fully considered and there were several substitutions of presiding judges, often at the defendant's request. Also, under these circumstances it could not be said that the defendant's trial was not postponed upon his application. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435 (1978).

Not Proper Issue in Asylum State: The issue of lack of speedy trial is not properly cognizable by a court of the asylum state in a habeas corpus proceeding in that court contesting extradition to another state. In re Hart, 178 M 235, 583 P2d 411 (1978).

Speedy Trial — Dismissal With Prejudice: A request by the defense counsel for a trial postponement is not a waiver of the constitutional right to a speedy trial as it is incumbent upon the County Attorney to provide a prompt trial. A trial court has discretion to disallow reprosecution when the accused has been prejudiced by a 406-day delay, as it would tend to negate the right protected by dismissal due to denial of a speedy trial. St. v. Steward, 168 M 385, 543 P2d 178 (1975). (Annotator's Comment: Case gives guidelines for Montana trial courts in determining whether to dismiss with or without prejudice.)

Prejudicial Delay of Trial: The rights of an accused convict, who was held in maximum security without counsel for a period of 4 months and whose trial was held 7 months after his motion for a speedy trial (during which time many of his witnesses disappeared), were severely prejudiced, and upon appeal the conviction and sentence were vacated with prejudice. Fitzpatrick v. Crist, 165 M 382, 528 P2d 1322 (1974).

Delay of 16 Months Not Prejudicial: A delay of 16 months in the filing of an arson charge, due to misplacement of evidence samples by the prosecution, was not prejudicial to the defendant. St. v. Burtchett, 165 M 280, 530 P2d 471 (1974), certiorari denied, Burtchett v. St., 420 US 974, 43 L Ed 2d 654, 95 S Ct 1397 (1975). This language was clarified in St. v. Krinitt, 251 M 28, 813 P2d 936, 48 St. Rep. 1088 (1991).

Dismissal Granted:

Although the defendant was not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information as required under former law, the defendant was not denied his right to a speedy trial because the trial had originally been set for a date within the 6-month period and was removed from the trial calendar only when the defendant sought supervisory control on an original procedure filed in the Supreme Court, even though the cause was not set for trial until 2 months after the Supreme Court had denied the defendant's petition for supervisory control and returned the matter to the trial court. St. v. Lagerquist, 152 M 21, 445 P2d 910 (1968).

Under a former statute providing that the court shall dismiss charges against a defendant who is not brought to trial within 6 months after the filing of the information unless the trial has been postponed upon the application of the defendant, the defendant was entitled to a dismissal, even though the defendant had demurred to the information and had not entered a plea, since the County Attorney had failed to call up the demurrers for a hearing as he was entitled to do before the 6-month period had expired. State ex rel. Sullivan v. District Court, 150 M 203, 433 P2d 146 (1967).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the statement contained in 1987 MCA 46-13-106 that explains the effect of an order to dismiss. However, the statute only retains the basic principle. The special procedure provided for when dismissal results from a "defect in the institution of a proceeding" is no longer retained. It is recognized that this is still a viable procedure, and 46-11-401, concerning the form of the charge, is intended to preserve that principle. It was determined that restating the principle in more certain terms within this statute was unnecessary.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Deleted second sentence that read: "However, if the court grants a motion to dismiss based on a defect in the institution of the prosecution or in the indictment, information, or complaint or if it appears at any time before judgment that a mistake has been made in charging the proper offense, the court may also order that the defendant be held in custody or that his bail be continued for a specified time pending the filing of a new complaint, indictment, or information"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Reinstatement of Dismissed Information Impermissible: Defendant filed a brief in support of dismissal based on a lack of District Court jurisdiction. Absent any reply brief or request for extension, the court found the challenge to jurisdiction well-taken and dismissed the information and the charges. The order of dismissal was filed, but through oversight the order was not served on the attorneys. Counsel subsequently filed briefs, including a motion to set aside dismissal, but not until after the time for appealing the dismissal had expired. The court nevertheless held a hearing on the motion and reinstated the information, upon which defendant was then convicted. The Supreme Court reversed, noting that this section does not provide for reinstatement of a dismissed information. The reinstatement was a reversal of the District Court's decision on the motion to dismiss and was impermissible. Because a valid information did not exist, defendant's trial, conviction, and sentence under the reinstated information were invalid. St. v. Onstad, 234 M 487, 764 P2d 473, 45 St. Rep. 2071 (1988), followed, with regard to dismissal "with prejudice" in a criminal case, in St. v. District Court, 265 M 445, 877 P2d 1008, 51 St. Rep. 599 (1994), in which it was held that an order of dismissal in a criminal case, while not technically a judgment as that term is defined in the code of criminal procedure, is nevertheless a final adjudication of the case, is conclusive of the rights of the parties as is a final judgment, and is not subject to continuing jurisdiction by the trial court.

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc

F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter is substantially a restatement of the 1987 code governing the examination and prosecution of a defendant suffering from a mental disease or defect. See 1987 MCA 46-14-101 through 46-14-401. The provisions contained in Rule 12.2 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure were considered, but it was determined that that rule did not adequately preserve the procedure that has evolved in Montana. This matter has been the subject of considerable controversy, but the 1987 provisions were retained.

These statutes do not include any of the provisions of either the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure or the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure. The amendments are made to recognize established procedures and to conform to the format of the statutes.

Chapter Case Notes

Finding of Competency Based on Prior Mental Health Reports Proper When Defendant Refuses to Cooperate: Defendant, charged with drug possession, refused court-appointed counsel and unequivocally refused to cooperate with or participate in a psychiatric evaluation to determine competency. The District Court advised the defendant that it would find him mentally competent to proceed to trial based on previous staff observations and reports and records from prior proceedings. Following a trial and subsequent conviction on the drug charges, the defendant appealed, alleging that the District Court's failure to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issue of competency violated his constitutional rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court acknowledged that a claim of incompetency cannot be waived by the defendant and noted that the court has a duty to order a hearing sua sponte if there is good faith doubt as to a defendant's competency. In this case, however, the defendant failed to avail himself of the opportunity to provide the court with evidence of sufficient doubt as to require a competency hearing. As a result, the District Court's reliance on previous hospital reports in finding the defendant competent to proceed to trial was proper. St. v. Bartlett, 282 M 114, 935 P2d 1114, 54 St. Rep. 268 (1997), followed in St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765, 56 St. Rep. 924 (1999).

Constitutionality of Statutory Scheme Involving Evidence of Mental Disease or Defect — Due Process Rights Protected: Prior to the 1979 changes in Montana law, insanity was treated as an affirmative defense that the defendant had to establish by a preponderance of the evidence. Now a defendant may submit evidence of mental disease or defect without applying any particular evidentiary standard. Byers contended that failure to instruct a jury on the traditional insanity defense contravened the fundamental legal principle that criminal sanctions will only be imposed on persons who act with wrongful intent in the commission of an offense, in violation of his right to due process. However, the Montana statutory scheme in this chapter, provides adequate due process protection at various stages by: (1) under 46-14-103, considering defendant's state of mind before trial by analyzing whether defendant is able to understand the proceedings and assist counsel in the defense; (2) under 46-14-102, allowing the presentation of evidence that defendant suffers from mental disease or defect and did not have the requisite mental state; and (3) under 46-14-311, considering during sentencing whether at the time of the commission of the offense, defendant's mental disease or defect rendered defendant unable to appreciate the criminality of defendant's behavior or to conform defendant's behavior to the requirements of law. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), following St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992 (1984).

Instruction on Antisocial Conduct Properly Refused: In a deliberate homicide case, the District Court properly refused the defendant's proposed instruction on antisocial conduct that read: "Antisocial conduct is defined as conduct which is marked by behavior deviating from the social norm. Anti-social conduct does not include suicide attempts, masochistic behavior, hallucinations, delusions, disturbed sleeping patterns, emotional lability [sic], or physical complaints." The court found no authoritative basis for the instruction and rejected it in favor of the state's paraphrased version of St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984), in conformance with Montana law. St. v. Ballenger, 227 M 308, 738 P2d 1291, 44 St. Rep. 1107 (1987).

Insanity Defense — Due Process Challenge: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. In 1979, the Legislature abolished the traditional use of the insanity defense. Before trial, evidence may be presented to show defendant is unfit to stand trial under 46-14-221. A defendant unable to understand the proceedings or assist in his defense may not be prosecuted under 46-14-103. At trial, evidence of mental disease or defect is admissible when relevant to prove that at the time of the offense, defendant did not have the state of mind that is an element of the offense charged. Under 46-14-102, this evidence may show that the defendant did not act knowingly or purposely. The State retains the burden of proving each element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury finds the State did not prove the requisite mental state, under 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214), it is to return a not guilty verdict. Following a verdict of guilty, the trial judge, under 46-14-311, must consider any relevant evidence to determine whether the defendant was able to appreciate the criminality of his acts or conform his conduct to the law at the time of the offense. Section 46-14-312 governs where the defendant is sentenced based on the judge's finding. Defendant contended that this statutory scheme violated the Due Process Clause of the 14th amendment (similar to Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const.). Defendant contended that the traditional insanity defense was so firmly imbedded in the common law that it was a fundamental right. United State Supreme Court decisions provide that the Due Process Clause does not require use of a particular insanity test or allocation of burden of proof. The Montana Supreme Court held that Montana's statutory scheme does not unconstitutionally shift the state's burden of proof of the necessary elements of the offense. The State retains its traditional burden of proving all elements beyond a reasonable doubt. In addition, the sentencing judge must consider mitigating factors. A defendant can be sentenced to imprisonment only after a finding that he was not suffering, at the time of the offense, from a mental disease or defect rendering him incapable of appreciating the criminality of his conduct or unable to conform his conduct to the law. The statutory scheme does not violate due process. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Defendant Sane at Time of Crime — Insane at Other Times: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended that sentencing a man suffering from severe mental illness to prison violates the constitutional ban against cruel and unusual punishment as well as 53-21-101. When a defendant is convicted and claims that he was suffering at the time of the crime from a mental disease or defect that rendered him incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirements of the law, the sentencing judge is to consider the relevant evidence of the defendant's disorder. If the judge finds the defendant did not suffer mental illness at the time of the crime, he is to be sentenced according to the guidelines in Title 46, ch. 18. If the finding is to the contrary, the defendant must be sentenced to Warm Springs. Despite the lack of provisions in this chapter for sentencing a defendant who was sane at the time of the crime but may be insane at other times, Title 53, ch. 21, relating to treatment of the mentally ill, does not apply to criminal defendants. The defendant's claim that he is covered by Title 53, ch. 21, is in error. Without a finding of insanity followed by sentencing to a penal institution without provision for adequate treatment, defendant has suffered no statutory or constitutional violation. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Examination After Trial — New Evidence on Mental Defect: Application for new trial based on a psychiatric examination that could have been conducted prior to trial but was not conducted until after was properly denied. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980).

Relevance of Mental Disease or Defect

Part Case Notes

Constitutionality of Mental Defect Provisions: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that the Montana provision for notice of mental defect or disease and the mental defect or disease provisions in 46-14-101 through 46-14-401 (46-14-401 was renumbered

46-14-217) and 46-15-301 are unconstitutional. (In 1985, 46-15-301 was repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329.) St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

46-14-101. Mental disease or defect — purpose — definition.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: While this statute appears to be a definition of "mental disease or defect", it is actually an exclusion. The statute, therefore, is not moved to the general definition section.

Source: Model Penal Code, section 4.01.

This section will give a more positive test for separating "criminals" from those persons who are mentally irresponsible. Under the existing Montana law, probably a combination of the right-wrong irresistible impulse test, the jury frequently becomes confused, and the total condition of the accused's mind is never fully brought to bear on whether he should have been held accountable for his actions.

It is felt that this section provides as simple and as positive a test as is possible at the present time for separating the truly mentally irresponsible from the "criminal" without the invitation to the abuse of the "defense of insanity" that is inherent in the indefinite language of many tests of criminal responsibility.

While it recognizes the objective of the more modern tests that lack of understanding and lack of control need not be total in order to excuse, and that the question is one of degree, yet it does not excuse (as does the Model Penal Code rule for example), for a "substantial impairment" of either of these capacities. Rather in order to excuse, the impairment must be so great that the trier of fact can say that the accused was unable to appreciate the criminality of his conduct, or that he was unable to conform his conduct to the requirements of society.

This section is intended to expand the application of the existing Montana law to include any psychical abnormalities or subnormalities such as emotional deficiencies that have reached the dimension that they can be termed mental diseases or defects and not otherwise. While the section will expand the application of the existing Montana law in this respect, actually it does not depart from the language or test laid down in State v. Peel, 23 Mont. 358, "Unable to appreciate the nature or the consequences of his action or so far deprived of volition by the overwhelming violence of mental disease that he is unable to choose the right and avoid the wrong."

The breadth of the test of insanity provided herein should be read in conjunction with [46-14-211 through 46-14-213], which leaves control of the accused, if judged mentally deficient, entirely in the hands of the court. A defendant, if acquitted on the ground of mental disease or defect, will be committed to the Montana State Hospital, and cannot be discharged without leave of the committing court. This provision should prevent spurious insanity defenses.

Compiler's Comments

2003 Amendment: Chapter 595 inserted (1) establishing a legal standard of mental disease or defect and outlining application of the standard; inserted (2)(a) defining mental disease or defect; inserted (2)(b)(ii) through (2)(b)(iv) clarifying that the definition of mental disease or defect does not include a developmental disability or drug or alcohol intoxication or addiction; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 42 before "this chapter" deleted "46-14-204, 46-14-312, 46-14-313, and". Amendment effective March 12, 1997.

1991 Amendment: At beginning inserted "46-14-204, 46-14-312, 46-14-313, and" and at end substituted "behavior" for "conduct"; and made minor change in style.

Applicability of Commission Comments: Because Ch. 713, L. 1979, deleted the first subsection (providing that one is not responsible for criminal conduct if at the time of the conduct a mental disease or defect resulted in inability to either appreciate the criminality of one's conduct or to conform one's conduct to the requirements of law) the commission comments are largely inapplicable in interpreting the existing language. See, however, 46-14-102 and 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214), under which mental disease or defect can be used to show one did not have a state of mind which is an element of the offense.

Case Notes

Mental Disease or Defect Affirmatively Defined: Noting that Montana does not offer a statutory definition of mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court held that pursuant to 46-14-302, the Legislature intends courts to interpret the term and that an affirmative definition is necessary to resolve the ambiguity between legal and medical definitions. Modifying the definition in the New York Criminal Procedure Law, the court defined mental disease or defect under this section as an affliction with a mental disease or mental condition that is manifested by a disorder or disturbance in behavior, feeling, thinking, or judgment to such an extent that the person afflicted requires care, treatment, and rehabilitation. This affirmative definition complements but does not alter the exclusion in this section of an abnormality manifested only by repeated criminal or other antisocial behavior. Wooster appealed from a decision that he continued to be a danger to society, thus preventing his release from the state hospital where he was confined after being acquitted and determined incompetent to stand trial for the deliberate homicide of his daughters. The appropriate inquiry in determining whether an acquittee no longer suffers from a mental disease or defect is whether the acquittee suffers from a present mental disease or defect that causes the person to present a substantial risk, which the state must prove in civil proceedings by clear and convincing evidence. It is not necessary that the court find that an acquittee have the same mental disease or defect that was present when the acquittee was originally committed. Wooster's mental evaluation showed that he would be dangerous if released without supervision and further treatment, and the District Court did not err in concluding that Wooster posed a continuing danger to himself and others, warranting further confinement at the state hospital. However, the Supreme Court remanded for further determination of whether Wooster's antisocial personality disorder met the affirmative definition of mental disease or defect. St. v. Wooster, 1999 MT 22, 293 M 195, 974 P2d 640, 56 St. Rep. 103 (1999). Wooster I was affirmed in St. v. Wooster, 2001 MT 4, 304 M 56, 16 P3d 409 (2001). See also Jones v. U.S., 463 US 354, 77 L Ed 2d 694, 103 S Ct 3043 (1983), Foucha v. La., 504 US 71, 118 L Ed 2d 437, 112 S Ct 1780 (1992), and Kans. v. Hendricks, 521 US 346, 138 L Ed 2d 501, 117 S Ct 2072 (1997).

Instruction on Antisocial Conduct Properly Refused: In a deliberate homicide case, the District Court properly refused the defendant's proposed instruction on antisocial conduct that read: "Antisocial conduct is defined as conduct which is marked by behavior deviating from the social norm. Anti-social conduct does not include suicide attempts, masochistic behavior, hallucinations, delusions, disturbed sleeping patterns, emotional lability [sic], or physical complaints." The court found no authoritative basis for the instruction and rejected it in favor of the state's paraphrased version of St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984), in conformance with Montana law. St. v. Ballenger, 227 M 308, 738 P2d 1291, 44 St. Rep. 1107 (1987).

Application of Section to Defendant — No Sandstrom Violation: A jury instruction that stated that the term "mental disease or defect" does not include an abnormality manifested only by repeated criminal or antisocial conduct was a proper statement of the law. Further, in this case, the instruction did not create an impermissible Sandstrom-like presumption because substantial evidence was presented indicating that defendant had a mental disease that was not manifested only by criminal or antisocial conduct. Thus, there was no basis for the jury to presume that the mental disease of the defendant should be disregarded. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

No Impermissible Mandatory Presumption: This section does not create an unconstitutional mandatory presumption as to defendant's mental state or intent. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Long-Term Effects of Alcoholism: Under former law, when the defense of intoxication shifted to a defense based on expert testimony as to the long-term effects of alcoholism, it became a defense of mental disease or defect within the purview of the statutes requiring notice. St. v. Ostwald, 180 M 530, 591 P2d 646 (1979).

Submission of Defense to Jury — When Justified: Under former law, to justify submitting the defense of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility to the jury, the defendant must have introduced some evidence showing: (1) that he had a mental disease or defect at the time of the incident; and (2) that as a result of such mental disease or defect the defendant was unable to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Neel, 177 M 93, 580 P2d 456 (1978).

M'Naughten and "Irresistible Impulse" Rules Abandoned: The M'Naughten and "irresistible impulse" rules no longer apply, having been supplanted by the definition of criminal irresponsibility in subsection (1) of 46-14-101 (since deleted). The definition in subsection (1) was the same as that adopted by the American Law Institute in Article IV, Section 4.01, of the Model Penal Code except that the Montana Legislature substituted "is unable" for "lacks substantial capacity"; by that change the Legislature intended to impose a stricter test for mental incapacity than that contemplated by the Model Penal Code. State ex rel. Krutzfeldt v. District Court, 163 M 164, 515 P2d 1312 (1973). (Annotator's Note: Definition is now found in 46-14-311.)

Case Notes

Evidence of Knowing or Purposeful Action Despite Mental Disease or Defect — Aggravated Assault Conviction Affirmed: Meckler was convicted of aggravated assault and committed to the Department of Public Health and Human Services for life. Meckler contended that he could not be found guilty of aggravated assault because he lacked the ability to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law due to a mental disease or defect. It was undisputed that Meckler suffered from paranoid schizophrenia and was not taking his medications at the time he committed the offense; however, the presence of a mental disease or defect does not necessarily preclude that person from acting purposely or knowingly. Evidence showed that Meckler knew that he struck the victim and that the victim suffered serious bodily injury as a result and showed that Meckler was lucid, coherent, and functional prior to and after the attack. Thus, the trial court correctly concluded that Meckler's volitional act was done knowingly or purposely, and the assault conviction was affirmed. The mental disease or defect was properly considered at sentencing rather than as an element of the offense. St. v. Meckler, 2008 MT 277, 345 M 302, 190 P3d 1104 (2008).

When Defendant's Mental State May Be Considered — Insanity Defense Not Allowed: There is no constitutional right to an insanity defense in Montana, but a defendant's mental disease or defect may be considered at three separate stages of a criminal proceeding: (1) prior to trial, when a defendant may be examined to determine the ability to understand the proceedings and participate in the defense; (2) at trial, when a defendant may introduce evidence of mental disease or defect whenever relevant to prove an absence of the requisite mental state; and (3) at sentencing, when a convicted defendant may claim that at the time of the offense the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect that rendered the defendant unable to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's behavior or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

Deliberate Homicide by Intoxicated Defendant — Consideration of Intoxication Properly Excluded on Issue of Intent: Egelhoff was found heavily intoxicated in an automobile in which his two companions lay, shot in their heads by a revolver similar to Egelhoff's. Egelhoff's revolver had been fired twice, and he had gunpowder residue on his hands. The Montana Supreme Court held that a jury instruction and part of 45-2-203 providing that "an intoxicated condition is not a defense to any offense and may not be taken into consideration in determining the existence of a mental state which is an element of the offense" violated Egelhoff's right to due process of law. The Montana Supreme Court overruled any portion of St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860 (1993), holding to the contrary and, citing Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989), applied its decision to cases pending upon direct review but not to cases pending upon collateral review. St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995). On the state's writ of certiorari to the United States Supreme Court, the court reversed, holding that the due process of law clause of the United States Constitution was not violated by the instruction and 45-2-203. Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37, 135 L Ed 2d 361, 116 S Ct 2013 (1996), followed in St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004).

Constitutionality — No Shift of Burden of Proof to Defense — Evidence of Mental Disease or Defect Not Affirmative Defense: Defendant contended that this section unconstitutionally shifts the burden to the defense to prove that defendant did not have the requisite mental state to commit deliberate homicide because of a mental disease or defect, rather than requiring the state to prove the mental state as an element of the crime. This section enables a defendant to present evidence concerning a claim of mental disease or defect, but it does not require a defendant to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the disease absolutely negated the required state of mind. To require that proof would be to determine that the presentation of that evidence rises to the level of an affirmative defense. However, evidence of mental disease or defect is not an affirmative defense. It is up to the jury to determine the interaction of any mental disease or defect that a defendant may have and the required state of mind to commit the act in question. This section does not relieve the state of its burden to prove all elements of the crime and is constitutional. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), following St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879 (1984), and St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992 (1984), distinguishing Walker v. Endell, 850 F2d 470 (9th Cir. 1987), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995), and followed in St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Defense of Extreme Mental or Emotional Stress — No Reduction in Charges Absent Preponderance of Evidence That Reduction Warranted: Byers claimed that his assertion of the affirmative defense of extreme mental or emotional stress reduced the charge of deliberate homicide to mitigated deliberate homicide. He did not ask for a directed verdict, but rather asked the judge to determine as a matter of law that the jury could consider only mitigated deliberate homicide. However, in order for the charge to be reduced, the jury must be convinced by a preponderance of the evidence that a reduction is warranted. The determination of the weight to be given to testimony regarding mental or emotional stress is within the exclusive province of the jury as trier of fact. In Byers' case, the testimony of defense and state experts was contradictory and inconsistent and the jury chose to accept the conclusion that Byers was not under extreme mental or emotional stress at the time of the crime. Therefore, denial of Byers' motion to reduce the charge was not error. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), distinguishing St. v. Frates, 160 M 431, 503 P2d 47 (1972), St. v. Grenfell, 172 M 345, 564 P2d 171 (1977), and St. v. Kamrud, 188 M 100, 611 P2d 188 (1980), and overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

No Conclusive Presumption of Criminal Intent in Presentation of Evidence of Mental Disease or Defect — Sandstrom Not Contravened: Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979), established that the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution prohibits the use of a presumption that relieves the prosecution from the burden of proving mental state by requiring an inference of the existence of criminal intent from the fact of criminal conduct. Under this section, evidence of a mental disease or defect is admissible to prove that a criminal defendant did or did not have a state of mind that is an element of the charged offense. Cowan contended that because mental disease or defect does not constitute a valid defense to a criminal charge in Montana, a conclusive presumption is established as to mental state in violation of Sandstrom. However, under Leland v. Oreg., 343 US 790, 96 L Ed 1302, 72 S Ct 1002 (1952), the due process clause does not require the use of a particular insanity test or allocation of burden of proof, and the constitutionality of the abolition of the insanity defense has been affirmed in St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992 (1984). Cowan further contended that if, under 45-5-112, any evidence of organized or integrated conduct will suffice to establish criminal conduct beyond a reasonable doubt in spite of clear manifestations of insanity, then no one will ever be acquitted on grounds of insanity because it would be impossible for anyone to cause harm without engaging in a minimal level of organized conduct. However, 45-5-112 establishes a permissive inference rather than a conclusive presumption, and an inference does not violate the Sandstrom rule. Therefore, the Montana statutes governing the presentation of evidence of mental disease or defect do not establish a conclusive or unrebuttable presumption of criminal intent in contravention of the due process clause or Sandstrom. St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884, 50 St. Rep. 1153 (1993).

Testimony Refused Absent Pretrial Notice: The District Court properly refused to allow testimony offered under this section relating to evidence that defendant suffered from a mental disease or defect when the defense did not give pretrial notice of relying on mental disease or defect as required under 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214). St. v. Popescu, 237 M 493, 774 P2d 395, 46 St. Rep. 996 (1989).

Evidence of Abused Spouse Syndrome Not Applicable in Support of Credibility: The District Court did not err in refusing to authorize expenditures for retention of an expert who would testify to the effects of abused spouse syndrome when the defendant did not seek the testimony in regard to whether the necessary state of mind was present to justify homicide, but rather to support the defendant's credibility. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987).

Epilepsy as Developmental Disability — Defense of Lack of Intent: The defendant Walker did not produce any evidence in support of his contention that his epilepsy affected his ability to form the requisite intent at the time the crimes were committed. In fact, results of a mental examination tended to disprove his theory. The Supreme Court declined to rule on the issue of whether epilepsy could constitute a developmental disability negating the element of intent, if properly proven. Instead, the court applied the rule set out in St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), that when a defendant properly pleads guilty, he waives all factual defenses as well as constitutional violations which occurred prior to the plea. St. v. Walker, 220 M 70, 712 P2d 1348, 43 St. Rep. 182 (1986).

Purpose or Knowledge — Substantial Evidence to Support: Defendant appeared at the home of the victim and rang the doorbell. When the victim answered, defendant entered, chased her through the house, cornered her, and strangled her for 10 to 20 seconds with a rope. Defendant fled, and the victim asked two construction workers for help. The workers chased and caught defendant. Defendant notified the prosecution of his intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense. Defendant contended that he did not possess the requisite mental elements of purposely or knowingly. Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. On appeal, the defendant contended the evidence was insufficient to prove purpose or knowledge. The Supreme Court found that defendant remembered the entire incident. He was aware of his conduct. He tried to conceal his reason for fleeing, which tended to prove he had done something wrong. This evidence supported a finding that he acted knowingly. Defendant also acted purposely. His conduct was not the result of reflex. He possessed the rope prior to entering the home and harmed the woman because he thought she owed him money. This tended to prove his conscious object to engage in strangling the victim. The evidence was sufficient to support the finding that defendant acted purposely or knowingly. St. v. Raty, 214 M 114, 692 P2d 17, 41 St. Rep. 2354 (1984).

Insanity Defense — Due Process Challenge: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. In 1979, the Legislature abolished the traditional use of the insanity defense. Before trial, evidence may be presented to show defendant is unfit to stand trial under 46-14-221. A defendant unable to understand the proceedings or assist in his defense may not be prosecuted under 46-14-103. At trial, evidence of mental disease or defect is admissible when relevant to prove that at the time of the offense, defendant did not have the state of mind that is an element of the offense charged. Under 46-14-102, this evidence may show that the defendant did not act knowingly or purposely. The State retains the burden of proving each element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. If the jury finds the State did not prove the requisite mental state, under 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214), it is to return a not guilty verdict. Following a verdict of guilty, the trial judge, under 46-14-311, must consider any relevant evidence to determine whether the defendant was able to appreciate the criminality of his acts or conform his conduct to the law at the time of the offense. Section 46-14-312 governs where the defendant is sentenced based on the judge's finding. Defendant contended that this statutory scheme violated the Due Process Clause of the 14th amendment (similar to Art. II, sec. 17, Mont. Const.). Defendant contended that the traditional insanity defense was so firmly imbedded in the common law that it was a fundamental right. United State Supreme Court decisions provide that the Due Process Clause does not require use of a particular insanity test or allocation of burden of proof. The Montana Supreme Court held that Montana's statutory scheme does not unconstitutionally shift the state's burden of proof of the necessary elements of the offense. The State retains its traditional burden of proving all elements beyond a reasonable doubt. In addition, the sentencing judge must consider mitigating factors. A defendant can be sentenced to imprisonment only after a finding that he was not suffering, at the time of the offense, from a mental disease or defect rendering him incapable of appreciating the criminality of his conduct or unable to conform his conduct to the law. The statutory scheme does not violate due process. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Insanity Defense Restriction — Not Cruel and Unusual: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. Defendant contended that Montana's abolition of insanity as an affirmative defense violated the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). The Supreme Court held that the criminal code does not permit punishment of a mentally ill person who has not committed a crime. The sentencing court is required to review the convicted defendant's mental condition at the time of the offense under 46-14-311. If the court finds a mental disease or defect existed, the defendant is placed in an appropriate institution for care and treatment. This independent review of mental condition is designed to prevent the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984), followed in St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884, 50 St. Rep. 1153 (1993).

Failure to Rebut Defendant's Witnesses — Other Evidence Considered: The failure of the State to rebut the defendant's witnesses regarding his drugged condition did not make the evidence submitted by the defendant "uncontroverted evidence" requiring a directed verdict for acquittal; the State introduced evidence in its case in chief regarding the defendant's condition sufficient to meet its burden for submitting the case to the jury. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Jury Instructions on Diminished Capacity Defense — Constitutionality — Burden of Proof on Defendant: Under 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214) (prior to the 1979 amendment), the State required the defendant to prove his legal insanity. Defendant objected, however, to the jury instruction on mental disease or defect (diminished capacity), saying it unconstitutionally shifted the burden to him to disprove intent, an essential element of the crime charged. Because psychiatric evaluation as to subtle gradations of mental impairment is highly subjective and not within the common experience of the layman juror, the State may in fairness require a defendant to convince the jury of his diminished capacity by a preponderance of the evidence. The State meticulously proved the facts constituting the deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping crimes beyond any reasonable doubt, based on all the evidence, including the evidence of defendant's alleged mental disease or defect. The State could then constitutionally refuse to sustain the affirmative defense of diminished capacity unless the defendant proved that defense by a preponderance of the evidence. The instructions here required defendant to establish his diminished capacity by raising a reasonable doubt, rather than by proof by a preponderance of the evidence. They posited a more liberal burden of proof than that to which the defendant was entitled. The instructions were therefore constitutional. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Burden of Proof:

On remand from the U.S. Supreme Court to decide the issue of whether the trial court's instruction on mental disease or defect unconstitutionally shifted the burden of proof of the state of mind to the defendant, the Supreme Court concluded that not only did the instructions not shift to the defendant the burden of disproving any element of the offenses charged, but the instructions, when read together, also required the defendant to establish his diminished capacity merely by raising a reasonable doubt, rather than proof by a preponderance of the evidence. The Supreme Court held that to prove a defense under this section, a defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that he lacked the ability, due to mental disease or defect, to form that criminal mental state which is defined by statute as an element of the crime with which he is charged. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

An instruction that the amount of evidence sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of insanity entitles the defendant to an acquittal is erroneous, as insanity must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389 (1975).

The State was not obliged to present proof of the defendant's sanity in a rape prosecution. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

Declaratory of Common Law: The provision that an insane person cannot be tried or punished was held declaratory of the common law as it had existed at least since Blackstone's day. St. v. Kitchens, 129 M 331, 286 P2d 1079 (1955).

Commission Comments

Source: Model Penal Code, section 4.04.

The standard established by this section for fitness to proceed is the most universally accepted of all the standards now being used. The present Montana section merely refers to "insanity" but it has been interpreted in case law to mean the same as the language of the proposed section. See State v. Kitchens, 129 Mont. 331, 286 P.2d 1079 (1955) interpreting R.C.M. 1947, section 94-9301. Thus, the defendant's capacity to understand and defend must be determined prior to trial. Defendant's fitness to proceed is determined by the court based on either the psychiatric report provided for in [46-14-206] or upon a separate hearing. The procedure for determining fitness to proceed and all related steps are set out in [46-14-221 and 46-14-222].

Case Notes

Indicia of Accused's Competency — Sua Sponte Competency Hearing Not Required Absent Good Faith Doubt Regarding Competency: During proceedings on an intimidation charge, McCarthy behaved inappropriately at times and submitted incoherent and confusing documents and his demeanor was odd and destructive. Following conviction, McCarthy contended that the trial court should have ordered a competency hearing sua sponte to determine McCarthy's competence to stand trial. The state asserted that the trial court was not presented with substantial evidence that McCarthy was incompetent, pointing out that McCarthy's competency was never questioned and no medical opinion on the issue was presented. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. A court has a duty to order a competency hearing sua sponte if the court has reasonable grounds for concluding that there is a good faith doubt as to a defendant's competency, but in determining whether to order a hearing, the court does not rely on a single indicia of doubt, but must instead rely on the totality of events. Indicia may include the accused's demeanor at trial, a prior medical opinion regarding competency, the nature of the crime, the accused's past behavior, and a claimed defense of mental instability. Here, McCarthy had a rational and factual understanding of the proceedings, his statements did not call into question his mental health, and he presented no medical opinions regarding his competency. Therefore, the trial court did not have reasonable grounds for concluding that there was a good faith doubt as to McCarthy's competency and thus was not required to order a competency hearing sua sponte. St. v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004). See also St. v. Bartlett, 282 M 114, 935 P2d 1114 (1997), St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765 (1999), and St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

When Defendant's Mental State May Be Considered — Insanity Defense Not Allowed: There is no constitutional right to an insanity defense in Montana, but a defendant's mental disease or defect may be considered at three separate stages of a criminal proceeding: (1) prior to trial, when a defendant may be examined to determine the ability to understand the proceedings and participate in the defense; (2) at trial, when a defendant may introduce evidence of mental disease or defect whenever relevant to prove an absence of the requisite mental state; and (3) at sentencing, when a convicted defendant may claim that at the time of the offense the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect that rendered the defendant unable to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's behavior or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

Failure to Hold Hearing to Determine Defendant's Competence to Stand Trial Not Erroneous — Competency Standard: Following conviction for theft and forgery, Garner argued that he was not competent at the time that he entered guilty pleas because he was not taking prescribed antidepressant medication and that his conduct at trial, coupled with his attorney's expressed doubt about his competence, provided enough evidence to require a competency hearing. The state contended that evidence was insufficient to require a hearing. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. Constitutional due process requirements and this section provide that a person who is unable to understand the proceedings or assist in the defense as a result of mental disease or defect may not be tried, convicted, or sentenced for commission of an offense as long as the incapacity endures. The standard for determining whether an accused is competent to stand trial is whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with counsel with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and has a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings. When sufficient doubt is raised as to an accused's competency to stand trial, the District Court has a duty to sua sponte order a hearing on the issue; however, there is no fixed or immutable signs that invariably indicate the need for further inquiry because that inquiry is necessarily based on the individual circumstances presented. A defendant's use of drugs does not per se necessitate a competency hearing. Here, Garner clearly had a strained relationship with his attorney, but insisted that his depression was not a basis for the strained relationship and repeatedly told the court that he was competent to proceed. Despite Garner's argument that his overall behavior at trial necessitated a competency hearing, the Supreme Court found, after examining the record, that Garner's behavior indicated a fair degree of competency. Garner capably questioned witnesses and presented a cogent account of his actions and failed to raise any issue before the court relating to not having the antidepressant medication prior to entering the guilty pleas. The evidence presented before the trial judge did not raise a bona fide doubt as to Garner's capacity to participate in his trial. Garner's alternative argument, that the District Court should have at least held a retrospective competency hearing when presented with additional evidence of a previous suicide attempt and past psychological treatment, was also unpersuasive. Given that 7 years elapsed since Garner's hospitalization and the fact that Garner failed to demonstrate how the additional evidence affected his competence to stand trial, the District Court properly declined to hold a retrospective competency hearing. St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

Indicia of Sufficient Doubt of Competency to Proceed: As set out in Griffin v. Lockhart, 935 F2d 926 (8th Cir. 1991) (citing Drope v. Mo., 420 US 162, 43 L Ed 2d 103, 95 S Ct 896 (1975)), factors determining whether sufficient doubt exists as to defendant's fitness to proceed to trial necessitating a competency hearing include: (1) evidence of irrational behavior by the accused; (2) the demeanor of the accused at trial; and (3) any prior medical opinion on the competency of the accused to stand trial. Here, Bostwick's own counsel repeatedly expressed doubt regarding Bostwick's competency to proceed; Bostwick took two standardized competency tests that raised additional concerns; the medical report contained conflicting evidence regarding competence; and Bostwick's medical history was not obtained. Thus, the indicia of Bostwick's incompetence established sufficient doubt regarding his fitness to proceed to trial to require a competency hearing. The case was remanded to determine if a meaningful retrospective competency hearing could be held, and the District Court was instructed as to how to proceed whether or not Bostwick was found to be competent. St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765, 56 St. Rep. 924 (1999).

Finding of Competency Based on Prior Mental Health Reports Proper When Defendant Refuses to Cooperate: Defendant, charged with drug possession, refused court-appointed counsel and unequivocally refused to cooperate with or participate in a psychiatric evaluation to determine competency. The District Court advised the defendant that it would find him mentally competent to proceed to trial based on previous staff observations and reports and records from prior proceedings. Following a trial and subsequent conviction on the drug charges, the defendant appealed, alleging that the District Court's failure to hold an evidentiary hearing on the issue of competency violated his constitutional rights. On appeal, the Supreme Court acknowledged that a claim of incompetency cannot be waived by the defendant and noted that the court has a duty to order a hearing sua sponte if there is good faith doubt as to a defendant's competency. In this case, however, the defendant failed to avail himself of the opportunity to provide the court with evidence of sufficient doubt as to require a competency hearing. As a result, the District Court's reliance on previous hospital reports in finding the defendant competent to proceed to trial was proper. St. v. Bartlett, 282 M 114, 935 P2d 1114, 54 St. Rep. 268 (1997), followed in St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765, 56 St. Rep. 924 (1999).

Attorney's Voluntary Disclosure of Confidential Statements — No Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Defendant's court-appointed attorney called himself to the stand to testify about defendant's inconsistent statements. Based on the District Court's acceptance of the testimony, the Supreme Court found the following factors prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial: (1) the attorney's testimony of defendant's statements was extremely prejudicial and had limited probative value; (2) the state presented no evidence that defendant intended to waive his right not to divulge this privileged information; and (3) given defendant's unfamiliarity with courtroom procedure, defendant's right against self-incrimination need not be surrendered in order to assert a statutory right. Conviction was reversed. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987).

Competency to Testify as a Witness: A 1976 psychiatric report performed by Warm Springs State Hospital declared an arson defendant unfit to proceed because of mental disease or defect. In a subsequent unrelated proceeding in which this person was to testify merely as a witness, the 1976 psychiatric report did not require a conclusion that he was incompetent to testify as a witness. St. v. Stephens, 198 M 140, 645 P2d 387, 39 St. Rep. 822 (1982).

Declaratory of Common Law: The provision that an insane person cannot be tried or punished was held declaratory of the common law as it had existed at least since Blackstone's day. St. v. Kitchens, 129 M 331, 286 P2d 1079 (1955).

Fitness to Proceed Within Discretion of Trial Court — Test: In cases where mental disease or defect is an issue, the determination as to whether defendant is fit to proceed is within the discretion of the trial court. The test, as defined in St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373 (1981), is whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and whether he has a rational as well as a factual understanding of the proceedings against him. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987), followed in St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Bifurcated Trial Not Allowed:

The defendant argued that it was error for the trial court to refuse to grant a bifurcated trial on the issue of his insanity/diminished mental capacity to commit the crime. The Supreme Court held that a defendant who relies on a defense of mental disease or defect is not entitled to a bifurcated trial on that issue. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

The denial of the defendant's motion for severance for trial of the issues of his guilt or innocence and his sanity was proper since this chapter provides for those matters to be presented at the same trial and to the same jury. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

Failure to Appoint Psychiatric Expert to Assist Defense — No Error: It is not error for a District Court to refuse to appoint a psychiatric expert to assist defense counsel absent a showing of prejudice. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Constitutionality of Mental Defect Provisions: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that the Montana provision for notice of mental defect or disease and the mental defect or disease provisions in 46-14-101 through 46-14-401 (46-14-401 was renumbered 46-14-217) and 46-15-301 are unconstitutional. (In 1985, 46-15-301 was repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329.) St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Jury Instruction as to Effect of Acquittal: Under former law, a court could refuse to give an instruction which would inform the jury of the result of an acquittal by reason of mental disease or defect because such result is a wholly extraneous consideration, not connected with the jury's role in determining factual issues before it. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

Trial of Issue of Sanity to Both Court and Jury: Under former law, a defendant who elected to try the issue of sanity to the trial judge alone was not, after an unfavorable finding by the court, foreclosed from presenting the defense of insanity to the jury. State ex rel. Krutzfeldt v. District Court, 163 M 164, 515 P2d 1312 (1973).

46-14-202. Examination of defendant.

Commission Comments

[See compiler's comments below.]

1991 Comment: This statute amends the 1987 code in three areas. First, subsection (1) contains an amendment recognizing that the court and the prosecution, as well as the defense, may request an examination to determine whether the defendant is fit to proceed. Second, the amended statute recognizes that the psychology profession is distinct from the medical profession and that methods of examination accepted by either profession are appropriate. Compare subsection (3) and 1987 MCA 46-14-202(3). Third, subsection (4) has been amended to provide for the costs of an examination in instances in which the defendant is indigent.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-505, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-14-203 (renumbered 46-14-206) is also derived from section 95-505. The commission comments to section 95-505 are printed in their entirety under 46-14-202.

Source: Model Penal Code, section 4.05.

[Sections 46-14-202 and 46-14-203 (renumbered 46-14-206), prior to amendment in 1979, provide] for a single psychiatric examination of the defendant to determine the issues of: (a) mental disease or defect as an affirmative defense; (b) competency of the defendant to stand trial; and (c) when directed by the court, an opinion as to the capacity of the defendant to have a particular state of mind which is an element of the offense charged. This proposal avoids the need for a separate psychiatric examination on each issue.

[Section 46-14-202(1)] contains alternative methods for designating the examining psychiatric experts, depending on the varying conditions within a particular jurisdiction. Also, the court retains the power to select experts of its own choosing. This provision allowing a psychiatrist retained by the defendant to witness and participate in the psychiatric examination is designed to assure the defendant an expert of his own choice. This arrangement may be of considerable value in avoiding the so-called battle of experts. The commission also agreed that there should be a time limit imposed on this examination commitment. The sixty-day period [deleted in 1974] was deemed reasonable.

[Section 46-14-202(3)] is self-explanatory. This provision clarifies a point which was not included in the prior sections. [Section 46-14-206] lists the contents of the psychiatric report which will provide the psychiatric examiner with a guide as to what the report must contain. It is the hope of the commission that these concrete requirements will aid the examiner in making the kind of report that will assist the defense counsel, prosecutor and the court. [Section 46-14-206] is the commission's attempt to solve a very difficult problem. This provision is correlated with [46-14-217] on how much of the communication with the psychiatric examiner will be privileged. If the statements made by the defendant to the psychiatric examiner are not privileged, the defendant may be cautioned by his lawyer not to answer any questions, thus making the examination difficult if not impossible.

The constitutionality of sections providing for a psychiatric examination of the defendant by court-appointed experts, as provided in [46-14-202(1)], who may be summoned by the court to testify at the trial, has been uniformly sustained in recent decisions.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 140 in (1) in two places and in (4)(a)(i) before "court" deleted "district"; in (4)(a)(i) after "paid" inserted "by the court or, in district court proceedings" and at end substituted "except as provided in subsection (4)(a)(iv)" for "as provided in 3-5-901"; in (4)(a)(ii) at beginning after "if" deleted "the defendant was represented by an attorney assigned pursuant to the Montana Public Defender Act, Title 47, chapter 1, and", after "paid by" inserted "the defendant or, if the defendant was represented by an attorney pursuant to the Montana Public Defender Act, Title 47, chapter 1, by", and at end after "defender" inserted "except as provided by subsection (4)(a)(iv)"; in (4)(a)(iii) at beginning after "if" deleted "the defendant was represented by an attorney assigned pursuant to the Montana Public Defender Act, Title 47, chapter 1, and", after "equally by the" inserted "court or, in district court proceedings, by the", after "administrator, and" inserted "the defendant or, if the defendant was represented by an attorney assigned pursuant to the Montana Public Defender Act, Title 47, chapter 1, by", and at end after "defender" inserted "except as provided in subsection (4)(a)(iv)"; inserted (4)(a)(iv) providing that costs and expenses may not be charged to the court administrator or state public defender offices; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2007.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 deleted former (4) that read: "(4) If the defendant is indigent or the examination occurs at the request of the prosecution, the cost of the examination must be paid by the state as provided in 3-5-901"; inserted (4)(a) designating payment of costs of examination and other associated expenses by office of court administrator, by office of state public defender, or equally by both offices; and inserted (4)(b) defining other associated expenses. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

2001 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 303 in (1) in two places and in (2) after "licensed clinical psychologist" inserted "or advanced practice registered nurse"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

(Version effective July 1, 2002) Chapter 585 at end of (4) substituted "must be paid by the state as provided in 3-5-901" for "must be paid by the county or the state, or both, according to procedures established under 3-5-902(1)"; and made minor changes in style.

Saving Clause: Section 55, Ch. 585, L. 2001, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: Near beginning of (1) substituted "motion requesting an examination" for "notice of his intent to rely on a mental disease or defect under 46-14-201" and after "proceed" inserted "is raised by the district court, prosecution, or defense counsel"; in (3), after "medical", inserted "or psychological"; at beginning of (4) inserted "If the defendant is indigent or the examination occurs at the request of the prosecution"; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: In (1), in two places, and once in (2), after "qualified psychiatrist", inserted "or licensed clinical psychologist".

1985 Amendment: Inserted (4) requiring county, state, or both to pay costs of psychiatric examination.

1983 Amendment: In (1), substituted "Montana state hospital" for "Warm Springs state hospital".

1981 Amendment: Substituted "If the defendant or his counsel files a written notice of his intent to rely on a mental disease or defect under 46-14-201 (renumbered 46-14-214) or raises the issue of his fitness to proceed" for "When there is reason to doubt the defendant's fitness to proceed or reason to believe that mental disease or defect of the defendant will otherwise become an issue in the cause" in (1).

Case Notes

Additional Commitment Period Proper Given Findings That Defendant Could Regain Fitness to Proceed in Reasonable Time: Following Yarnall's charge of deliberate homicide, the District Court committed Yarnall for a psychiatric evaluation. One evaluating doctor concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed, and another doctor opined that Yarnall was fit to proceed. Following a fitness hearing, the District Court concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed and committed him to state custody for so long as the unfitness endured. The court set a review hearing for about 2 months later and also set a trial date. Two other doctors subsequently testified that Yarnall remained unfit but suggested that there was a possibility that fitness could be regained. The District Court interpreted 46-14-221 to mean that Yarnall could be recommitted for another 6 months and the situation reviewed in 90 days. At the review hearing, Yarnall was considered fit to proceed, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to a 40-year term. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002), that a District Court must dismiss criminal charges against a defendant who has been found unfit to proceed if after a 90-day review there is no evidence to suggest that the defendant will regain fitness within the reasonably foreseeable future. Yarnall then moved to withdraw his guilty plea and have the charges dismissed based on Meeks, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court cited the post-Meeks decision in St. v. Tison, 2003 MT 342, 318 M 465, 81 P3d 471 (2003), in which an additional commitment at the expiration of the 90-day review prescribed in 46-14-221 was improper absent findings regarding the defendant's fitness to proceed. In Yarnall's case, the District Court did make specific findings that Yarnall could regain fitness in the reasonably foreseeable future. The Supreme Court distinguished Meeks and Tison and held that the District Court properly weighed the evidence and concluded that it could order an additional commitment because it was not prepared to find that Yarnall would not regain fitness. The District Court acted within the statutory directives of 46-14-221 and thus did not err in denying Yarnall's motion to dismiss. St. v. Yarnall, 2004 MT 333, 324 M 164, 102 P3d 34 (2004).

Dismissal of Charges Required if Defendant's Fitness to Proceed Undetermined After Ninety Days — Civil Proceedings Mandated Upon Dismissal: Pursuant to Jackson v. Ind., 406 US 715 (1972), after only a pretrial competency hearing, it is unconstitutional to hold a person who is unfit to proceed without following civil and criminal commitment procedures provided by state law. Due process requires, at a minimum, some rational relationship between the nature and duration of commitment and its purpose. Thus, 46-14-221 requires the committing court to review a defendant's fitness to proceed within 90 days of the original commitment, and if, after 90 days, the court finds that the defendant is still unable to proceed and will not be fit to proceed within the reasonably foreseeable future, the proceeding against the defendant must be dismissed. However, dismissal does not mandate freedom for a potentially violent mentally ill individual. The statute provides that once the criminal proceeding is dismissed, the next mandatory step is to pursue civil commitment proceedings under Title 53, ch. 20 or 21. However, an alternative procedure is available under this section, in which the court may set the time for determining fitness to proceed. St. v. Tison, 2003 MT 342, 318 M 465, 81 P3d 471 (2003), following St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002).

Authority of Municipal Court to Commit Mentally Incapacitated Defendant: A plain reading of 3-6-104 provides that Municipal Courts have all powers and duties of District Courts over matters within their jurisdiction, including the power and duty to commit mentally incapacitated criminal defendants to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, pursuant to the procedures and requirements of this title, if the Municipal Court determines that the defendant suffers from a mental disease or defect and lacks the fitness to proceed to trial. If there is any question regarding a Municipal Court's commitment of a criminal defendant, the issue may be appealed to the District Court pursuant to 3-5-303. Great Falls v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 108, 309 M 467, 47 P3d 836 (2002).

No Attribution to the State of Psychological Report Requested by Defendant — Minor Errors in Timing of Report Held Not Prejudicial: After committing a murder, Scarborough, a schizophrenic, requested a mental evaluation. The evaluation was done by the State Hospital, and the report of the results was given to the prosecution. Scarborough then asked for a psychological evaluation by his own experts. That request was granted by the District Court. The state then asked for an evaluation by its own expert, and that request was also granted. Scarborough objected to the use by the prosecution of the report resulting from the evaluation performed at the State Hospital, arguing that the state had two reports to his one, but both the reports were allowed by the District Court. The Supreme Court said that the only possible way that the use of both reports could have been prejudicial to Scarborough was if the State Hospital report was attributed to the state. The Supreme Court did not so attribute that report, noting that the evaluation was requested by Scarborough and that the review of the state's investigation file by the State Hospital physicians as part of the evaluation did not somehow convert the state hospital evaluation from one requested by the defense to one requested by the state. The Supreme Court also noted that even if the report by the State Hospital was attributed to the state, the state did not have an unfair advantage because Scarborough was examined by two physicians, making the state and Scarborough even in the number of physicians used, and the state did not have more medical experts testify than did Scarborough. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court error of allowing the state's expert to examine Scarborough somewhat earlier than the District Court should have did not prejudice Scarborough's defense. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

Indicia of Sufficient Doubt of Competency to Proceed: As set out in Griffin v. Lockhart, 935 F2d 926 (8th Cir. 1991) (citing Drope v. Mo., 420 US 162, 43 L Ed 2d 103, 95 S Ct 896 (1975)), factors determining whether sufficient doubt exists as to defendant's fitness to proceed to trial necessitating a competency hearing include: (1) evidence of irrational behavior by the accused; (2) the demeanor of the accused at trial; and (3) any prior medical opinion on the competency of the accused to stand trial. Here, Bostwick's own counsel repeatedly expressed doubt regarding Bostwick's competency to proceed; Bostwick took two standardized competency tests that raised additional concerns; the medical report contained conflicting evidence regarding competence; and Bostwick's medical history was not obtained. Thus, the indicia of Bostwick's incompetence established sufficient doubt regarding his fitness to proceed to trial to require a competency hearing. The case was remanded to determine if a meaningful retrospective competency hearing could be held, and the District Court was instructed as to how to proceed whether or not Bostwick was found to be competent. St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765, 56 St. Rep. 924 (1999).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Right to Miranda Warning When Defendant Requests Psychiatric Exam — Duty to Inform Defendant of Consequences of Participation in Evaluation: The defendant alleged that counsel failed to provide effective counsel based on lack of communication, adequacy of advice regarding mitigated deliberate homicide, adequacy of advice regarding mental illness, requesting and agreeing to the dissemination of mental health evaluations, ineffectiveness of the investigation and preparation for trial, and abandonment of the appeal. The Supreme Court denied the petition for postconviction relief except to allow the defendant to amend the petition to address appealable sentencing issues. The defense counsel's acquiescence to dissemination of the mental health report pursuant to this section is not grounds for a finding of ineffective assistance of counsel. Subsequently decided case law cannot be used to judge an attorney's conduct at the time of representation. A defendant has no constitutional right to be informed of Miranda rights when, through the defendant's attorney, the defendant requests a psychiatric exam. Counsel has a duty to inform a defendant of the consequences of participation in a psychiatric evaluation. In this case, the defendant was not prejudiced by the defense counsel's alleged failure to inform the defendant of the right to remain silent during the mental health evaluation. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Error to Deny Standby Counsel's Motion for Mental Examination of Defendant: Prior to Bartlett's trial for possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell, his standby counsel moved for a mental examination to determine competency to stand trial. The motion was denied. The Supreme Court held that a motion by the standby counsel for a mental examination under this section must be granted as a matter of right. The District Court erred by denying the motion, and the conviction was reversed. St. v. Bartlett, 271 M 429, 898 P2d 98, 52 St. Rep. 520 (1995).

Appointment of Only One Mental Expert Required: Cox contended that the testimony of an additional expert on prison conditions would have benefited the defense of mental disease or defect. However, a court is required to appoint only one qualified psychiatrist or licensed clinical expert when mental disease or defect is at issue. Because a psychiatrist had already been appointed to determine Cox's mental state, including his ability to form the requisite mental state for the crime of burglary, it was not an abuse of discretion for the court to deny Cox's request to present evidence of the prison conditions expert's testimony at trial. St. v. Cox, 266 M 110, 879 P2d 662, 51 St. Rep. 680 (1994).

Second Psychiatric Evaluation Properly Denied: Defendant was given one psychiatric evaluation. The statute does not provide for a second evaluation. The District Court did not err in denying his motion for a second evaluation merely because defendant thought the findings of the first evaluation were unfair. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985), followed in St. v. Gray, 258 M 424, 853 P2d 93, 50 St. Rep. 596 (1993).

Privileged Matter — Psychiatric Report on Criminal Defendant: Report of doctor appointed by the lower court (on motion of defendant's counsel) to conduct an examination of defendant pursuant to 46-14-202 was a privileged communication under 27-1-804, and lower court properly dismissed action alleging that the report was false, fraudulent, defamatory, and caused mental anguish. Burgess v. Silverglat, 217 M 186, 703 P2d 854, 42 St. Rep. 1123 (1985).

Failure to Appoint Psychiatric Expert to Assist Defense — No Error: It is not error for a District Court to refuse to appoint a psychiatric expert to assist defense counsel absent a showing of prejudice. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Failure to Designate Psychiatrist: The failure to designate a particular psychiatrist in a court order pursuant to this section is not reversible error because the spirit of the section was substantially fulfilled in that the examination was conducted by a qualified psychiatrist and there was no substantial interference with the defendant's rights. St. v. Buckman, 193 M 145, 630 P2d 743, 38 St. Rep. 1007 (1981).

State Prison as "Other Suitable Facility": The District Court did not err in committing the defendant to the state prison for psychological examination because this section allows such a commitment to a hospital or "other suitable facility". St. v. Buckman, 193 M 145, 630 P2d 743, 38 St. Rep. 1007 (1981).

Hearsay Allegations and Unobjected to Psychiatric Examination No Basis for Error: Where the defendant robbery suspect's defense counsel failed to object to the court's order sending the defendant to the state prison for a psychiatric examination and relied instead upon subsequent extra-record statements of prison employees about the inability of the prison to properly conduct the evaluation, there was no basis upon which to find that error had been committed by the District Court. St. v. Ritchson, 193 M 112, 630 P2d 234, 38 St. Rep. 1015 (1981).

Role of Superintendent of Warm Springs State Hospital: Defendant, charged with burglary and theft, filed notice that he intended to rely upon the defense of mental disease or defect and was sent to Warm Springs State Hospital for an examination. In appealing his conviction, the defendant alleged that the District Court had erred in denying his motion for a second psychiatric evaluation because the original examination was not conducted personally by the superintendent of the hospital, as designated in the order for the evaluation. The Supreme Court, after reviewing the record as a whole, concluded that the defendant's evaluation was in compliance with the court order and the statutory requirements. St. v. Kyle, 189 M 38, 614 P2d 1059 (1980).

Attorney General's Opinions

Financial Obligation for Psychiatric Evaluation in Criminal Trials: The county is financially responsible for psychiatric evaluations conducted to determine whether a criminal defendant is mentally fit to proceed at trial. (See 1985, 2003, and 2005 amendments.) 37 A.G. Op. 37 (1977).

No Commitment by JPs and City Courts: Justices of the Peace and City Court Judges have no authority to commit persons for examination under this section. (See Great Falls v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 108, 309 M 467, 47 P3d 836 (2002).) 36 A.G. Op. 71 (1976).

Additional Commitment Period Proper Given Findings That Defendant Could Regain Fitness to Proceed in Reasonable Time: Following Yarnall's charge of deliberate homicide, the District Court committed Yarnall for a psychiatric evaluation. One evaluating doctor concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed, and another doctor opined that Yarnall was fit to proceed. Following a fitness hearing, the District Court concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed and committed him to state custody for so long as the unfitness endured. The court set a review hearing for about 2 months later and also set a trial date. Two other doctors subsequently testified that Yarnall remained unfit but suggested that there was a possibility that fitness could be regained. The District Court interpreted 46-14-221 to mean that Yarnall could be recommitted for another 6 months and the situation reviewed in 90 days. At the review hearing, Yarnall was considered fit to proceed, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to a 40-year term. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002), that a District Court must dismiss criminal charges against a defendant who has been found unfit to proceed if after a 90-day review there is no evidence to suggest that the defendant will regain fitness within the reasonably foreseeable future. Yarnall then moved to withdraw his guilty plea and have the charges dismissed based on Meeks, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court cited the post-Meeks decision in St. v. Tison, 2003 MT 342, 318 M 465, 81 P3d 471 (2003), in which an additional commitment at the expiration of the 90-day review prescribed in 46-14-221 was improper absent findings regarding the defendant's fitness to proceed. In Yarnall's case, the District Court did make specific findings that Yarnall could regain fitness in the reasonably foreseeable future. The Supreme Court distinguished Meeks and Tison and held that the District Court properly weighed the evidence and concluded that it could order an additional commitment because it was not prepared to find that Yarnall would not regain fitness. The District Court acted within the statutory directives of 46-14-221 and thus did not err in denying Yarnall's motion to dismiss. St. v. Yarnall, 2004 MT 333, 324 M 164, 102 P3d 34 (2004).

No Attribution to the State of Psychological Report Requested by Defendant — Minor Errors in Timing of Report Held Not Prejudicial: After committing a murder, Scarborough, a schizophrenic, requested a mental evaluation. The evaluation was done by the State Hospital, and the report of the results was given to the prosecution. Scarborough then asked for a psychological evaluation by his own experts. That request was granted by the District Court. The state then asked for an evaluation by its own expert, and that request was also granted. Scarborough objected to the use by the prosecution of the report resulting from the evaluation performed at the State Hospital, arguing that the state had two reports to his one, but both the reports were allowed by the District Court. The Supreme Court said that the only possible way that the use of both reports could have been prejudicial to Scarborough was if the State Hospital report was attributed to the state. The Supreme Court did not so attribute that report, noting that the evaluation was requested by Scarborough and that the review of the state's investigation file by the State Hospital physicians as part of the evaluation did not somehow convert the state hospital evaluation from one requested by the defense to one requested by the state. The Supreme Court also noted that even if the report by the State Hospital was attributed to the state, the state did not have an unfair advantage because Scarborough was examined by two physicians, making the state and Scarborough even in the number of physicians used, and the state did not have more medical experts testify than did Scarborough. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court error of allowing the state's expert to examine Scarborough somewhat earlier than the District Court should have did not prejudice Scarborough's defense. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Authority of Prosecution to Conduct Mental Examination When Defense Based on Extreme Mental or Emotional Stress and Not Mental Disease or Defect: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382 (1992), held that although 46-14-205 does not expressly grant the prosecution access for psychological testing purposes to a defendant who bases a defense upon mental or emotional stress, that section does apply generally to a defense based upon mental state to be proved by expert psychological testimony and therefore applied to Park's defense. In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court noted that: (1) fairness requires that if the defendant is going to rely upon his mental state, the state be allowed to test the defendant as to that mental state; (2) it was not holding that the state has a right of access for psychological testing purposes to every defendant in a case relying upon mitigated deliberate homicide, only that the state has the right in those cases in which the defendant puts the defendant's mental state at issue; and (3) access by the state to the defendant should not depend upon whether a defendant actually presents psychological testimony because to so require would put the state at a disadvantage and delay the trial. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Examination of Defendant by State Psychiatrist — Supervisory Control Granted to Prevent Denial of Defendant's Fifth Amendment Right Against Self-Incrimination: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that, first, his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination, and, second, he did not want to discuss his offenses with the psychological expert for fear of waiving his constitutional right against self-incrimination. The Supreme Court, citing Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91 (1991), held that the case was appropriate for supervisory control because Park was faced with the loss of a constitutional right as part of the psychological interview and appeal could not prevent the loss of that right. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Defense of Mental State for Mitigated Deliberate Homicide — Right of Defendant to Refuse to Answer Questions by State Psychological Expert — Remedy for Unrebuttable Testimony: Park, who was charged with forgery and deliberate homicide, filed notice of his intent to use the affirmative defense that extreme mental and emotional stress caused him to commit the offenses and gave notice of his intent to use expert psychological testimony in the course of his defense. The state requested an examination of Park by its own psychological expert, but Park objected to the oral part of the requested examination on the grounds that his defense was not reliance upon a mental disease or defect and the state therefore had no right to a psychological examination. In its decision granting supervisory control over the proceedings, the Supreme Court held that: (1) Park did not by the use of the defense of mitigated deliberate homicide waive his right to remain silent guaranteed by the U.S. and Montana Constitutions when questioned by the state's psychological expert; (2) by invoking his right against self-incrimination in the interview with the state's psychological expert, Park should not be able to put his version of the facts in the case before the jury through the testimony of his own psychological expert because giving the defendant that right would be similar to allowing Park to testify but not be subject to cross-examination, which the Supreme Court held in St. v. Wilson, 193 M 318, 631 P2d 1273 (1981), a defendant would not be allowed to do; and (3) if Park refuses to talk to the state's psychological expert but takes the witness stand in his own defense, the state's expert may listen to Park's testimony and respond accordingly to that testimony. Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998), distinguished in St. v. Hill, 2000 MT 308, 302 M 415, 14 P3d 1237, 57 St. Rep. 1301 (2000), holding Park inapplicable when defendant failed to place his mental state directly at issue by alleging existence of mental disease or defect.

Testimony Allowed Despite Failure to Disclose Diagnosis Before Trial — Sanctions Appropriate: A medical expert examined defendant before trial in order to determine defendant's mental state but neglected to include a diagnosis. The trial court correctly concluded that the state breached its duty to disclose as required by 46-15-327. Under 46-15-329, the court allowed the expert to testify but did not allow testimony as to the diagnosis. Defendant contended that he was effectively prevented from cross-examining the expert for fear of inadvertently bringing up the diagnosis and that cross-examination prohibited his right to address the discovery violation. The sanctions applied against the state were within the court's discretion because the actual testimony was no different from what was contemplated and defendant could point to no damage caused by the testimony. The court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the expert to testify after it was established that the state had failed to disclose the diagnosis before trial. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Authority to Compel Evaluation When Defense Based on Battered Woman Syndrome: Defendant Hess contended that the District Court had no authority to compel a psychiatric and psychological evaluation of a defendant who asserts the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force based on battered woman syndrome. Defendant asserted that statutes governing the procedure for mental evaluation when mental state is an issue do not expressly provide for battered woman syndrome or place the defendant's mental state at issue when the syndrome is a factor. The Supreme Court noted that the defendant put her own mental state at issue by relying on that defense and then calling an expert to testify in support of that defense; therefore, this section authorizes the state to request an evaluation for the limited purposes of rebuttal once mental state becomes an issue, despite the lack of a specific statutory reference to the defense of justifiable use of force based on battered woman syndrome. St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992), followed, with respect to a psychological defense not based upon mental disease or defect, in Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Failure to Appoint Psychiatric Expert to Assist Defense — No Error: It is not error for a District Court to refuse to appoint a psychiatric expert to assist defense counsel absent a showing of prejudice. McKenzie v. Osborne, 195 M 26, 640 P2d 368, 38 St. Rep. 1745 (1981).

Examination by Either Prosecution or Defense: The court's denial of the State's motion for a psychiatric examination was reversed because any psychiatrist or other expert may testify regarding a defendant's mental condition provided he has examined the defendant, and this section allows for such examination by either the prosecution or the defense. A psychiatrist chosen by the State should have been allowed to examine the defendant in addition to the one used by the defense. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1382 (1977).

46-14-206. Report of examination.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves 1987 MCA 46-14-203 but reflects several differences. First, subsection (1) has been amended to require the examiner's opinion as to whether the defendant is seriously mentally ill. Subsection (1)(b) is also amended to allow the court to require an opinion as to whether the defendant can appreciate the criminality of his conduct or conform his conduct to the requirements of law. Finally, the statute does not retain the requirement that examination reports be filed in triplicate with the County Clerk. Notice of the existence of such a report, the discovery rules, and the principles of good faith were considered to have rendered the provision unnecessary.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 452 in (1)(b) after "disorder" inserted "as defined in 53-21-102"; in (1)(c), (1)(e), and (2) after "defect" inserted "or developmental disability"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 490 in (1)(b), after "defendant", substituted "suffers from a mental disorder and may require commitment" for "is seriously mentally ill, as defined in 53-21-102". Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Saving Clause: Section 40, Ch. 490, L. 1997, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 397 in (1) substituted "must" for "may"; and at end of (1)(b) inserted "or is seriously developmentally disabled, as defined in 53-20-102". Amendment effective April 19, 1993.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted "may" for "shall"; at end of (1)(b) inserted "including an opinion as to whether the defendant is seriously mentally ill as defined in 53-21-102"; inserted (1)(e) concerning opinion of defendant's capacity to appreciate criminality of behavior or to conform behavior; deleted (3) that read: "(3) The report of the examination shall be filed in triplicate with the clerk of court, who shall deliver copies to the county attorney and to counsel for the defendant"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Attribution to the State of Psychological Report Requested by Defendant — Minor Errors in Timing of Report Held Not Prejudicial: After committing a murder, Scarborough, a schizophrenic, requested a mental evaluation. The evaluation was done by the State Hospital, and the report of the results was given to the prosecution. Scarborough then asked for a psychological evaluation by his own experts. That request was granted by the District Court. The state then asked for an evaluation by its own expert, and that request was also granted. Scarborough objected to the use by the prosecution of the report resulting from the evaluation performed at the State Hospital, arguing that the state had two reports to his one, but both the reports were allowed by the District Court. The Supreme Court said that the only possible way that the use of both reports could have been prejudicial to Scarborough was if the State Hospital report was attributed to the state. The Supreme Court did not so attribute that report, noting that the evaluation was requested by Scarborough and that the review of the state's investigation file by the State Hospital physicians as part of the evaluation did not somehow convert the state hospital evaluation from one requested by the defense to one requested by the state. The Supreme Court also noted that even if the report by the State Hospital was attributed to the state, the state did not have an unfair advantage because Scarborough was examined by two physicians, making the state and Scarborough even in the number of physicians used, and the state did not have more medical experts testify than did Scarborough. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court error of allowing the state's expert to examine Scarborough somewhat earlier than the District Court should have did not prejudice Scarborough's defense. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

Report Finding No Disease or Defect: A report of a psychiatrist from the state hospital finding no mental disease or defect (see 1997 amendment) precludes the granting of a pretrial acquittal. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

46-14-213. Psychiatric or psychological testimony upon trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is amended in two ways. First, subsection (1) does not retain the provision that prevents the jury from being informed that either the court or the Superintendent of the Montana State Hospital chose the expert. That code provision was considered unnecessary. Second, the statute contains an additional statement expressly barring an expert opinion before a jury on the ultimate issue of the defendant's mental state or mental capacity.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 303 throughout section after "licensed clinical psychologist" inserted "or advanced practice registered nurse"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

1991 Amendment: In (1) deleted former second sentence that read: "If the issue is being tried before a jury, the jury may not be informed that the psychiatrist or licensed clinical psychologist was designated by the court or by the superintendent of the Montana state hospital" and in second sentence and near beginning of (2), after "psychologist", deleted "or other expert"; in (2) near end of first sentence before "diagnosis", inserted "and the medical or psychological" and at end deleted "at the time of the commission of the offense charged, and his opinion as to the ability of the defendant to have a particular state of mind which is an element of the offense charged", in second sentence, near beginning before "diagnosis", inserted "examination and", after "diagnosis" deleted "and opinion", near end, before "diagnosis", inserted "examination or medical or psychological", and after "diagnosis" deleted "or opinion", and inserted last sentence prohibiting opinion on ultimate issue of state of mind that is an element of offense charged; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: Throughout section, after "psychiatrist", inserted reference to "licensed clinical psychologist" and made minor changes in phraseology.

1983 Amendment: In (1), substituted "Montana state hospital" for "Warm Springs state hospital".

Case Notes

Expert Testimony Not Targeting Defendant's State of Mind During Crimes Properly Admitted: In Sandrock's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, incest, and witness tampering, Sandrock maintained that he was suffering from a mental disease or defect and could not have committed the crimes because he could not have formed the requisite mental state. A medical expert testified that although Sandrock was an oddball, he knew right from wrong when he wrote several letters to his wife outlining his intended actions. Sandrock moved for a mistrial because the expert's testimony violated the prohibition on ultimate issue testimony. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although a medical expert may not offer an opinion on the ultimate issue of whether a defendant had a particular state of mind that is an element of an offense, the expert may state the nature of a medical examination and the medical or psychological diagnosis of the defendant's mental condition, and testimony in the form of an opinion or inference that would otherwise be admissible is not objectionable because it embraces the ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact. Here, the expert's testimony did not target the ultimate issue of whether Sandrock actually possessed the requisite mental states at the time that the crimes were committed, so the mistrial motion was properly denied. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004). See also St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510 (1995).

When Defendant's Mental State May Be Considered — Insanity Defense Not Allowed: There is no constitutional right to an insanity defense in Montana, but a defendant's mental disease or defect may be considered at three separate stages of a criminal proceeding: (1) prior to trial, when a defendant may be examined to determine the ability to understand the proceedings and participate in the defense; (2) at trial, when a defendant may introduce evidence of mental disease or defect whenever relevant to prove an absence of the requisite mental state; and (3) at sentencing, when a convicted defendant may claim that at the time of the offense the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect that rendered the defendant unable to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's behavior or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

Refusal of Opinion Testimony Regarding Defendant's Mental State Not Erroneous: The District Court refused to admit the opinion testimony of two doctors regarding Hoffman's mental state at the time that Hoffman committed aggravated assault. Hoffman asserted that under Rules 702 and 704, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), the court erred by precluding the opinion testimony, in violation of due process. However, the language of this section and the decision in St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510 (1995), proscribe such testimony and controlled the situation here. The testimony was properly refused. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003), distinguishing St. v. Fish, 190 M 461, 621 P2d 1072 (1980).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Admission of Psychiatrist's Opinion of Defendant's State of Mind During Theft Not Error With Respect to Conviction for Murder: Santos appealed his murder convictions on the basis that the state's expert witness commented on his mental state during the theft committed in conjunction with the murders. He also stated that the commission comments to this section prohibit expert testimony before a jury on the ultimate issue of the defendant's mental state or mental capacity. The Supreme Court held that the admission of testimony concerning Santos's mental state during the theft was error but was harmless error with respect to his murder convictions. The Supreme Court also held that the commission comments to this section go beyond the scope of the statutory language, that the statute is clear on its face, and that an expert witness may give an opinion on mental state or mental capacity. St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Involuntary Commitment — Appointment of Two Professionals — One May Testify: The lower court appointed two psychiatrists—one to examine G.S. and one to present those findings at the commitment hearing since the examining doctor would be unavailable. The Supreme Court held that the lower court did not err in allowing the second psychiatrist to offer an opinion on the subject's mental condition without formally examining the patient, but relying, instead, on the first doctor's report. Of critical importance is the fact that the doctor who ultimately did diagnose G.S.'s mental condition was available for cross-examination. The critical requirement of professional justification was satisfied. Rule 703, Montana Rules of Evidence, clearly provides that one doctor can state his expert opinion based on another doctor's report. Section 46-14-213(1) does not apply since the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure apply to involuntary commitment procedures. In re G.S., 215 M 384, 698 P2d 406, 42 St. Rep. 451 (1985).

Harmless Error to Violate Statutory Prohibition: The State, over the objection of the defendant, brought out that a psychiatrist had been appointed by the court. The Supreme Court held that although the District Court should not have allowed the questions to be answered in violation of this section, in this case it was harmless error. St. v. Gratzer, 209 M 308, 682 P2d 141, 41 St. Rep. 727 (1984).

Involuntary Intoxication — Limits on Expert Testimony: Defendant was convicted of burglary after being found in a store in a shopping mall after hours. Defendant was admittedly a chronic alcoholic who could not control his drinking; he contended he was therefore involuntarily intoxicated at the time of the crime. As part of his defense he intended to have a psychiatrist and a psychologist testify that his intoxicated condition deprived him of the capacity to appreciate the criminality of his conduct. The expert testimony was excluded through a motion in limine. The Supreme Court, relying on St. v. Ostwald, 180 M 530, 591 P2d 646 (1979), held that the proffer of expert testimony comes within this section, which specifically limits the testimony an expert may give. It does not include opinions on the ability to appreciate the criminality of conduct or to conform conduct to the requirements of the law. St. v. Peavler, 195 M 379, 636 P2d 270, 38 St. Rep. 1937 (1981).

Psychiatric Testimony on Intent Element — Permissible for Rebuttal: Defendant Fish had an argument with Miller at the bar where Miller worked over money Miller owed Fish. A fight ensued, which was broken up by patrons. Fish left saying he would settle with Miller. Fish recruited some friends and went to Miller's trailer park. Miller had already arrived and had friends with him. Fish, upon discovering that Miller was at home, began knocking and pounding on the door. Fish's friends, Hubbard and Lodge, were with him. Lodge began kicking the door. Miller got a gun and shot through the door, killing Lodge. Hubbard got in his truck, and Miller put the gun through the truck window. Hubbard took the gun away from Miller, who ran from the truck. Hubbard shot and killed Miller. Fish was convicted of attempted burglary, and Hubbard was convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. Hubbard contends the trial court erred by refusal to allow a psychiatrist to testify as to his mental state at the time Miller was shot. With respect to either deliberate homicide or mitigated deliberate homicide, the State must prove that the defendant "purposely or knowingly" caused the death of another human being. "Purposely or knowingly" are statutory descriptions of various states of the human mind. They are particular elements included in the definition of the offense. No element of an offense can be presumed, and thus the requisite state of mind must be established by the prosecution and believed by the jury beyond a reasonable doubt. The offered testimony included a conclusion that Hubbard, under the surrounding circumstances, more than likely did not intend to kill Miller when he shot but only intended to stop or apprehend him. The testimony would have gone to support a general rebuttal of the intent requirement. This was a proper subject for expert psychiatric testimony. To exclude testimony offered by Hubbard as rebuttal to an essential element of the crime denied him a full evidentiary hearing and deprived him of a fair trial. St. v. Fish, 190 M 461, 621 P2d 1072, 37 St. Rep. 2065 (1980).

Commission Comments

Source: Model Penal Code, section 4.03.

Subsection (1)[, prior to amendment deleting it in 1979,] was the alternative provision offered by the drafters of the Model Code. This language required the defendant to establish the defense of insanity by a preponderance of the evidence. Placing this burden of proof on the defendant was consistent with the [former] Montana section, R.C.M. 1947, section 94-119(2) and the cases thereunder. The American jurisdictions were almost equally divided on the question of burden of proof of insanity. The alternative position required the prosecution to establish defendant's sanity beyond a reasonable doubt. A third position, taken by the state of Oregon, required that the defendant prove the defense of irresponsibility beyond a reasonable doubt.

The commission chose the alternative which required the defendant to prove irresponsibility by a preponderance of the evidence because it was consistent with the past practice which proved satisfactory. Also, this alternative seemed to be the most equitable of the three alternatives offered, and it was consistent with the English view that every man is presumed sane and responsible until the contrary is proved to the jury's satisfaction. (See: State v. Vettere, 76 Mont. 574, 248 Pac. 179.)

The notice provision [in present subsection (1)] is required to avoid surprise and to encourage a fair determination of the issues by a knowledgeable presentation of the facts and issues by both prosecutor and defense counsel. Defendant's failure to give the required notice precludes the use of this defense. However, the judge has the discretion to allow such notice at a later time. [See also 46-15-323.]

If the defendant fails to give notice of his intent to rely on a defense of lack of specific intent he does not lose that defense, but he will be limited to "lay" testimony which generally is not effective for a defense of mental disease or defect. But, if the state introduces expert testimony in rebuttal, then the defendant should be allowed the same kind of testimony in his rebuttal. The [d]esirability of giving the trial judge the power to raise the defense in a proper case, where the defendant refused to permit his counsel to do so, was considered but was omitted as being too great an interference with the conduct of the defense. However, it may be considered by the judge in determining the defendant's fitness to proceed.

The purpose of the language in subsection (2) is to establish a basis for commitment of a defendant acquitted of the crime charged on the ground of mental disease or defect. The commitment would be to the proper state institution rather than to prison. The commission believes that it is necessary to provide for such a commitment. For details of the commitment procedure, see [46-14-301 through 46-14-304].

2003 Amendment: Chapter 164 inserted (2) concerning court determination of maximum sentence; inserted (3) concerning victim; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1991 Amendment: Deleted (1) that read: "(1) Evidence of mental disease or defect is not admissible in a trial on the merits unless the defendant, at the time of entering his plea of not guilty or within 10 days thereafter or at such later time as the court may for good cause permit, files a written notice of his purpose to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove that he did not have a particular state of mind which is an essential element of the offense charged. Otherwise, except on good cause shown, he shall not introduce in his case in chief expert testimony in support of that defense"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "When the defendant is found not guilty of the charged offense or offenses or any lesser included offense for the reason" for "When the defendant is acquitted on the ground" at the beginning of (2).

Case Notes

Testimony Refused Absent Pretrial Notice: The District Court properly refused to allow testimony offered under 46-14-102 relating to evidence that defendant suffered from a mental disease or defect when the defense did not give pretrial notice of relying on mental disease or defect as required under this section. St. v. Popescu, 237 M 493, 774 P2d 395, 46 St. Rep. 996 (1989).

Conviction of Lesser Included Offense — Lack of Mental State as Defense — No Mental State Verdict Form: The trial court refused defendant's request for a verdict form that stated that the defendant was found not guilty of attempted deliberate homicide due to mental disease or defect. The jury found him not guilty of that offense but did find him guilty of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The defendant alleged that due to his drugged state he lacked the necessary mental state to commit the offense charged and that the jury finding of not guilty of the charged offense on that basis yet guilty of the lesser offense constituted inconsistent and irreconcilable verdicts. The Supreme Court held that although a mental state verdict form would have been preferable in determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a new trial, it must look at every fact that the jury reasonably could have deduced from all the evidence, and in this case the basis for the conviction for the lesser included offense could have been based on several grounds. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Notice of Defense — Right to Voir Dire on the Subject: The defendant's attack on the constitutionality of the provision of Montana law which required notice of intent to use the mental disease or defect defense was rejected. In so doing, the Montana Supreme Court emphasized both a Montana precedent and the fact that the statute is nearly identical to a federal rule promulgated by the U.S. Supreme Court and approved by Congress. The Montana Supreme Court also emphasized that the purpose of the statute was to provide notice and thus to prevent surprise and to eliminate the necessity for a trial continuance for further case preparation when the defense is raised. The fact of notice does not amount to a plea, and it could not be used in any way as evidence in a trial on the merits. Further, the defendant was properly denied the right to voir dire the jury on the subject of mental disease or defect because he did not give any notice of intent to use the defense. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Long-Term Effects of Alcoholism: Under former law, when the defense of intoxication shifts to a defense based on expert testimony as to the long-term effects of alcoholism, it becomes a defense of mental disease or defect within the purview of the statutes requiring notice. St. v. Ostwald, 180 M 530, 591 P2d 646 (1979).

Failure to File Notice of Defense — Effect on Voir Dire: The defendant refused to give notice as required by the statute. He claimed prejudice because he was not allowed to voir dire on the subject of mental disease and defect. However, at the time he wished to voir dire he had not complied with the notice and the issue could not at that time be presented to the jury. The court was correct in refusing to allow the voir dire. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Defenses of Insanity and Self-Defense:

There was no reversible error in making the defendant comply with the insanity and self-defense notice provisions of 46-15-301 (repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329 in 1985) when the state court had already decided that the section required reciprocal duties of the prosecution, the State operated in good faith at the trial, and the facts otherwise revealed no prejudice to the defendant. Radford v. Stewart, 472 F2d 1161 (9th Cir. 1973).

The court held that the language of 46-15-301 (repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329 in 1985), prior to amendment, as it related to the defenses of insanity and self-defense, should be interpreted as directory only. State ex rel. Sikora v. District Court, 154 M 241, 462 P2d 897 (1969).

Constitutionality:

Under former law, the defendant's rights under the 5th, 6th, and 14th amendments of the United States Constitution were not violated by the operation of 46-15-301 (repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329 in 1985) because neither the defendant's witness list nor his notice of insanity and self-defense was used to make a prima facie case against him. Radford v. Stewart, 320 F. Supp. 826 (D.C. Mont. 1970), affirmed in 472 F2d 1161 (9th Cir. 1973).

While this section may be unconstitutionally applied, it is constitutional on its face and not repugnant to the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 14th amendments of the United States Constitution. State ex rel. Sikora v. District Court, 154 M 241, 462 P2d 897 (1969), followed in St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

Untimely Filing of Notice of Defense: Under former law the trial judge could allow psychiatric proof even though the motion was untimely but, when the defendant's counsel did not comply with a court order to submit all motions of defense at the time of pleading to the information or during the 6-month delay in going to trial, the trial court properly denied the defendant's notice of intention to rely on mental disease or defect as not being timely filed. St. v. Bentley, 155 M 383, 472 P2d 864 (1970).

Verdict Upon Finding of Insanity: Under former law when the defendant, charged with assault in the first degree, relied wholly upon the defense of insanity, the court's instruction that the jury might find the defendant guilty of assault in the first, second, or third degree or not guilty was inaccurate; the jury should have been told that, if they found him not guilty because insane, their verdict should be "not guilty by reason of insanity". St. v. Crowe, 39 M 174, 102 P 579 (1909).

46-14-217. Admissibility of statements made during examination or treatment.

Commission Comments

Source: Model Penal Code, section 4.09.

This section embodies the view that the important expert knowledge of the mental condition of the defendant acquired by examination or treatment on order of the court should be fully available in evidence in any proceeding where his mental condition may properly be in issue; but to safeguard the defendant's right and to make possible the feeling of confidence essential for effective psychiatric diagnosis or treatment, the defendant's statements made for this purpose may not be put in evidence on any other issue.

The proposed provision covers not only statements made during a psychiatric examination but also statements made during treatment. These statements are only admissible on the issue of mental condition. This should make both the examination and treatment palatable to the defendant and also expedite the work of the psychiatrist.

1991 Amendment: In first sentence, near beginning after "psychiatric", inserted "or psychological" and near end, after "person", substituted "at trial" for "in any criminal proceeding, except a sentencing hearing conducted under 46-14-311", in second sentence, after "communication", substituted "only when and after the defendant presents evidence that due to a mental disease or defect the defendant did not have a particular state of mind that is an element of the offense" for "unless it constitutes an admission of guilt of the crime" and deleted former last sentence that read: "In a hearing held under 46-14-311, the court may hear and consider any such statement even if it constitutes an admission of guilt"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Testimony at Sentencing Hearing by Counselor Who Evaluated Defendant in Different Case Not Violation of Privileged Communication: At defendant's sentencing hearing, the court allowed testimony from a counselor who had performed a psychosexual evaluation on defendant in connection with an earlier unrelated case. Defendant contended on appeal that the counselor's testimony should not have been allowed under the rules of evidence. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that under St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641 (1997), the rules of evidence are not applicable or controlling in sentencing hearings and that a statement covered by the psychotherapist-patient privilege that may be inadmissible at trial is admissible at a sentencing hearing. Further, the counselor's statement in question here was a matter of public record and did not constitute violation of a privileged communication. A sentencing court is allowed to have the fullest information possible concerning a defendant's life and characteristics in order to individualize punishment, and the testimony at issue helped the sentencing court frame the punishment in this case. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Pretrial Phase: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the pretrial phase, applying the two-pronged test in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in failing to: (1) object to the procedure and use of Dawson's psychiatric evaluation; (2) advise him of his rights during the evaluation process; and (3) conduct an adequate pretrial investigation. On the first point, the procedure followed and the use of the psychiatric evaluation were consistent with the statutory procedure in effect at the time, and counsel had no reason to question it. On the second point, Dawson satisfied the deficiency prong of the Strickland test because he should have been informed of the potential consequences of participating in the evaluation; however, there was no evidence that Dawson was prejudiced at trial or sentencing. Dawson's version of the crimes was consistent with his defense theory, and at no time did he admit killing the victims, so counsel's failure to advise him of his Miranda rights was not prejudicial. On the third point, Dawson could not establish prejudice as a result of counsel's failure to obtain complete records and staff notes of the evaluation, to investigate Dawson's possible epilepsy, or to investigate or pursue Dawson's drug use—at trial or at sentencing as a mitigating factor. The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at the pretrial phase. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000). See also St. v. Armfield, 214 M 229, 693 P2d 1226 (1984), St. v. Smith, 217 M 453, 705 P2d 1110 (1985), and Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997).

Disclosure of Complete Defense Psychiatric Report at Sentencing Phase When Doctor to Testify: Section 26-1-807 and this section, relating to confidentiality of communications between a psychologist or psychiatrist and client, are codifications of rules of evidence. Rules of evidence are not applicable or controlling at a sentencing hearing. Furthermore, appellant waived any privilege as to his psychiatric report when he decided to present the doctor's testimony at the sentencing hearing. At that point, the complete report was necessary for the court to properly evaluate the doctor's testimony. The court did not err in ordering the defense to provide the court with the complete report for the court to consider in relation to sentencing. St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 1099 (1997).

Admissibility of Statements Regarding Mental State: Defendant's expert testified that defendant indicated during examination that his recollections of a shooting incident were hazy. In rebuttal, prosecution's expert testified that shortly before and shortly after the incident, defendant was capable of making conscious choices, which defendant asserted was an inadmissible admission of guilt. However, both statements spoke to defendant's mental condition at the time of the incident and were thus admissible. Further, defendant opened the door to the prosecution's testimony by the initial examination of his own witness and could not later object to the responsive interrogation by the state. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Psychiatrist's Testimony Beyond Scope of Question of Mental Capacity: A psychiatrist testified that defendant's mental capacity enabled him to recall certain elements of the case against him. Since defendant placed his mental condition at issue, psychiatrist's testimony was generally admissible. However, the psychiatrist's testimony of defendant's recall of incriminating evidence came dangerously close to violating defendant's right against self-incrimination. Although the Supreme Court did not decide this issue (since the case was reversed on other grounds), it cautioned the lower court to refrain from admitting evidence of defendant's mental condition if such evidence implies or constitutes an admission of guilt of the crime charged. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987).

Psychologist/Patient Privilege — Exception: The court properly permitted testimony of the respondent's institutional psychologist and psychiatrist, in spite of the psychologist/patient and physician/patient privileges, because mental health professionals on the hospital staff qualify as "neutral factfinders". In re Miller, 175 M 318, 573 P2d 1155 (1977); In re Sonsteng, 175 M 307, 573 P2d 1149 (1977). See also St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984).

[Sections 46-14-221 and 46-14-222 outline] a new procedure for determining when a defendant is or is not fit to proceed to trial. The new procedure adopts the growing minority proposition of excluding a jury trial on the issue of fitness to proceed. The court makes this determination based on either the psychiatric examination conducted under [46-14-202] or else from a separate hearing. If the report from [46-14-202] is used, the defendant may summon the experts who conducted the examination and cross-examine them and offer other evidence on the question.

[Section 46-14-222] also expresses the minority view that a hearing is necessary to determine if the defendant has regained fitness to proceed. The majority of American jurisdictions and Montana (R.C.M. 1947, section 94-9306) [repealed in 1967] only require the certificate of the institutional superintendent or an independent determination of the court without a hearing. The commission felt that it was desirable to allow the defendant or his legal representative to make the motion for the hearing as well as the court, superintendent of the Montana State Hospital or the prosecution. With this additional language all interested parties have a right to move for a hearing to have the proceedings resumed.

The provision permitting the court to dismiss the prosecution, if because of the lapse of time it would be unjust to continue it, is novel in codified American law but not in actual practice. The result is usually reached at the discretion of the county attorney through the entry of a nolle prosequi. However, this plea is not available in Montana (R.C.M. 1947, 94-9506) [repealed in 1967], but the same result is now reached under R.C.M. 1947, section 94-9505 [repealed in 1967] as will be reached under the proposed section. There would seem to be some value in vesting such a power in the court, to be exercised where either, due to lapse of time the defendant is unable to produce witnesses or evidence once available which is essential to his defense, or where because of the length of the intervening period, which he has spent in a mental institution, subsequent to the alleged wrongful conduct, it seems "unjust" to subject him to trial and punishment.

Basically [46-14-221(4)] authorizes the judge to rule on any objection which might be raised by counsel prior to trial. The primary purpose is to relieve the defendant of a pending criminal charge in those cases in which the charge could be quashed prior to trial but for the defendant's mental condition. It is not intended to jeopardize the defendant's legal position while the defendant remains unfit to proceed to trial. The defendant might receive an unfavorable ruling based on a legal objection made by his counsel while he is unfit to proceed to trial and mentally incapable to assist in his defense. However, since the determination could only be made on those matters which are "susceptible of a fair determination without the personal participation of the defendant" nothing is lost that would not otherwise be lost. The case remains in the hands of "defense counsel."

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 throughout section substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney"; in (1), near beginning of first sentence after "raised by", inserted "the court" and in fifth sentence substituted "subpoena" for "summon"; and made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: In (1), in last sentence after "psychiatrists", inserted "or licensed clinical psychologists".

1985 Amendment: In (5) near end after "chargeable to the state" substituted "and payable according to procedures established under 3-5-902(1)" for "but the state may recover them from the estate of the defendant".

1983 Amendment: In first sentence of (1), deleted "only" after "may be raised" and inserted "or by the county attorney"; in (2), inserted second and third sentences relating to review of fitness after 90 days and dismissal if it is found that defendant apparently will not become fit; and in (3), substituted "as provided in 53-20-102(4), the proceeding against him shall be dismissed and the county attorney shall petition the court in the manner provided in chapter 20 of Title 53" for "as defined by 53-20-102, the proceeding against him shall be suspended, except as provided in subsection (4) of this section, and the court shall proceed to secure treatment as provided in chapter 20, part 1, or chapter 21, part 1, of Title 53".

1981 Amendment: Substituted "or his counsel" for "with the advice of counsel" and made a minor change in phraseology in (1); and deleted "in the first instance" before "chargeable", substituted "state" for "county in which the indictment was found or the information filed" after "chargeable to the", substituted "state" for "county" before "may recover", and deleted "if he has any, or from a town, city, or county bound to provide for and maintain him elsewhere" after "estate of the defendant" in (5).

Case Notes

No Causal Connection Between Cognitive Disorder and Alleged Criminal Activity — Commitment Order Unwarranted: D.M.S. was charged with two felony DUIs and was the primary suspect in a felony arson investigation involving five vehicle fires. Following a competency evaluation, the District Court adjudicated D.M.S. unfit to proceed in the criminal cases because of the mental disease or defect of cognitive disorder not otherwise specified (NOS), combined with alcohol abuse, borderline intellectual functioning, and antisocial personality disorder. The charges were subsequently dismissed, and the County Attorney immediately filed a petition to commit D.M.S. to the state hospital. After detention and evaluation of D.M.S. at the state hospital, the doctor who conducted the evaluation concluded that D.M.S. did not meet the criteria for commitment. D.M.S. moved to dismiss the petition, but the motion was denied and the case went to trial. The jury found that D.M.S. would be a danger if untreated, and the District Court ordered a 90-day commitment. After the commitment was served, D.M.S. appealed the commitment order. The state did not present any evidence indicating that because of the cognitive disorder NOS, as opposed to alcoholism or antisocial behavior, D.M.S. caused injury or posed a threat of injury to self or others. Therefore, the evidence did not establish a causal connection between the cognitive disorder NOS and the behavior described in the reports or alleged by law enforcement officers. Absent a causal connection, even when viewed in a light most favorable to the state, a rational trier of fact could not have found D.M.S. in need of commitment to the state hospital. The Supreme Court reversed the commitment order and remanded for further proceedings. In re D.M.S., 2009 MT 41, 349 M 257, 203 P3d 776 (2009), following In re Mental Health of A.K., 2006 MT 166, 332 M 511, 139 P3d 849 (2006).

Additional Commitment Period Proper Given Findings That Defendant Could Regain Fitness to Proceed in Reasonable Time: Following Yarnall's charge of deliberate homicide, the District Court committed Yarnall for a psychiatric evaluation. One evaluating doctor concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed, and another doctor opined that Yarnall was fit to proceed. Following a fitness hearing, the District Court concluded that Yarnall was unfit to proceed and committed him to state custody for so long as the unfitness endured. The court set a review hearing for about 2 months later and also set a trial date. Two other doctors subsequently testified that Yarnall remained unfit but suggested that there was a possibility that fitness could be regained. The District Court interpreted this section to mean that Yarnall could be recommitted for another 6 months and the situation reviewed in 90 days. At the review hearing, Yarnall was considered fit to proceed, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to a 40-year term. The Supreme Court subsequently decided in St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002), that a District Court must dismiss criminal charges against a defendant who has been found unfit to proceed if after a 90-day review there is no evidence to suggest that the defendant will regain fitness within the reasonably foreseeable future. Yarnall then moved to withdraw his guilty plea and have the charges dismissed based on Meeks, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court cited the post-Meeks decision in St. v. Tison, 2003 MT 342, 318 M 465, 81 P3d 471 (2003), in which an additional commitment at the expiration of the 90-day review prescribed in this section was improper absent findings regarding the defendant's fitness to proceed. In Yarnall's case, the District Court did make specific findings that Yarnall could regain fitness in the reasonably foreseeable future. The Supreme Court distinguished Meeks and Tison and held that the District Court properly weighed the evidence and concluded that it could order an additional commitment because it was not prepared to find that Yarnall would not regain fitness. The District Court acted within the statutory directives of this section and thus did not err in denying Yarnall's motion to dismiss. St. v. Yarnall, 2004 MT 333, 324 M 164, 102 P3d 34 (2004).

Dismissal of Charges Required if Defendant's Fitness to Proceed Undetermined After Ninety Days — Civil Proceedings Mandated Upon Dismissal: Pursuant to Jackson v. Ind., 406 US 715 (1972), after only a pretrial competency hearing, it is unconstitutional to hold a person who is unfit to proceed without following civil and criminal commitment procedures provided by state law. Due process requires, at a minimum, some rational relationship between the nature and duration of commitment and its purpose. Thus, this section requires the committing court to review a defendant's fitness to proceed within 90 days of the original commitment, and if, after 90 days, the court finds that the defendant is still unable to proceed and will not be fit to proceed within the reasonably foreseeable future, the proceeding against the defendant must be dismissed. However, dismissal does not mandate freedom for a potentially violent mentally ill individual. The statute provides that once the criminal proceeding is dismissed, the next mandatory step is to pursue civil commitment proceedings under Title 53, ch. 20 or 21. However, an alternative procedure is available under 46-14-202, in which the court may set the time for determining fitness to proceed. St. v. Tison, 2003 MT 342, 318 M 465, 81 P3d 471 (2003), following St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002).

Indicia of Sufficient Doubt of Competency to Proceed: As set out in Griffin v. Lockhart, 935 F2d 926 (8th Cir. 1991) (citing Drope v. Mo., 420 US 162, 43 L Ed 2d 103, 95 S Ct 896 (1975)), factors determining whether sufficient doubt exists as to defendant's fitness to proceed to trial necessitating a competency hearing include: (1) evidence of irrational behavior by the accused; (2) the demeanor of the accused at trial; and (3) any prior medical opinion on the competency of the accused to stand trial. Here, Bostwick's own counsel repeatedly expressed doubt regarding Bostwick's competency to proceed; Bostwick took two standardized competency tests that raised additional concerns; the medical report contained conflicting evidence regarding competence; and Bostwick's medical history was not obtained. Thus, the indicia of Bostwick's incompetence established sufficient doubt regarding his fitness to proceed to trial to require a competency hearing. The case was remanded to determine if a meaningful retrospective competency hearing could be held, and the District Court was instructed as to how to proceed whether or not Bostwick was found to be competent. St. v. Bostwick, 1999 MT 237, 296 M 149, 988 P2d 765, 56 St. Rep. 924 (1999).

Vacating Hearing Without Fitness Determination — Abuse of Discretion: Proceedings against defendant, who was charged with intimidation and stalking, were suspended after defendant was declared mentally ill and unable to understand or assist in proceedings. While hospitalized, defendant was later determined not unfit to proceed and, without a review of the fitness determination, pleaded guilty to the charges pursuant to a plea agreement. After retaining new counsel, defendant unsuccessfully petitioned the District Court to withdraw the guilty plea. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the District Court erred in vacating the fitness hearing and in accepting defendant's guilty plea without first making a determination that defendant had regained fitness to proceed. St. v. Drga, 916 M 739, 916 P2d 739, 53 St. Rep. 401 (1996). See also St. v. Meeks, 2002 MT 246, 312 M 126, 58 P3d 167 (2002), which held that the District Court is required to strictly comply with this section by dismissing pending criminal charges upon a determination that defendant was unfit to proceed.

Involuntary Medication of Unfit Defendant Prohibited During Commitment: A defendant who is awaiting trial and who has been determined to be mentally unfit to proceed may not be involuntarily medicated or treated for an underlying mental condition under this section during the statutorily prescribed 90-day commitment period. Curtis v. District Court; Vilensky v. District Court, 266 M 231, 879 P2d 1164, 51 St. Rep. 776 (1994).

Developmental Disability Affecting Fitness to Proceed to Trial: A developmental disability may affect a defendant in such a way as to render him unfit to proceed to trial; however, a developmental disability does not automatically mandate a finding of lack of fitness. That is for the trial court, in its discretion, to determine. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Dusky Test Adopted — Present Ability and Understanding: The test of fitness to proceed to trial must be whether the defendant has sufficient present ability to consult with his lawyer with a reasonable degree of rational understanding and whether he has a rational as well as factual understanding of the proceedings against him. (Citing Dusky v. U.S., 362 US 402, 4 L Ed 2d 825, 80 S Ct 789 (1960).) St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Returning Patients to Warm Springs State Hospital — Financial Responsibility: Prior to the 1981 amendment, a Sheriff who returned a patient to Warm Springs pursuant to 7-32-2144 when the patient was subjected to an involuntary civil or a criminal commitment was entitled to reimbursement for his costs from the applicable county for a person committed pursuant to 46-14-221 and 46-14-222 or the institution to which the person was committed when committed pursuant to 46-14-301, 53-21-121, 53-21-124, and 53-21-127. 37 A.G. Op. 129 (1978).

Financial Obligation for Psychiatric Evaluation in Criminal Trials: Prior to the 1981 amendment, the county was financially responsible for psychiatric evaluations conducted to determine whether a criminal defendant was mentally fit to proceed at trial. Vacating Hearing Without Fitness Determination — Abuse of Discretion: Proceedings against defendant, who was charged with intimidation and stalking, were suspended after defendant was declared mentally ill and unable to understand or assist in proceedings. While hospitalized, defendant was later determined not unfit to proceed and, without a review of the fitness determination, pleaded guilty to the charges pursuant to a plea agreement. After retaining new counsel, defendant unsuccessfully petitioned the District Court to withdraw the guilty plea. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the District Court erred in vacating the fitness hearing and in accepting defendant's guilty plea without first making a determination that defendant had regained fitness to proceed. Source: Section 4.08 of M.P.C.

The legal effect of acquittal on the ground of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility is characterized by (a) mandatory commitment of the defendant to an appropriate institution upon such an acquittal, (b) dangerousness to himself or others as the criterion for continued custody, (c) power only in the committing court (other than as affected by habeas corpus) to discharge or release the defendant, (d) probationary release as an alternative to absolute discharge, (e) application for release or discharge to be made by the superintendent of the Montana State Hospital or by the defendant with limitations as to the frequency of applications by the defendant. The provisions for automatic commitment are in accordance with the practice in England and a minority of American jurisdictions. It not only provides the public with the maximum immediate protection, but may also work to the advantage of mentally diseased or defective defendants by making the defense of irresponsibility more acceptable to the public and to the jury. It seems preferable to make dangerousness the criterion for continued custody rather than to provide that the committed person may be discharged or released when restored to sanity as defined by the mental hygiene laws. Although his mental disease may have greatly improved, such a person may still be dangerous because of factors in his personality and background other than mental disease. Also, such a standard provides a possible means for the control of the occasional defendant who may be quite dangerous but who successfully feigned mental disease to gain an acquittal. The prescribed procedure protects both the public and the defendant by providing for an independent psychiatric examination of the defendant before action on the application for release, and then either for summary favorable action on the application or a full hearing. The provision for release on probation furnishes additional protection to the public in the case of those individuals who need some supervision upon their return to the community.

The proposed provision gives the community court the exclusive power (aside from habeas corpus) to discharge or release the defendant. The proposed law is much stricter than traditional laws in this area, it gives procedural protection to both the defendant and the general public.

Although a few states have prescribed a minimum time the committed person must be kept in custody, and have restricted the frequency with which application for his release may be made, [46-14-303] allows the superintendent of the Montana State Hospital to make or renew such application at any time. Applications by the patient are limited by what is thought to be the period necessary to observe him initially (six months) and by the interval probably necessary for a significant change in his condition to occur after any application has been denied (one year).

Case Notes

Release of Stalker Unsafe — Continuing Custody Warranted: Following conviction on felony stalking charges, Cooney was diagnosed with an erotomanic type of delusional disorder that manifested itself in an obsession with delusional beliefs that another person was in love with him. The District Court found that Cooney continued to suffer from a mental disease or defect and that if released, Cooney was capable of again acting on his delusional beliefs, creating a substantial risk of serious bodily injury to his victim. Cooney's stalking activities over 8 years caused the victim a great deal of emotional anguish related to fears for her own and her family's safety and may have resulted in a diagnosable psychiatric condition for her. Coupled with the opinion of two experts that Cooney would likely resume stalking activities if released, the District Court did not err in committing Cooney to the continuing custody of the Department of Public Health and Human Services. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Cooney, 1998 MT 208, 290 M 414, 963 P2d 1272, 55 St. Rep. 886 (1998).

Denial of Unconditional Release Proper When Condition Unchanged and Risk of Reoffending Exists: Woods was charged with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) in 1974. Following examination at Montana State Hospital, he moved for and was granted acquittal based on mental disease or defect and was committed to the hospital. Pursuant to this section, Woods sought unconditional release in 1994, contending that he was not seriously mentally ill, that his pedophilia was in remission, and that he posed no risk or threat. The trial court disagreed and twice denied the petition for release. Despite Woods's contention that he should be released because the state failed to meet its burden of proof at the first hearing and that the statutes do not provide for sequential hearings, on appeal, the Supreme Court found that Woods was not deprived of due process. Although experts agreed that Woods was not seriously mentally ill, the question was whether his mental disease or defect presented a substantial risk or threat of injury to person or property. Following St. v. Korell, 222 M 112, 720 P2d 688 (1986), the court noted that the fact that a mental condition is in remission supports an inference that the condition still exists. Woods refused treatment for pedophilia while incarcerated, and his condition remained unchanged from the time of placement at the hospital. Absent treatment, the risk that Woods would reoffend constituted a sufficient substantial risk of imminent threat of injury to others that denial of the petition for unconditional release was affirmed. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Woods, 285 M 46, 945 P2d 918, 54 St. Rep. 1036 (1997).

No Appeal, Based on Constitutionality of Offense Charged, From Judgment of Not Guilty by Reason of Mental Disease or Defect: Kaplan was charged with seven counts of stalking under 45-5-220, arising from her repeated contact with her former martial arts instructor. Kaplan moved to dismiss the charges on grounds that 45-5-220 is unconstitutional. Following a briefing, the motion was denied. By stipulation, Kaplan was subsequently found not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect. Because Kaplan was not convicted, there was no judgment of conviction from which to appeal. Therefore, the denial of her motion to dismiss, absent a judgment of conviction, was not itself an appealable order. The proper method of challenging a finding of mental disease or defect is found in 46-14-301 through 46-14-303. Appealing the constitutionality of the statute under which the person was charged is not an option. St. v. Kaplan, 275 M 108, 910 P2d 240, 53 St. Rep. 60 (1996), followed in St. v. Violette, 2009 MT 19, 349 M 81, 201 P3d 804 (2009).

Burden of Proof — Applicable Standard: This section does not establish a standard of requiring that the defendant carry the burden of proving that there is "no potential for harm". The defendant satisfied his burden under this section by submitting a therapy program recommended by Warm Springs State Hospital (now Montana State Hospital) that was not opposed by the state. St. v. Leischner, 200 M 272, 650 P2d 797, 39 St. Rep. 1737 (1982).

Multiple Charges — Acquittal by Reason of Lack of Mental State on Some Charges — Conviction on Other Charges: Prior to 1981 amendments, the court held that "acquitted", as used near the beginning of the section, meant total acquittal under which the defendant would be released but for the commitment provision of this section. Thus, a defendant charged with multiple offenses who was acquitted on some of the offenses by reason of a lack of mental state and convicted of other offenses is not to be committed under this section because to hold otherwise would be to create the situation where a judge may be caught between statutes mandating both the commitment and the imprisonment of a defendant. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Jury Instruction — Commitment on Acquittal: It was not error to refuse to give a jury instruction stating that acquittal due to mental disease or defect results in a commitment of the defendant to Montana State Hospital. Following St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975), it is the jury's function to determine the facts relative to guilt or innocence, not to consider alternatives available to the court following the verdict. St. v. Buckman, 193 M 145, 630 P2d 743, 38 St. Rep. 1007 (1981).

Allowable Conditions of Release: A person released from custody in Warm Springs State Hospital after commitment stemming from acquittal of a crime by reason of insanity may not be subjected to release conditions which as applied to such person would be unconstitutional. Thus, the imposition of probation conditions having the tone or effect of being punitive is expressly disapproved. However, some form of overseeing by the parole division may be acceptable in order to balance the competing interests of the person released and the public. In re Application of Zion v. Xanthopoulos, 178 M 468, 585 P2d 1084 (1978).

Acquittal for Mental Disease or Defect — Appeal by State:

Under former law, a judgment of acquittal on the ground of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility could not be directly appealed by the State. St. v. Nelson, 178 M 280, 583 P2d 435, 35 St. Rep. 1496 (1978).

Under former law, the State had no right of direct appeal of an acquittal by reason of mental defect excluding responsibility because the defendant was not free of control by the court as in the case of dismissal. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

Constitutionality of Mental Defect Provisions: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that the Montana provision for notice of mental defect or disease and the mental defect or disease provisions in 46-14-101 through 46-14-401 (46-14-401 was renumbered 46-14-217) and 46-15-301 are unconstitutional. (In 1985, 46-15-301 was repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329.) St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Substantial Evidence of Risk of Serious Bodily Injury if Mental Patient Released From Custody: Cooney was convicted of stalking a woman in 1994. In 1996, Cooney was charged with stalking the same woman but was found unfit to proceed and was committed to an institution for as long as the unfitness continued. Cooney ultimately pleaded not guilty by reason of mental disease or defect and was committed to the state hospital. In January 1998, the commitment was extended, but in December 1998, the state petitioned for Cooney's conditional release and the District Court ordered a mental evaluation. Following the evaluation, the state moved to dismiss the petition, citing Cooney's psychiatric decompensation. The court held that Cooney presented a substantial risk of serious bodily injury or death to himself or others and continued the commitment, and Cooney appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the evidence presented, including the record of Cooney's history, medical opinions regarding Cooney's continuing delusional disorder, the stalking victim's statement about her fears should Cooney be released, and medical opinions about Cooney's likely actions and the victim's likely reaction if Cooney were released, clearly established that, if released, Cooney presented a substantial risk of causing serious mental impairment in another person and therefore posed a substantial risk of serious bodily injury or death to himself or others. St. v. Cooney, 2000 MT 138, 300 M 31, 1 P3d 956, 57 St. Rep. 558 (2000).

Mental Disease or Defect Affirmatively Defined: Noting that Montana does not offer a statutory definition of mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court held that pursuant to this section, the Legislature intends courts to interpret the term and that an affirmative definition is necessary to resolve the ambiguity between legal and medical definitions. Modifying the definition in the New York Criminal Procedure Law, the court defined mental disease or defect under 46-14-101 as an affliction with a mental disease or mental condition that is manifested by a disorder or disturbance in behavior, feeling, thinking, or judgment to such an extent that the person afflicted requires care, treatment, and rehabilitation. This affirmative definition complements but does not alter the exclusion in 46-14-101 of an abnormality manifested only by repeated criminal or other antisocial behavior. Wooster appealed from a decision that he continued to be a danger to society, thus preventing his release from the state hospital where he was confined after being acquitted and determined incompetent to stand trial for the deliberate homicide of his daughters. The appropriate inquiry in determining whether an acquittee no longer suffers from a mental disease or defect is whether the acquittee suffers from a present mental disease or defect that causes the person to present a substantial risk, which the state must prove in civil proceedings by clear and convincing evidence. It is not necessary that the court find that an acquittee have the same mental disease or defect that was present when the acquittee was originally committed. Wooster's mental evaluation showed that he would be dangerous if released without supervision and further treatment, and the District Court did not err in concluding that Wooster posed a continuing danger to himself and others, warranting further confinement at the state hospital. However, the Supreme Court remanded for further determination of whether Wooster's antisocial personality disorder met the affirmative definition of mental disease or defect. St. v. Wooster, 1999 MT 22, 293 M 195, 974 P2d 640, 56 St. Rep. 103 (1999). See also Jones v. U.S., 463 US 354, 77 L Ed 2d 694, 103 S Ct 3043 (1983), Foucha v. Case Notes Constitutionality of Release Procedure: Under the facts of the case, the Circuit Court rejected the argument that it was a violation of equal protection for this chapter to fail to provide a method of release of a committed person substantially equivalent to the method provided to those committed under Title 53, ch. 21, who are not accused of a crime. Appellant was twice held to be a danger to the community, and 46-14-303 provides a recurringly available means of release. Houghton v. South, 743 F2d 1438 (9th Cir. 1984).

Probative Value of Original Evaluation in Petition for Release: In 1977, Olson petitioned for release from Montana State Hospital. The State, in opposing the petition, introduced psychiatric evidence from the 1970 rape trial in which he was found not guilty by reason of insanity. The Supreme Court said that 46-14-303 calls for a determination of the mental condition of the committed person as of the time for the petition for release. As the interval between the original evaluation and the subsequent petition for release lengthens, the earlier testimony loses its probative value. St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979).

Relevance of Criminal Acts to Petition for Release: The mere fact that an insanity acquittee on de facto self-imposed "probation" for 5 years has committed criminal assault is not reason enough to warrant his continued confinement at Montana State Hospital. The State must show that the 1977 criminal assault was related to the mental disorder diagnosed in 1970 that resulted in his acquittal of a rape charge and commitment to Warm Springs. St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979).

Self-Determined Conditional Releasee: In 1971, Olson was found not guilty of rape by reason of insanity and committed to Montana State Hospital. A year later he walked away, and the authorities of the state hospital failed to notify the committing court or any law enforcement officials of his departure. For the next 5 years, he lived in Great Falls with his wife and family. In 1977, he was returned to Montana State Hospital and then petitioned for release. The court found "in a very real sense his status was that of a conditional, albeit self-determined, releasee, the condition frankly being that he avoid contact with the law. For the five year period specified in 46-14-304, Olson lived up to this condition." St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979).

Allowable Conditions of Release: A person released from custody in Montana State Hospital after commitment stemming from acquittal of a crime by reason of insanity may not be subjected to release conditions which as applied to such person would be unconstitutional. Thus, the Requirements for Release After Acquittal: A person acquitted of a crime on the ground of mental disease or defect may later be released from commitment in the state hospital only if the release is recommended both by the hospital superintendent and also by the District Judge after hearing and determination beyond a reasonable doubt that the person committed will not be dangerous in the foreseeable future. State ex rel. Main v. District Court, 164 M 501, 525 P2d 28 (1974).

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 397 at beginning of (1) substituted "The court may order revocation of a person's conditional release" for "If within 5 years after the conditional release of a committed person"; substituted (1)(b) relating to existence of substantial likelihood of mental disease or defect that causes substantial risk for "that for the safety of the person or for the safety of others the person's conditional release should be revoked"; at beginning of (3) inserted "If the court finds that the conditional release should be revoked" and in middle substituted "director of the department of corrections and human services" for "superintendent of the Montana state hospital"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 19, 1993.

1991 Amendment: After "recommitted to the" inserted "custody of the"; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: Substituted "Montana state hospital" for "Warm Springs state hospital".

Case Notes

Hearsay Exception Applicable to Testimony of Release Center Director in Considering Revocation of Conditional Release: The defendant asserted that testimony of the director of the release center where the defendant was committed was improperly admitted at a hearing to determine whether revocation of release was proper based on the defendant's behavior. The Supreme Court held that the director's testimony, based on regularly written reports of behavioral problems and counseling sessions kept in the regular course of business and prepared by a staff therapist, was credible, reliable, and well-grounded within the hearsay exception established in Rule 803(6), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). St. v. Edmundson, 246 M 241, 805 P2d 1289, 47 St. Rep. 1937 (1990).

Right to Confrontation Not Applicable to Revocation of Conditional Release — Civil Proceeding: The right to confrontation guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.) only attaches to criminal proceedings. The process established for the commitment, discharge, release, and recommitment of a person to the Warm Springs State Hospital, as established in 46-14-301, et seq., is civil in nature, and the confrontation clause does not apply to hearings held as part of that process. St. v. Edmundson, 246 M 241, 805 P2d 1289, 47 St. Rep. 1937 (1990).

Standard Applicable to Evidence Offered in Hearing on Revocation of Conditional Release: Following the standard set out in St. v. Kern, 212 M 385, 695 P2d 1300 (1984), the evidence a court relies on in revoking conditional release under this section must satisfy the court that the conduct of the person on release has not been in keeping with conditions of the release agreement and that the conduct raises a question of safety of the person and the public. St. v. Edmundson, 246 M 241, 805 P2d 1289, 47 St. Rep. 1937 (1990).

Relevance of Criminal Acts to Petition for Release: The mere fact that an insanity acquittee on de facto self-imposed "probation" for 5 years has committed criminal assault is not reason enough to warrant his continued confinement at Montana State Hospital. The State must show that the 1977 criminal assault was related to the mental disorder diagnosed in 1970 that resulted in his acquittal of a rape charge and commitment to Warm Springs. St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979).

Self-Determined Conditional Releasee: In 1971, Olson was found not guilty of rape by reason of insanity and committed to Montana State Hospital. A year later he walked away, and the authorities of the state hospital failed to notify the committing court or any law enforcement officials of his departure. For the next 5 years, he lived in Great Falls with his wife and family. In 1977, he was returned to Montana State Hospital and then petitioned for release. The court found "in a very real sense his status was that of a conditional, albeit self-determined, releasee, the condition frankly being that he avoid contact with the law. For the five year period specified in 46-14-304, Olson lived up to this condition." St. v. Olson, 181 M 323, 593 P2d 724 (1979).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 268 in (1) in first sentence near middle after "claims" inserted language concerning the time of the omnibus hearing or the time of any change of plea, in last sentence after "and shall" substituted language regarding the sentencing court's consideration of the results of the presentence investigation for "require additional evidence that it considers necessary for the determination of the issue, including examination of the defendant and a report of the examination as provided in 46-14-202 and 46-14-206"; inserted (2) requiring the sentencing court to order a presentence investigation and report; and made minor changes in style. Case Notes

District Court Conclusion as to Mental Disease or Defect Not to Be Disturbed Unless Unsupported by Record: Gallmeier was convicted of robbery and sentenced to prison. Gallmeier contended that the District Court was required to impose a sentence with the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) because of Gallmeier's mental condition. The Supreme Court will not disturb a District Court's conclusion regarding a defendant's mental disease or defect unless that conclusion is unsupported by the record. In this case, the District Court determined at the sentencing hearing that Gallmeier's mental illness had not influenced Gallmeier's behavior to the degree that a sentence in the state mental institution would be more appropriate. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's determination that Gallmeier did not meet the burden of proof for commitment to DPHHS. St. v. Gallmeier, 2009 MT 68, 349 M 424, 203 P3d 852 (2009), following St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Correct Finding of No Mental Illness During Revocation Proceeding: During Price's sentence revocation proceedings, the District Court found that Price did not suffer from a mental illness. Noting that under St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court considered the District Court's conclusion and affirmed based on the record that there was no evidence that Price suffered from a mental illness. Several experts testified that Price was personality-disordered but did not suffer from a psychosis, and Price's own actions showed that he wanted to intimidate people g;CNS122162em believe he was violent. St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Evidence of Knowing or Purposeful Action Despite Mental Disease or Defect — Aggravated Assault Conviction Affirmed: Meckler was convicted of aggravated assault and committed to the Department of Public Health and Human Services for life. Meckler contended that he could not be found guilty of aggravated assault because he lacked the ability to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law due to a mental disease or defect. It was undisputed that Meckler suffered from paranoid schizophrenia and was not taking his medications at the time he committed the offense; however, the presence of a mental disease or defect does not necessarily preclude that person from acting purposely or knowingly. Evidence showed that Meckler knew that he struck the victim and that the victim suffered serious bodily injury as a result and showed that Meckler was lucid, coherent, and functional prior to and after the attack. Thus, the trial court correctly concluded that Meckler's volitional act was done knowingly or purposely, and the assault conviction was affirmed. The mental disease or defect was properly considered at sentencing rather than as an element of the offense. St. v. Meckler, 2008 MT 277, 345 M 302, 190 P3d 1104 (2008).

Inapplicability of Mental Disease or Defect Sentencing Provisions to Probation Revocation Proceedings: Boulton asserted that because her probation violations were the result of a mental illness, she should have been sentenced to continued probation with intense supervision pursuant to 46-14-312 and this section, rather than committed to the Department of Corrections. The state argued that sentencing provisions related to a defendant with a mental disease or defect apply only to original sentencing and not to sentence revocation proceedings. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. It is generally irrelevant whether a probation violation may have been committed while a probationer was suffering a mental disease or defect. Rather, the question is whether the purposes of rehabilitation are being achieved and whether, by virtue of subsequent criminal conduct or evidence that a probationer's behavior was not in compliance with the rules and objectives of the probation, the objectives of probation are best served by continued liberty or by incarceration. The alternative sentencing provisions of 46-14-312 and this section do not apply in sentence revocation proceedings, although the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect during the proceedings. In the present case, after Boulton pleaded true to multiple probation violations, the revoking court concluded that evidence of Boulton's mental disorders did not warrant placement in the state hospital, consistent with the testimony of Boulton's psychiatrist, and that placement with the Department better served the purposes of probation. Revocation of Boulton's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), following St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001).

Consideration of Defendant's Mental State During Revocation Proceedings — Commitment to Department of Corrections Affirmed: After Burke admitted violating five probation conditions, the District Court considered several sentencing alternatives during revocation proceedings. In doing so, the court considered Burke's mental condition, allowing a confidential mental health evaluation. The psychologist determined that Burke suffered from several mental conditions requiring medication, but found no indication of organic impairment, mental retardation, or psychoses, and could not say with medical certainty that the mental condition caused Burke to violate parole. The psychologist opined that Burke understood his legal situation and had the capacity to plan a legal strategy with counsel and recommended placement at the state hospital. The District Court acknowledged Burke's mental condition, but found that the condition did not render Burke unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform his behavior to the requirements of the law, so Burke's suspended sentence was revoked, and Burke was committed to the Department of Corrections for the remainder of the original sentence. Burke appealed on grounds that he should instead have been sentenced to the Department of Public Health and Human Services, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The District Court had wide latitude in sentencing Burke, and absent a showing that the District Court acted arbitrarily without the employment of conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason, resulting in substantial injustice, the sentence was affirmed. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005).

Review of Finding of Mental Disease or Defect — Abuse of Discretion Standard: The Supreme Court reviews a District Court determination of the existence of a mental disease or defect to determine whether the District Court has abused its discretion. An abuse of discretion occurs when the District Courts acts arbitrarily without the employment of conscientious judgment or exceeds the bounds of reason, resulting in substantial injustice. St. v. Burke, 2005 MT 250, 329 M 1, 122 P3d 427 (2005), following St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003).

When Defendant's Mental State May Be Considered — Insanity Defense Not Allowed: There is no constitutional right to an insanity defense in Montana, but a defendant's mental disease or defect may be considered at three separate stages of a criminal proceeding: (1) prior to trial, when a defendant may be examined to determine the ability to understand the proceedings and participate in the defense; (2) at trial, when a defendant may introduce evidence of mental disease or defect whenever relevant to prove an absence of the requisite mental state; and (3) at sentencing, when a convicted defendant may claim that at the time of the offense the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect that rendered the defendant unable to appreciate the criminality of the defendant's behavior or to conform the defendant's conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

Proper Consideration of Defendant's Mental State to Justify Sentencing With Department of Corrections Rather Than Department of Public Health and Human Services: Following a drug conviction, the District Court considered Rathbun's mental condition pursuant to this section and determined that Rathbun did not meet the burden of proof for commitment to the Department of Public Health and Human Services. Rathbun was instead sentenced to concurrent 10-year sentences with the Department of Corrections, and Rathbun appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court properly considered Rathbun's mental state at the time that the offenses occurred, and the sentences were within the parameters established by statute. Rathbun did not meet the burden of proof under this section, and the commitment to the Department of Corrections was a proper application of the appropriate commitment regime to avoid cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Rathbun, 2003 MT 210, 317 M 66, 75 P3d 3334 (2003).

Independent Judicial Finding of Mental Disease or Defect — Sufficient Judicial Independence Found to Support Sentence: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was found guilty of deliberate homicide and attempted deliberate homicide and was sentenced to life imprisonment without parole. He was also found guilty of robbery and was sentenced to 40 years, to run consecutively, and was also sentenced to an additional 10 years on each of three counts for use of a weapon. On appeal, Scarborough argued that the sentence was improper because the District Court had failed to make an independent finding of whether he suffered from a mental disease or defect, and had simply adopted the jury's finding as the District Court's own findings. The Supreme Court noted the language of the District Court's finding in which the District Court held that it "cannot" make the finding requested by Scarborough and that, as far as the jury's finding that Scarborough acted knowingly and purposefully went, the District Court held that the "Court sees no reason to interfere with that finding and, in fact, concurs with those findings". Based upon this record, the Supreme Court held that it was clear that the District Court "independently considered the issue and, like the jury, concluded that Scarborough did not suffer from a mental disease or defect", that the District Court had complied with the requirements of this section, and that the sentence was therefore not improper. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Mental Disease Not Affecting Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Behavior — Prison Sentence, Rather Than Hospitalization, Appropriate: Smith contended that the District Court erred in concluding that he did not suffer from a mental disease or defect that rendered him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law, pursuant to 46-14-312 and this section, and that because of his personality disorder, he should have been sentenced to the state hospital rather than the state prison for felony assault and assault on a peace officer in order to satisfy state principles of prevention and reformation in light of his unique and particular posture as a mentally ill person. However, even assuming that Smith had a mental disease or defect, the District Court found that Smith's mental condition did not have the effect of rendering him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law. Smith failed to satisfy this additional element of this section, so hospitalization was not required under 46-14-312. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000).

Psychological Evaluation in Record — Upholds Defendant's Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Acts — Conflicting Evidence: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged her ability to appreciate the criminality of her offense. The Supreme Court reviewed the record and noted that Collier was given four different mental examinations and that three of the four found Collier to be competent and fit to proceed with the charges against her. Although the fourth evaluation found Collier suffering from diminished capacity due to her mental illness, the Supreme Court held that the District Court properly resolved the conflicting evidence before it and did not abuse its discretion in not sentencing Collier to a mental institution. St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Section Not Violative of Constitutional Right to Jury Trial: Defendant argued that 46-14-312 allows the court to decide the issue of mental disease or defect when considering the issue as part of the sentencing scheme, in violation of the constitutional right to a trial by jury guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). However, by the time 46-14-312 is applied, defendant has already received a trial. The effect of considering the issue at sentencing does not nullify the jury verdict but rather provides a further precaution for the protection of both defendant and society by allowing mental disease or defect to be taken into account as it relates to appropriate institutionalization. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Sentence to Prison Not Abuse of Discretion: Although defendant was suffering from a mental defect at the time he committed deliberate homicide, the defect did not render him unable to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or render him unable to conform his conduct to the requirements of law. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it sentenced defendant to prison rather than a mental hospital. St. v. Tibbitts, 226 M 36, 733 P2d 1288, 44 St. Rep. 439 (1987).

Mental Disease or Defect Diagnosed After Trial and Sentencing — Case Remanded: When defendant was diagnosed after trial and sentencing as suffering from organic brain syndrome, progressive dementia, and possibly Alzheimer's disease, the Supreme Court remanded the issue of mental disease to the sentencing court for review, as this evidence was clearly relevant to defendant's sentence for sexual assault. St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364, 43 St. Rep. 1948 (1986).

Sentencing Court to Determine Mental Disease or Defect: Defendant appeared at the home of the victim and rang the doorbell. When the victim answered, defendant entered, chased her through the house, cornered her, and strangled her for 10 to 20 seconds with a rope. Defendant fled, and the victim asked two construction workers for help. The workers chased and caught defendant. Defendant notified the prosecution of his intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense. Defendant contended that he did not possess the requisite mental elements of purposely or knowingly. Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. Defendant asked the court to sentence him to Warm Springs. The court sentenced him to the Montana State Prison. On appeal, the defendant contended this was error due to diminished mental capacity. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded, stating that under the statutory scheme, once the defendant has been found guilty, the court must determine if the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect at the time of the offense. If the court finds this to be the case, he is sentenced to the care of the Director of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Because the trial court did not make the mandatory finding concerning mental disease or defect, the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Raty, 214 M 114, 692 P2d 17, 41 St. Rep. 2354 (1984). However, see St. v. Gray, 258 M 424, 853 P2d 93, 50 St. Rep. 596 (1993).

Independent Assessment by Judge Required: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. Four doctors testified before the jury concerning defendant's mental condition, and all filed written evaluations with the court. After the jury found defendant guilty, the judge, in announcing sentence, said he would not question the jury's finding regarding mental condition. On appeal, the Supreme Court said this action negated the judge's role under 46-14-311, which is designed to avoid cruel and unusual punishment. The jury is to consider mental disease or defect only as it relates to criminal state of mind. The judge must independently assess the defendant's sanity and fitness for penal punishment. The sentence was vacated and remanded for resentencing. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Insanity Defense Restriction — Not Cruel and Unusual: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. Defendant contended that Montana's abolition of insanity as an affirmative defense violated the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). The Supreme Court held that the criminal code does not permit punishment of a mentally ill person who has not committed a crime. The sentencing court is required to review the convicted defendant's mental condition at the time of the offense under 46-14-311. If the court finds a mental disease or defect existed, the defendant is placed in an appropriate institution for care and treatment. This independent review of mental condition is designed to prevent the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984), followed in St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884, 50 St. Rep. 1153 (1993).

Volitionally Impaired Defendant — Due Process Met: Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. He gave notice of his intent to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. After conviction, defendant appealed, contending that Montana's statutory insanity defense scheme did not recognize those who lack the ability to conform their conduct to the law. He contended that this elimination of the involuntariness defense violated due process. The Supreme Court held that the volitional aspect of mental disease or defect has not been eliminated from Montana law. Consideration of that factor has been transferred from the jury to the sentencing judge under 46-14-311. Section 45-2-202 provides that a voluntary act is a material element of every offense. That section and the definition of involuntary act in 45-2-101(31) adequately provide for an involuntariness defense. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Distinction Between Medical Diagnosis of Mental Illness and Legal Finding of Mental Disease Relieving Criminal Responsibility: A medical diagnosis of mental illness that requires treatment and a legal finding of mental disease that relieves criminal responsibility are distinguishable. It is possible to be diagnosed as suffering from a mental illness for medical and treatment purposes and, from a legal standpoint, still be criminally culpable. If the mental disease does not satisfy the conditions in 46-14-311 relating to culpability, a sentence of imprisonment may properly be imposed under 46-14-312. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Level of Impairment — Applicability of Section: This section and 46-14-312 involve a defendant seeking commitment after he has been convicted, and the findings provided in 46-14-312 affect sentencing only, not conviction. Involved are a standard of impairment and a consideration of evidence that are or may be different from those involved in the conviction. The proper provisions relating to the level of impairment for commitment on acquittal are found at 46-14-301, and another level of impairment is considered for exception to mandatory minimum sentencing in 46-18-222. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Submission of Defense to Jury — When Justified: Under former law, to justify submitting the defense of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility to the jury, the defendant must have introduced some evidence showing: (1) that he had a mental disease or defect at the time of the incident; and (2) that as a result of such mental disease or defect the defendant was unable to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or to conform his conduct to the requirements of law. St. v. Neel, 177 M 93, 580 P2d 456 (1978).

Evidence of Subsequent Adjudication of Incompetence: It was within the court's discretion to exclude evidence that a guardian had been appointed for the defendant and that he had been declared incompetent 9 months after the commission of a homicide because the passage of time may have so altered conditions that the adjudication may have been irrelevant to the issue of the defendant's mental condition at the time of the offense. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

Negative Report From Psychiatrist: Under former law, a report of a psychiatrist from the state hospital finding no mental disease or defect precluded the granting of a pretrial acquittal. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

M'Naughten and "Irresistible Impulse" Rules Abandoned: The M'Naughten and "irresistible impulse" rules no longer apply, having been supplanted by the definition of criminal irresponsibility in subsection (1) of 46-14-101 (since deleted). The definition in subsection (1) was the same as that adopted by the American Law Institute in Article IV, Section 4.01, of the Model Penal Code except that the Montana Legislature substituted "is unable" for "lacks substantial capacity"; by that change the Legislature intended to impose a stricter test for mental incapacity than that contemplated by the Model Penal Code. State ex rel. Krutzfeldt v. District Court, 163 M 164, 515 P2d 1312 (1973). (Annotator's Note: Definition is now found in 46-14-311.)

46-14-312. Sentence to be imposed.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 452 in (2) in first sentence and in (3)(c) after "defect" inserted "or developmental disability"; in (2) in middle of second and third sentences after "defendant" inserted "and recommendations of the professionals who have evaluated the defendant", in second sentence after "mental health facility" inserted "as defined in 53-21-102, residential facility, as defined in 53-20-102, or developmental disabilities facility, as defined in 53-20-202", and in third sentence after "another" substituted "correctional, mental health, residential, or developmental disabilities" for "correctional or mental health"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

1995 Amendments: Chapter 256 in (2), in first sentence after "placed", inserted clause requiring consideration of recommendations of professionals providing treatment to defendant and substituted "correctional or mental health facility" for "institution" and inserted second sentence allowing Director to transfer defendant to facility that will better serve defendant's needs.

Chapter 546 in (2), in first sentence, substituted "department of public health and human services" for "department of corrections and human services". Amendment effective July 1, 1995.

Saving Clause: Section 571, Ch. 546, L. 1995, was a saving clause.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 262 made minor changes in style.

Chapter 397 inserted (3)(c) that read: "(c) the defendant suffers from a mental disease or defect but is not a danger to the defendant or others"; inserted (3)(d)(iii) that read: "(iii) the defendant will no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the mental disease or defect"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 19, 1993.

1991 Amendments — Instructions to Code Commissioner: The Code Commissioner changed "department of institutions" to "department of corrections and human services", pursuant to sec. 1, Ch. 262, L. 1991, directing the Code Commissioner to make the change wherever necessary in the Montana Code Annotated. Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 made minor changes in style.

1987 Amendment: At beginning of (3) inserted "Either the director or" and after "certifies that" substituted (3)(a) through (3)(c) relating to mental disease or defect certifications for "the defendant has been cured of the mental disease or defect"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

District Court Conclusion as to Mental Disease or Defect Not to Be Disturbed Unless Unsupported by Record: Gallmeier was convicted of robbery and sentenced to prison. Gallmeier contended that the District Court was required to impose a sentence with the Department of Public Health and Human Services (DPHHS) because of Gallmeier's mental condition. The Supreme Court will not disturb a District Court's conclusion regarding a defendant's mental disease or defect unless that conclusion is unsupported by the record. In this case, the District Court determined at the sentencing hearing that Gallmeier's mental illness had not influenced Gallmeier's behavior to the degree that a sentence in the state mental institution would be more appropriate. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's determination that Gallmeier did not meet the burden of proof for commitment to DPHHS. St. v. Gallmeier, 2009 MT 68, 349 M 424, 203 P3d 852 (2009), following St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Correct Finding of No Mental Illness During Revocation Proceeding: During Price's sentence revocation proceedings, the District Court found that Price did not suffer from a mental illness. Noting that under St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect, the Supreme Court considered the District Court's conclusion and affirmed based on the record that there was no evidence that Price suffered from a mental illness. Several experts testified that Price was personality-disordered but did not suffer from a psychosis, and Price's own actions showed that he wanted to intimidate people and have them believe he was violent. St. v. Price, 2008 MT 319, 346 M 106, 193 P3d 921 (2008).

Inapplicability of Mental Disease or Defect Sentencing Provisions to Probation Revocation Proceedings: Boulton asserted that because her probation violations were the result of a mental illness, she should have been sentenced to continued probation with intense supervision pursuant to 46-14-311 and this section, rather than committed to the Department of Corrections. The state argued that sentencing provisions related to a defendant with a mental disease or defect apply only to original sentencing and not to sentence revocation proceedings. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. It is generally irrelevant whether a probation violation may have been committed while a probationer was suffering a mental disease or defect. Rather, the question is whether the purposes of rehabilitation are being achieved and whether, by virtue of subsequent criminal conduct or evidence that a probationer's behavior was not in compliance with the rules and objectives of the probation, the objectives of probation are best served by continued liberty or by incarceration. The alternative sentencing provisions of 46-14-311 and this section do not apply in sentence revocation proceedings, although the revoking court may consider evidence of a mental disease or defect during the proceedings. In the present case, after Boulton pleaded true to multiple probation violations, the revoking court concluded that evidence of Boulton's mental disorders did not warrant placement in the state hospital, consistent with the testimony of Boulton's psychiatrist, and that placement with the Department better served the purposes of probation. Revocation of Boulton's sentence was affirmed. St. v. Boulton, 2006 MT 170, 332 M 538, 140 P3d 482 (2006), following St. v. Averill, 2001 MT 161, 306 M 106, 30 P3d 1059 (2001).

Proper Consideration of Defendant's Mental State to Justify Sentencing With Department of Corrections Rather Than Department of Public Health and Human Services: Following a drug conviction, the District Court considered Rathbun's mental condition pursuant to 46-14-311 and determined that Rathbun did not meet the burden of proof for commitment to the Department of Public Health and Human Services. Rathbun was instead sentenced to concurrent 10-year sentences with the Department of Corrections, and Rathbun appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court properly considered Rathbun's mental state at the time that the offenses occurred, and the sentences were within the parameters established by statute. Rathbun did not meet the burden of proof under 46-14-311, and the commitment to the Department of Corrections was a proper application of the appropriate commitment regime to avoid cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Rathbun, 2003 MT 210, 317 M 66, 75 P3d 3334 (2003).

Plea Bargain Specifying Placement at State Hospital — Transfer From State Hospital to State Prison Within Sentencing Court's Statutory Authority: Lamb left a bomb on his neighbor's doorstep, then called police the next day to report that he thought that he had done so. Lamb was convicted of attempted aggravated assault and possession of a destructive device and, following a plea bargain, was sentenced to 20 years at the state hospital. After 5 months, a determination was made that the placement was inappropriate, and Lamb was transferred to the state prison. Lamb petitioned for postconviction relief and was transferred back to the hospital. The state then petitioned for sentence review and recommended transfer back to the prison, and the District Court granted the petition. Lamb appealed, arguing that because the original sentence was made pursuant to a binding plea agreement and was for commitment to the state hospital and not the state prison, any modification of that sentence was illegal. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under this section, the District Court may transfer a defendant previously committed to the state hospital to a correctional facility if certain statutory criteria are met. The statute provides a procedure whereby the Director of the Department of Corrections or the defendant may petition for sentence review if a professional person certifies that the defendant no longer suffers from a mental disease or defect, and once the petition is filed, the District Court is free to make any order within its original sentencing authority. Here, the petition was properly filed, and the sentence was within that allowed for the crimes charged, so transfer to the state prison was not illegal. St. v. Lamb, 2001 MT 241, 307 M 54, 36 P3d 871 (2001).

Question Whether Parole Denied for Failure to Satisfy Additional Treatment Conditions — Remand: Ringewold pleaded guilty to two counts of felony assault and was sentenced to a total of 14 years' commitment to the Department of Corrections. The next day, Ringewold was placed in the state hospital. The placement order allowed Ringewold to petition for a conditional release from the hospital, but did not specify any conditions. About 17 months later, Ringewold petitioned for release from the hospital. The state agreed that a hearing on the petition was proper, but argued that if it was found that Ringewold no longer suffered from a mental disease or defect that presented a risk to Ringewold or others, it was appropriate to remand Ringewold to the Department. The District Court ordered an independent mental evaluation, but it was never performed. Ringewold then filed another petition for release, but about the same time, the hospital staff determined that Ringewold would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment and transferred him to the state prison pursuant to this section. At the request of counsel, Ringewold was transferred back to the state hospital, with the state conceding that hospital placement was proper and that Ringewold should be allowed to petition for release pursuant to this section. About 4 months later, the Department Director sought an order transferring Ringewold back to the prison on grounds that Ringewold continued to suffer from a dangerous mental disorder but would no longer benefit from active inpatient treatment for the disorder. At a conditional release hearing about 9 months later, the District Court orally resentenced Ringewold to 8 years in prison. The court specified that the total sentence not exceed more than the original sentence, but the court also conditioned Ringewold's parole on completion of an anger management course, moral reconation therapy, and chemical dependence treatment. In a written amended judgment about 1 month later, the District Court reimposed the original 14-year sentence and restated the parole conditions. Ringewold appealed. The Supreme Court held that under St. v. Lane, 1998 MT 76, 288 M 286, 957 P2d 9 (1998), the oral pronouncement of sentence was legally effective and constituted final judgment. However, it was not possible to determine from the record whether the additional conditions added to the sentence improperly lengthened Ringewold's sentence, so the case was remanded for supplementation of the factual record to determine if Ringewold was being denied consideration for parole because of failure to satisfy the additional treatment conditions and, if so, to strike the conditions from the amended judgment, because under those circumstances, the practical effect of the conditions would be to lengthen the sentence in violation of this section. St. v. Ringewold, 2001 MT 185, 306 M 229, 32 P3d 729 (2001).

Independent Judicial Finding of Mental Disease or Defect — Sufficient Judicial Independence Found to Support Sentence: Scarborough, a schizophrenic, was found guilty of deliberate homicide and attempted deliberate homicide and was sentenced to life imprisonment without parole. He was also found guilty of robbery and was sentenced to 40 years, to run consecutively, and was also sentenced to an additional 10 years on each of three counts for use of a weapon. On appeal, Scarborough argued that the sentence was improper because the District Court had failed to make an independent finding of whether he suffered from a mental disease or defect, and had simply adopted the jury's finding as the District Court's own findings. The Supreme Court noted the language of the District Court's finding in which the District Court held that it "cannot" make the finding requested by Scarborough and that, as far as the jury's finding that Scarborough acted knowingly and purposefully went, the District Court held that the "Court sees no reason to interfere with that finding and, in fact, concurs with those findings". Based upon this record, the Supreme Court held that it was clear that the District Court "independently considered the issue and, like the jury, concluded that Scarborough did not suffer from a mental disease or defect", that the District Court had complied with the requirements of 46-14-311, and that the sentence was therefore not improper. St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Mental Disease Not Affecting Ability to Appreciate Criminality of Behavior — Prison Sentence, Rather Than Hospitalization, Appropriate: Smith contended that the District Court erred in concluding that he did not suffer from a mental disease or defect that rendered him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law, pursuant to 46-14-311 and this section, and that because of his personality disorder, he should have been sentenced to the state hospital rather than the state prison for felony assault and assault on a peace officer in order to satisfy state principles of prevention and reformation in light of his unique and particular posture as a mentally ill person. However, even assuming that Smith had a mental disease or defect, the District Court found that Smith's mental condition did not have the effect of rendering him unable to appreciate the criminality of his behavior or to conform it to the requirements of law. Smith failed to satisfy this additional element of 46-14-311, so hospitalization was not required under this section. St. v. Smith, 2000 MT 57, 299 M 6, 997 P2d 768, 57 St. Rep. 272 (2000).

Section Not Violative of Constitutional Right to Jury Trial: Defendant argued that this section allows the court to decide the issue of mental disease or defect when considering the issue as part of the sentencing scheme, in violation of the constitutional right to a trial by jury guaranteed by the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution (similar to Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). However, by the time this section is applied, defendant has already received a trial. The effect of considering the issue at sentencing does not nullify the jury verdict but rather provides a further precaution for the protection of both defendant and society by allowing mental disease or defect to be taken into account as it relates to appropriate institutionalization. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part by St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Sentence to Prison Not Abuse of Discretion: Although defendant was suffering from a mental defect at the time he committed deliberate homicide, the defect did not render him unable to appreciate the criminality of his conduct or render him unable to conform his conduct to the requirements of law. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion when it sentenced defendant to prison rather than a mental hospital. St. v. Tibbitts, 226 M 36, 733 P2d 1288, 44 St. Rep. 439 (1987).

Transfer From State Hospital to State Prison — Not Cruel and Unusual Punishment: District Court's amended sentencing order transferring defendant from Montana State Hospital at Warm Springs to Montana State Prison did not constitute cruel and unusual punishment when it was based on medical opinions that the defendant did not suffer from a treatable mental illness. St. v. Korell, 222 M 112, 720 P2d 688, 43 St. Rep. 1101 (1986).

Sentencing Court to Determine Mental Disease or Defect: Defendant appeared at the home of the victim and rang the doorbell. When the victim answered, defendant entered, chased her through the house, cornered her, and strangled her for 10 to 20 seconds with a rope. Defendant fled, and the victim asked two construction workers for help. The workers chased and caught defendant. Defendant notified the prosecution of his intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense. Defendant contended that he did not possess the requisite mental elements of purposely or knowingly. Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault. Defendant asked the court to sentence him to Warm Springs. The court sentenced him to the Montana State Prison. On appeal, the defendant contended this was error due to diminished mental capacity. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded, stating that under the statutory scheme, once the defendant has been found guilty, the court must determine if the defendant was suffering from a mental disease or defect at the time of the offense. If the court finds this to be the case, he is sentenced to the care of the Director of the Department of Institutions (now Department of Public Health and Human Services). Because the trial court did not make the mandatory finding concerning mental disease or defect, the case was remanded for resentencing. St. v. Raty, 214 M 114, 692 P2d 17, 41 St. Rep. 2354 (1984). However, see St. v. Gray, 258 M 424, 853 P2d 93, 50 St. Rep. 596 (1993).

Independent Assessment by Judge Required: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. Four doctors testified before the jury concerning defendant's mental condition, and all filed written evaluations with the court. After the jury found defendant guilty, the judge, in announcing sentence, said he would not question the jury's finding regarding mental condition. On appeal, the Supreme Court said this action negated the judge's role under 46-14-311, which is designed to avoid cruel and unusual punishment. The jury is to consider mental disease or defect only as it relates to criminal state of mind. The judge must independently assess the defendant's sanity and fitness for penal punishment. The sentence was vacated and remanded for resentencing. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Insanity Defense Restriction — Not Cruel and Unusual: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. Defendant contended that Montana's abolition of insanity as an affirmative defense violated the eighth amendment to the United States Constitution's prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment (similar to Art. II, sec. 22, Mont. Const.). The Supreme Court held that the criminal code does not permit punishment of a mentally ill person who has not committed a crime. The sentencing court is required to review the convicted defendant's mental condition at the time of the offense under 46-14-311. If the court finds a mental disease or defect existed, the defendant is placed in an appropriate institution for care and treatment. This independent review of mental condition is designed to prevent the imposition of cruel and unusual punishment. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984), followed in St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884, 50 St. Rep. 1153 (1993).

Distinction Between Medical Diagnosis of Mental Illness and Legal Finding of Mental Disease Relieving Criminal Responsibility: A medical diagnosis of mental illness that requires treatment and a legal finding of mental disease that relieves criminal responsibility are distinguishable. It is possible to be diagnosed as suffering from a mental illness for medical and treatment purposes and, from a legal standpoint, still be criminally culpable. If the mental disease does not satisfy the conditions in 46-14-311 relating to culpability, a sentence of imprisonment may properly be imposed under this section. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Three Hundred-Year Prison Sentence of Mentally Ill Defendant Upheld: Sentencing defendant, who was found mentally ill but criminally culpable, to the Montana State Prison for a term of 300 years without the possibility of parole or furlough was not cruel and unusual punishment. The District Court had stated, among other things, that defendant was very dangerous and there was no treatment program that would alter his behavior. St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Level of Impairment — Applicability of Section: This section and 46-14-311 only involve a defendant seeking commitment after he has been convicted, and the findings provided by this section involve the discretion of the trial judge and only affect sentencing, not conviction. Involved are a standard of impairment and a consideration of evidence that are or may be different from those involved in the conviction. The proper provisions relating to the level of impairment for commitment on acquittal are found at 46-14-301, and another level of impairment is considered for exception to mandatory minimum sentencing in 46-18-222. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Defendant Sane at Time of Crime — Insane at Other Times: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, contended that sentencing a man suffering from severe mental illness to prison violates the constitutional ban against cruel and unusual punishment as well as 53-21-101. When a defendant is convicted and claims that he was suffering at the time of the crime from a mental disease or defect that rendered him incapable of conforming his conduct to the requirements of the law, the sentencing judge is to consider the relevant evidence of the defendant's disorder. If the judge finds the defendant did not suffer mental illness at the time of the crime, he is to be sentenced according to the guidelines in Title 46, ch. 18. If the finding is to the contrary, the defendant must be sentenced to Montana State Hospital. Despite the lack of provisions in this chapter for sentencing a defendant who was sane at the time of the crime but may be insane at other times, Title 53, ch. 21, relating to treatment of the mentally ill, does not apply to criminal defendants. The defendant's claim that he is covered by Title 53, ch. 21, is in error. Without a finding of insanity followed by sentencing to a penal institution without provision for adequate treatment, defendant has suffered no statutory or constitutional violation. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981), distinguished in St. v. Watson, 211 M 401, 686 P2d 879, 41 St. Rep. 1452 (1984).

Standard of Proof Improperly Applied: Under former law, it was error for the court in a pretrial evidentiary hearing to acquit the defendant by reason of mental disease or defect excluding responsibility when the judge failed to apply the proper standard for measuring the proof required to satisfy the court; thus, review by Writ of Supervisory Control was appropriate. St. v. Hagerud, 174 M 361, 570 P2d 1131 (1977).

Requirement That Mental Defect Be "Plain and Obvious": Under former law, while the opinion of a psychiatrist who examined the defendant was uncontradicted, the court could properly have found his opinion was based upon determinations of fact which were for a jury to determine. Therefore, the existence of a mental defect at the time of the incident was not so "plain and obvious" as to require that a motion for acquittal be granted without trial. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1382 (1977).

Burden of Proof: Under former law, an instruction that the amount of evidence sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of insanity entitles the defendant to an acquittal is erroneous, as insanity must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389 (1975).

Requirements for Acquittal: Under former law, there were three requirements for acquittal: (1) a report finding mental disease or defect at the time of the criminal conduct; (2) the court's determination that the mental disease or defect excluded responsibility; and (3) the defendant's motion for acquittal. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

Evidence Sufficient for Acquittal: Under former law, the defendant's motion for acquittal should have been granted when the uncontradicted testimony of a doctor, based on examination, testing, and observation over a period of several years, was to the effect that the defendant had been unable to conform his conduct to the law at the time of the crime. However, the entry of an acquittal does not allow the defendant to be released from the mental institution until a determination by the District Judge that the defendant is no longer dangerous. State ex rel. Main v. District Court, 164 M 501, 525 P2d 28 (1974).

Declaratory of Common Law: The provision that an insane person cannot be tried or punished was held declaratory of the common law as it had existed at least since Blackstone's day. St. v. Kitchens, 129 M 331, 286 P2d 1079 (1955).

CHAPTER 15
PRODUCTION OF EVIDENCE

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

1991 Chapter Comments: This chapter provides that under limited circumstances, either party may obtain and use depositions in felony criminal proceedings. These statutes combine elements of both the federal and state provisions governing depositions. None of the provisions in these statutes should significantly change established procedure.

Chapter Case Notes

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Motion In Limine to Exclude Documents and Testimony — General Testimony on Same Subject Allowed — No Effect on Substantial Rights of Defendant: A homicide defendant claimed error because the District Court granted the State a motion in limine refusing the introduction of specific documentary and testimonial evidence relating to an earlier incident involving the defendant and the victim that could have established the defendant's frame of mind relevant to self-defense in the homicide. The Supreme Court held that the refusal to admit such evidence did not affect substantial rights of the defendant because general testimony was admitted establishing that the incident occurred and what its general outcome was. St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984).

Part 1
Subpoenas and Witnesses

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part sets forth those statutes allowing for the use of subpoenas, postcharge, to gather evidence or to have witnesses appear and give testimony. The statutes are largely an adaptation of the 1987 code, but elements of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure have been used as well.

In reviewing the 1987 code concerning postcharge issuance of subpoenas, some irregularities were noted. For example, the general provisions did not allow relief from a subpoena and only the code concerning the subpoena of an out-of-state witness provided penalties for the failure to appear. These statutes address matters of relief and penalties that generally apply to the entire subpoena process.

No attempt was made to significantly alter the 1987 code provisions recognizing out-of-state subpoenas and establishing the interstate cooperation procedures. The statutes establish a generally applied and carefully regulated subpoena practice. Nothing in this part is intended to substantially alter established procedure.

Part Case Notes

Listing of New Witnesses Ten Days Before Trial — Defense Acquiescence in Noncontinuance: The state gave notice 10 days prior to trial of intent to possibly call 12 additional witnesses. After defense objection, the state agreed not to call five of those witnesses, whereupon the defense appeared to acquiesce in the decision not to continue the trial date. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the new witnesses. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987).

Compulsory Process — Non-American Witness: A defendant's right to compulsory process is not violated by the absence of a witness when an American court lacks the power to compel the attendance of a witness who is not a citizen of the United States. St. v. Twoteeth, 219 M 101, 711 P2d 789, 42 St. Rep. 1873 (1985).

Prosecution Witness Endorsed on Day of Trial — Failure to Request Continuance: Under the circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the prosecution to endorse a psychological counselor, an assistant to the doctor treating the victim, as a witness on the day of the trial. The counselor was previously interviewed by the defense, and the doctor had long been identified as a prosecution witness. The defense did not petition for a continuance, which should have been done if it was believed the endorsement left the defense inadequately prepared. St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984), followed in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the rule allowing any party to a criminal proceeding to subpoena any witness to appear and give testimony. The statute is a hybrid adaptation of the 1987 code and a statement from the Uniform Rules of Criminal Procedure. No significant change in subpoena practice is intended, but the statute does isolate the use of subpoenas for the appearance of a witness.

Subsection (1) preserves the primary provisions concerning the subpoena practice. See 1987 MCA 46-15-101. The statute is limited only to the subpoena of witnesses. The introductory clause "After the filing of charges" has been added to denote that this subpoena is used only after charges are filed.

Subsection (2) retains the content requirements of a subpoena as stated in the second sentence of 1987 MCA 46-15-101. These requirements are in addition to the requirement that a subpoena be directed toward a specific individual.

Subsection (3) adopts a sentence from the uniform rule concerning the subpoena of witnesses. The statute allows the witness who is served a subpoena to apply to the issuing court to quash or modify the subpoena. The statute's language is lifted directly from the uniform rule. See Rule 731(c), Unif. R. Crim. P. The 1987 code did not expressly provide an aggrieved party with an avenue of relief. Thus, to this degree, the statute alters established procedure.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1801, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-15-102 through 46-15-104 (renumbered 46-15-107, 46-15-115, and 46-15-116) are also derived from section 95-1801. The commission comments to section 95-1801 are printed in their entirety under 46-15-101.

Source: Kentucky Rule 7.02, R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-8904, 94-8905 and Illinois Supreme Court Rules on Discovery—25-5 and Federal Rule 16. Colorado Rules 17 (d) 4.

The purpose of [46-15-115] is to prevent an indigent defendant from indiscriminately subpoenaing unnecessary witnesses and greatly adding to expenses. After 6 witnesses, the defendant is required to go before the judge and justify the need for additional witnesses. Also, if any one witness is to be paid more than the usual fee, a court order is needed.

[Section 46-15-116] is substantially the same as the present code and merely authorizes the judge to reimburse or pay the expenses of a witness subpoenaed for a defendant. Reference to this is also made in [46-8-201, now repealed]. (See [26-2-501] which deals with witnesses' fees.) It is intended that [46-15-116] be sufficiently broad to allow the trial judge ample discretion to pay what he believes reasonable in the particular case. The provision does not attempt to particularize any of the expenses which might occur. The primary purpose of [46-15-322 through 46-15-329] is to allow discovery of necessary material by either the prosecution or the defendant from third parties.

Procedure for allowing discovery of the prosecution by the defendant and of the defendant by the prosecution is provided for in [part 3] of this chapter.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 138 at end of (2) inserted sentence relating to modification by agreement or by amended subpoena; and inserted (4) providing that subpoena remains in effect unless quashed or until final determination of action.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 inserted second sentence of (1) that read: "The court shall maintain a list of the names of the persons to whom subpoenas are issued."

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, inserted "After the filing of charges and", after "attorney" deleted "the court", and at end inserted "with the name of the person to whom each subpoena is directed, commanding the person to appear and to give testimony"; in (2), near end after "testimony", deleted "and produce objects and documents"; inserted (3) concerning quashing or modifying subpoena; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Subpoena of Materials in Prosecutor's Custody: The showing necessary to gain access to material in the hands of the prosecutor is greater than is required to obtain material in the hands of third parties. No error was involved because of a 1-week delay in compliance with a demand made by the defendant after the trial had begun. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Availability of Investigative Subpoena: A subpoena must be issued by a court and is not available to the Attorney General or other prosecuting attorneys independent of a court or grand jury. Under former law a subpoena was not available in cases not filed. State ex rel. Woodahl v. District Court, 166 M 31, 530 P2d 780 (1975).

46-15-106. Subpoenas for production of evidence.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute reflects the 1987 code only to the extent that it provides for the production of certain evidence on the basis of a subpoena. See 1987 MCA 46-15-101. The statute is modeled primarily after the federal rule governing such subpoenas. Although similar to the procedure for the subpoena of witnesses, the provisions have been separated for clarity.

Subsection (1) is a restatement of the federal rule allowing subpoenas to issue for the production of evidence. The provision requires that the subpoena be directed toward a person and that it identify the evidence desired to be produced. The adoption of this provision should not significantly alter established procedure. Compare 1987 MCA 46-15-101 and Rule 17(c), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Subsection (2) allows the court to control the manner in which and the extent to which evidence is produced under a subpoena. The court may direct which evidence should be produced and the time and place that it is to be produced. See Rule 17(c), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Subsection (3) allows the aggrieved party to apply for relief from an oppressive or otherwise unreasonable subpoena. This provision is reflected both in the federal rules and the uniform rules. See Rule 17(c), Fed. R. Crim. P., and Rule 731(c), Unif. R. Crim. P. Although the relief provision is not expressly recognized in the 1987 code, the provision does reflect prevailing practice.

46-15-107. Service of subpoenas.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-15-102 and contains provisions governing the service of subpoenas. The statute offers no changes to the 1987 code and is reflective of the service provisions present in the federal rules. Compare 1987 MCA 46-15-102 and Rule 17(d) and 17(e), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Case Notes

Jurisdiction to Issue Contempt Order — Service of Witness Subpoena Proper: The subpoena was delivered by the Deputy Sheriff to the relator's secretary who, in turn, showed the relator the subpoena. Because the secretary was over 18 years of age and was not a party to the action, the requirements of this section were fulfilled and the District Court had jurisdiction to issue a contempt order for disobedience to the witness subpoena. There was sufficient evidence to support the finding of contempt. State ex rel. Anderson v. District Court, 188 M 77, 610 P2d 1183 (1980).

46-15-112. Subpoena of witness in this state to testify in another state.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of the 1987 code that permitted a subpoena for a witness to appear in another state to have effect in this state. Under this statute, a subpoena for the appearance of a person in another state's proceedings may be reviewed and accepted by the District Court Judge in this state. If accepted, the District Court may order the person sought by the out-of-state subpoena to be held until arrangements may be made. The court also has discretion to simply order the person to appear for the out-of-state proceeding. This provision is one of many interstate cooperation provisions present in the code and was not amended.

Not retained in this statute is the provision concerning the compensation of witnesses. See 1987 MCA 46-15-112(4). The compensation of subpoenaed witnesses has been provided for in 46-15-116.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (2), in two places in first sentence, substituted "subpoena" for "summons"; in (3), after "judge", deleted "being satisfied of the desirability of such custody and delivery, for which determination the certificate shall be prima facie proof of such desirability" and after "subpoena" deleted "or summons"; deleted (4) that read: "(4) If the witness who is summoned as provided in this section, after being paid or tendered by some properly authorized person the sum of 10 cents a mile for each mile and $5 for each day that he is required to travel and attend as a witness, fails without good cause to attend and testify as directed in the summons, he shall be punished in the manner provided for the punishment of any witness who disobeys a summons issued from a court of record in this state"; and made minor changes in style.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a restatement of the 1987 code that allowed for the subpoena of a person in another state to appear in this state for certain criminal proceedings. Because this is one of many interstate cooperative agreements in the criminal code, it was not amended. Along with 46-15-112, this statute does not attempt to address witness fees, which are provided for in 46-15-116.

1991 Amendment: Deleted former (3) that read: "(3) Whenever a witness is summoned to attend and testify in this state, he shall be tendered the sum of 10 cents a mile for each mile and $5 for each day that he is required to travel and attend as a witness. If the state wherein the witness is found has by statutory enactment required that the summoned witness be paid an amount in excess of the amount specified in the preceding sentence, the witness may be tendered the amount required by that state"; in (3) substituted "subpoena" for "summons"; in (4), after "directed", deleted "in the summons", after "disobeys" substituted "an order" for "a summons", and at end inserted "in accordance with Title 3, chapter 1, part 5, or in accordance with 45-7-309"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Reimbursement for Costs Incurred in Procuring Witness Testimony: Hardaway sought reimbursement for costs incurred in procuring the testimony of two out-of-state witnesses, one who appeared in person under subpoena and one who was deposed telephonically. The District Court denied reimbursement because Hardaway's counsel was retained rather than court-appointed. However, the only prerequisites that appear in the applicable statutes are that the court has revenue available and that the witness be subpoenaed. The procedural requirements of this section for compelling the attendance of an out-of-state witness do not apply to an out-of-state witness who voluntarily appears and acknowledges service of a subpoena. Further, under 46-15-202, costs of a telephonic deposition are within the scope of a reimbursable deposition. The statutes do not distinguish between court-appointed and retained attorneys, but rather rely on the indigency of the defendant. Hardaway was declared indigent and remained so throughout the proceedings and, as such, was entitled to reimbursement for witness costs and deposition costs. St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998).

Denial of Motion to Provide Travel Costs of Immaterial Out-of-State Witnesses: The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion for provision of travel expenses for out-of-state defense witnesses after finding that the testimony of defendant and the victim covered all the testimony the out-of-state witnesses could possibly have provided, rendering testimony by the out-of-state witnesses immaterial. St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992).

Decision on Materiality of Witness' Testimony Discretionary: A trial court's finding as to the materiality of a witness when applying this statute will not be disturbed absent a clear showing of abuse of discretion. St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985), followed in St. v. Van Pelt, 247 M 99, 805 P2d 549, 48 St. Rep. 109 (1991).

46-15-115. Subpoena for witness when defendant unable to pay.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adoption of the federal rule allowing a subpoena to issue at the state's expense on behalf of an indigent defendant. See Rule 17(b), Fed. R. Crim. P. The statute requires that the defendant show that he is indigent and that the witness sought is necessary to an adequate defense. Subsection (1) is a reflection of the federal rule. Subsection (2) reflects the restraints under 1987 MCA 46-15-103 that required a court order for the subpoena of more than six witnesses.

2005 Amendment: (Version effective July 1, 2006) Chapter 449 in (1) after "defendant" inserted "acting pro se"; in (2) after "indigent" inserted reference to acting pro se and not represented by public defender; inserted (3) requiring witness costs to be paid by office of state public defender in certain cases; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2006.

Saving Clause: Section 78, Ch. 449, L. 2005, was a saving clause.

1991 Amendment: Inserted (1) concerning subpoena of witness for defendant unable to pay; in (2) deleted last two sentences that read: "If a witness is to be paid more than the regular fee or there are more than six witnesses to be paid, an order of the court or judge is needed. Such order may be made upon proper showing by affidavit or otherwise"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Purpose of Limitation: The purpose of a former statute providing that the clerk should not subpoena more than six witnesses for each party except upon an order of the court was to control the expenses of the county. It was a limitation upon the clerk of the court and not upon the judge. When the court allows more than six witnesses to testify for the State, the defendant is not prejudiced by the absence of an express order made by the court. St. v. Cockrell, 131 M 254, 309 P2d 316 (1957).

Materiality of Testimony of Additional Witnesses: It is proper for the court to require the defendant, upon a request for a subpoena for additional witnesses, to disclose the materiality of their testimony. St. v. O'Brien, 18 M 1, 43 P 1091, 44 P 399 (1896).

46-15-116. Fees, costs, and expenses.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a combination of several subsections of 1987 MCA 46-15-104 and is intended to control the payment or recovery of fees, costs, and expenses related to the use of a subpoena.

Subsection (1) reflects the 1987 code that allowed for the payment of witness fees. A reference to Title 26, ch. 2, part 5, which also governs the payment of witness fees, has been expressly provided. The subsection permits the court to order the payment to an expert witness of a fee greater than that otherwise provided by law. Expert witnesses often will not cooperate for the usual witness fee.

Subsection (2) provides for the reimbursement of reasonable and necessary expenses of subpoenaed witnesses. The provision allows the court to fix the amount of such expenses and order that the expenses be paid.

Subsection (3) combines the two provisions allowing the payment of fees and expenses for witnesses summoned either from or by another state. Compare subsection (3) and 1987 MCA 46-15-112(4) and 46-15-113(3). Rather than state the amount of compensation such a witness is entitled to, the subsection allows travel, meals, and lodging to be compensated at the rate given to state employees. Thus, the statute expressly refers to Title 2, ch. 18, part 5. Outside of the potential increase in witness fees, this provision is not intend to alter established procedure.

Subsection (4) reflects the 1987 MCA 46-15-104(1) provision that addressed the payment of expenses of certain witnesses. The statute allows reimbursement to the county by the state for certain of these expenses. The adoption of this statute should not alter established procedure.

Chapter 330 in (4), at end of third sentence, inserted "unless the county has a district court fund" and inserted last sentence that read: "If the county has a district court fund, the amount reimbursed must be deposited in the district court fund." Amendment effective April 13, 1993.

1991 Amendments: Chapter 704 in (4), near beginning, substituted "required by the supreme court administrator" for "established by the department of commerce" and in first and second sentences substituted "administrator" for "department". Amendment effective July 1, 1991.

Chapter 800 in (1), near beginning, substituted "judge" for "magistrate", after "subpoena" deleted "or in pursuance of an undertaking, the judge, at his discretion, by a written order may direct the clerk of the court to draw his warrant upon the county treasurer in favor of such witness for a reasonable sum, to be specified in the order, for the necessary expenses of", after "witness" inserted "shall receive the witness fee prescribed by Title 26, chapter 2, part 5", and inserted last sentence concerning additional fees for experts; inserted (2) concerning payment of witness expenses; inserted (3) concerning out-of-state witness payments; in (4), near beginning, deleted reference to subsection (1) of 3-5-902 and at end, after "fund", deleted "unless the county has a district court fund. If the county has a district court fund, the amount reimbursed must be deposited in such fund"; and made minor changes in style.

1985 Amendments: Chapter 680 inserted (2) requiring Clerk to submit to Department a list of witnesses and expenses paid them and providing for reimbursement of the county and deposit of the reimbursement.

Chapter 1, Sp. L. 1985, amended Ch. 680, L. 1985, by substituting references to "department of commerce" for references to "supreme court administrator" in three places in (2).

Part 2
Depositions

46-15-201. When depositions may be taken.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Subsection (1) is largely a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-15-201(1) and is relatively restrictive on the availability of depositions in criminal cases, although the statute allows a deposition of anyone who will be leaving the state regardless of his legal residency status. The statute also provides that a witness may be required to produce physical evidence at the time of the deposition. [The Commission's proposal to allow for deposition in felony cases was amended to apply to District or Municipal Court cases to reflect elimination of trial de novo on appeal from Municipal Court.]

Subsection (2) adopts provisions from the federal rules providing for subpoenas for deposition witnesses and allowing for convenient deposition locations. The federal rule has been adopted because the 1987 code did not plainly state this requirement. See 1987 MCA 46-15-201 and 46-15-202 and Rule 17(f)(2), Fed. R. Crim. P.

Subsection (3) incorporates provisions of 1987 MCA 46-11-601, which provided for the arrest of material witnesses. This is in accordance with the constitutional provision allowing for the detention of certain persons. See Art. II, sec. 23, Mont. Const. The Commission felt that the "administration of justice" standard was sufficient by itself and granted the court wide discretion. The right to counsel is not expressly included. The statute allowing the assignment of counsel is sufficiently broad to allow counsel to be appointed if needed. See 46-8-101 and comment.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1802, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-15-202 through 46-15-204 are also derived from section 95-1802.

The purpose of [46-15-201] is to set forth the limited use of depositions in criminal cases. They are only to be used when the state or defendant needs a deposition to avoid the loss of a witness material to the case.

[Section 46-15-203 (now repealed, but see 46-15-202(5) through (7))] is designed to protect the rights of personal confrontation and cross-examination of the witness by defendant. Provision is also made for paying the expense of defendant and his counsel when a deposition is taken at the instance of the state or a witness.

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at beginning of second sentence of (1)(c) and in (2), before "court", deleted "district".

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (1) inserted "In district or municipal court cases, a deposition may be taken"; in (1) (b) substituted "is likely to be absent from the state at the time of the trial or hearing" for "is or may become a nonresident of the state"; in (1)(c), at beginning of second sentence before "court", inserted "district" and after "court" deleted "at any time after the preliminary hearing or the filing of the indictment or the information"; substituted (2) concerning deposition of witness for "If a witness is committed for failure to give bail to appear to testify at a trial or hearing, the court must direct that his deposition be taken at the expense of the state. After the deposition has been subscribed, the court shall discharge the witness"; inserted (3) concerning arrest of material witness for defendant charged with felony; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Video Deposition Properly Admitted in Absence of Material Witness at Trial: Five days before trial the state deposed a material witness and recorded the deposition on video. Hart was present at the deposition and was able to cross-examine the witness. The witness was subpoenaed to appear at trial, but when the witness did not appear, the state moved for admission of the video deposition. The trial court concluded that the state had followed appropriate procedures and admitted the video deposition into evidence. Hart contended on appeal that admitting the video deposition was error because the witness was not unavailable. The state showed that a good faith effort was made to secure the witness's presence, but the witness nevertheless failed to appear. Hart presented no issue that he was unable to address during the deposition, nor did Hart point to any specific prejudice caused by use of the video. Therefore, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the video deposition to be played for the jury. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hart, 2009 MT 268, 352 M 92, 214 P3d 1273 (2009).

Defense Interviews When Accompanied by Court Reporter Held Not to Be Depositions — No Right of Accused to Confront Witnesses in Interviews: After Robert's incarceration awaiting trial on forgery charges, defense counsel arranged to interview prosecution witnesses at the prosecutor's office. When defense counsel arrived, he was accompanied by a court reporter. Counsel told the prosecutor that the interviews were actually "depositions" and requested that Robert be brought from his jail cell, to which the prosecutor refused. The Supreme Court held that the "depositions" were only interviews, regardless of their characterization by defense counsel, because the prerequisites for a deposition provided in this section had not been satisfied, no motion had been made to the court requesting the deposition, and notice had not been given of the time and place of the deposition. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court held that Robert had no constitutional right to be present at the interviews because the right to confront witnesses is a right that applies at trial. St. v. Lane, 279 M 128, 927 P2d 989, 53 St. Rep. 1082 (1996).

Denial of Motion to Depose Main Witness — No Error: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion to depose the prosecution's main witness when it was found that the witness was not immediately available for deposition or trial, motion to continue the trial was granted, defendant was granted an interview with the witness, defendant had access to prosecution files at all times, during trial the witness was subject to defendant's cross-examination, and defendant was given every opportunity to prepare an adequate defense. St. v. Tilly, 227 M 138, 737 P2d 484, 44 St. Rep. 945 (1987).

When Denial of Deposition Not Error: Denial by the trial court of a request by defendant to depose FBI witnesses in Washington, D.C., was not error, where the FBI witnesses would be available for cross-examination at trial and where a continuance was offered by the court to allow defense to meet the testimony of the FBI witnesses. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

When Deposition of Witness Ordered: Defendant contended that the District Court's refusal to order depositions of a rape victim's sister and brother-in-law was reversible error. Defendant contended the depositions were necessary because the witnesses refused to be interviewed by defense counsel unless some member of the County Attorney's office was present. An interview under circumstances directed by the witness would reflect unwillingness only if the attached conditions make it unable for defense counsel to discover needed material. No party other than a witness may dictate conditions of an interview since there was no indication that the condition here was set at the prosecution's suggestion, the District Court was within its discretion in refusing defendant's motion. St. v. Pecora, 190 M 115, 619 P2d 173 (1980).

Proof of Unwillingness of Witness: An affidavit showing that a witness had not answered the defendant's mailed request to contact his attorney to arrange for an interview did not sufficiently establish the witness's unwillingness to provide information so as to require a court-ordered deposition. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Accused's Rights — State Requiring Witness's Statement: The accused's rights were not violated on the theory that a witness was intimidated into giving damaging testimony by the County Attorney's threat of holding the witness unless she gave a statement. Petition of Gallagher, 150 M 476, 436 P2d 530 (1968).

No Time Limitation: There is not any limitation as to the time when depositions in criminal cases may be taken. St. v. Vanella, 40 M 326, 106 P 364 (1910).

Discovery: sanctions against defense in criminal case for failure to comply with discovery requirements. 9 ALR 4th 837.

Accused's right to depose prospective witnesses before trial in state court. 2 ALR 4th 704.

Rap sheets: accused's right to discovery or inspection of "rap sheets" or similar police records about prosecution witnesses. 95 ALR 3d 832.

Interference by prosecution with defense counsel's pretrial interrogation of witnesses. 90 ALR 3d 1231.

Personnel records: accused's right to discovery or inspection of records of prior complaints against, or similar personnel records of, peace officer involved in the case. 86 ALR 3d 1170.

Jurors: right of defense in criminal prosecution to disclosure of prosecution information regarding prospective jurors. 86 ALR 3d 571.

Right of defendant in criminal case to inspection of statement of prosecution's witness for purposes of cross-examination or impeachment. 7 ALR 3d 181.

Right of accused in state courts to inspection or disclosure of evidence in possession of prosecution. 7 ALR 3d 8.

46-15-202. Procedure for taking depositions.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a combination of 1987 MCA 46-15-202 and Rule 15 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. No significant change in deposition practice is foreseen as a result of this statute.

Subsection (2) preserves the essence of 1987 MCA 46-15-202(2) but adopts some language from the federal rules. The federal language recognizes that the defendant cannot be deposed without consent and that cross-examinations during the deposition are limited as they would be during trial. The adoption of these provisions should not significantly alter established procedure.

Subsection (3) retains the requirements of 1987 MCA 46-15-202(3) and adopts some language from the federal rules requiring that nonprivileged statements previously made by the witness be made available at the time of the deposition. The release of such statements is required in the interest of fairness.

Subsection (4) is directly contrary to the federal rule and allows objections to testimony and other evidence produced at the taking of a deposition to be reserved for later determination. See Rule 15(f), Fed. R. Crim. P. The statute retains 1987 MCA 46-15-204(4).

Subsection (5) is based on Rule 15(b) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. See also 46-15-323.

Subsection (6) concerns a defendant who is not in custody. The subsection includes a provision from the federal rules that failure to appear after proper notice is considered a waiver. See Rule 15(b), Fed. R. Crim. P. The adoption of the waiver provision prevents subsequent challenges to the use of a deposition due to complacency or inaction on the part of the defendant.

Subsection (7) uses the language of the federal rule for reasons of clarity. This provision should not alter established procedure.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in third sentence of (1), before "district", inserted "municipal or"; in second sentence of (2), first sentence of (3), near end of (4), and near middle of (7), before "court", deleted "district"; at end of (7) substituted requirement that transcript costs be paid by the city for a Municipal Court proceeding and by the state for a District Court proceeding for payment by the state; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: In (1) and (2), before "court", inserted "district"; in (2), in second sentence after "request", deleted "of a defendant" and inserted last sentence concerning consent of party defendant to deposition; at beginning of (3) substituted "deposition must be filed with the district court making the order" for "court shall transmit the deposition to the clerk of the court making the order, there to be filed" and inserted second sentence concerning availability of nonprivileged statement of witness being deposed; inserted (4) concerning objections; inserted (5) concerning right to be present at deposition; inserted (6) concerning failure to appear at deposition; inserted (7) concerning payment for deposition; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Reimbursement for Costs Incurred in Procuring Witness Testimony: Hardaway sought reimbursement for costs incurred in procuring the testimony of two out-of-state witnesses, one who appeared in person under subpoena and one who was deposed telephonically. The District Court denied reimbursement because Hardaway's counsel was retained rather than court-appointed. However, the only prerequisites that appear in the applicable statutes are that the court has revenue available and that the witness be subpoenaed. The procedural requirements of 46-15-113 for compelling the attendance of an out-of-state witness do not apply to an out-of-state witness who voluntarily appears and acknowledges service of a subpoena. Further, under this section, costs of a telephonic deposition are within the scope of a reimbursable deposition. The statutes do not distinguish between court-appointed and retained attorneys, but rather rely on the indigency of the defendant. Hardaway was declared indigent and remained so throughout the proceedings and, as such, was entitled to reimbursement for witness costs and deposition costs. St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998).

Defense Interviews When Accompanied by Court Reporter Held Not to Be Depositions — No Right of Accused to Confront Witnesses in Interviews: After Robert's incarceration awaiting trial on forgery charges, defense counsel arranged to interview prosecution witnesses at the prosecutor's office. When defense counsel arrived, he was accompanied by a court reporter. Counsel told the prosecutor that the interviews were actually "depositions" and requested that Robert be brought from his jail cell, to which the prosecutor refused. The Supreme Court held that the "depositions" were only interviews, regardless of their characterization by defense counsel, because the prerequisites for a deposition provided in 46-15-201 had not been satisfied, no motion had been made to the court requesting the deposition, and notice had not been given of the time and place of the deposition. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court held that Robert had no constitutional right to be present at the interviews because the right to confront witnesses is a right that applies at trial. St. v. Lane, 279 M 128, 927 P2d 989, 53 St. Rep. 1082 (1996).

46-15-204. Use of depositions at trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute replaces 1987 MCA 46-15-204. The Commission felt that the general statement of this statute would allow sufficient use of a deposition at trial and saw no need to restate evidentiary rules. The statute should not significantly alter established procedure.

1991 Amendment: Substituted present language concerning use of deposition for any purpose allowed by Montana Rules of Evidence for former text that read: "(1) At the trial or upon any hearing, a part or all of a deposition, so far as otherwise admissible under the rules of evidence, may be used if it appears that:

(a) the witness is dead;

(b) the witness is out of the state of Montana unless it appears that the absence of the witness was procured by the party offering the deposition;

(c) the witness is unable to attend or testify because of sickness or infirmity; or

(d) the party offering the deposition has been unable to procure the attendance of the witness by subpoena.

(2) Any deposition may also be used by any party for the purpose of contradicting or impeaching the testimony of the deponent as a witness.

(3) If only a part of a deposition is offered in evidence by a party, an adverse party may require him to offer all of it which is relevant to the part offered and any party may offer other parts.

(4) Objections to receiving in evidence a deposition or part thereof may be made as provided in civil actions.

(5) For the purposes of this section, the word "deposition" shall in addition include any sworn testimony previously given by a witness which has been recorded and transcribed by a qualified stenographer and given in the presence of the defendant and cross-examined by him or his attorney on matters relevant to the trial or hearing where such deposition is sought to be used".

Case Notes

Video Deposition Properly Admitted in Absence of Material Witness at Trial: Five days before trial the state deposed a material witness and recorded the deposition on video. Hart was present at the deposition and was able to cross-examine the witness. The witness was subpoenaed to appear at trial, but when the witness did not appear, the state moved for admission of the video deposition. The trial court concluded that the state had followed appropriate procedures and admitted the video deposition into evidence. Hart contended on appeal that admitting the video deposition was error because the witness was not unavailable. The state showed that a good faith effort was made to secure the witness's presence, but the witness nevertheless failed to appear.

Hart presented no issue that he was unable to address during the deposition, nor did Hart point to any specific prejudice caused by use of the video. Therefore, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the video deposition to be played for the jury. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Hart, 2009 MT 268, 352 M 92, 214 P3d 1273 (2009).

Denial of Motion to Depose Main Witness — No Error: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion to depose the prosecution's main witness when it was found that the witness was not immediately available for deposition or trial, motion to continue the trial was granted, defendant was granted an interview with the witness, defendant had access to prosecution files at all times, during trial the witness was subject to defendant's cross-examination, and defendant was given every opportunity to prepare an adequate defense. St. v. Tilly, 227 M 138, 737 P2d 484, 44 St. Rep. 945 (1987).

Availability of Witness: Allowing the testimony of the purchasers in a drug case to be presented by deposition was error when no subpoena had been issued for the purchasers. St. v. LaCario, 163 M 511, 518 P2d 982 (1974).

Testimony From Preliminary Hearing: The testimony of a witness given at the preliminary hearing in the defendant's presence, when the witness had been cross-examined by the defendant's counsel and the testimony had been recorded and transcribed by a court reporter, was expressly admissible in evidence under this section when a proper foundation had first been laid by showing that the witness could not be located for trial. St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

Discovery — Immunity for Witnesses

Part Case Notes Under Former Law

Sections 46-15-301 through 46-15-303 were repealed by Ch. 202, L. 1985, which replaced the repealed sections with 46-15-321 (now repealed) through 46-15-329. Generally speaking, the new law retains the substance of the repealed law but provides for expanded and expedited discovery. The case notes for the repealed law are retained here as part case notes under former law so that they may be used to the extent they are still relevant.

GENERALLY

Suppression of Material Evidence — Denial of Due Process: Defendant was a suspect in a rape case. He was interviewed by a police officer and told him he was having problems with smoking and the devil. They discussed his mental problems. Defendant was later charged with the crime. A standard omnibus order of discovery was granted. During the trial, the prosecution learned that the police interview was much more extensive than reported. Defense counsel was notified immediately. His motion in limine was denied, and defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that only intentional or deliberate suppression of evidence is a per se violation of due process sufficient to reverse or nullify a conviction. Negligent or passive suppression will overturn a conviction if prejudice is shown. Generally, suppressed evidence must be material to either guilt or punishment. In order to obtain a new trial, the accused must show the materiality of the evidence. The Supreme Court remanded the case for a new trial because the suppressed evidence was indicative of mental illness. The evidence was material and exculpatory, and its suppression was prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Patterson, 203 M 509, 662 P2d 291, 40 St. Rep. 600 (1983). See also St. v. Licht, 266 M 123, 879 P2d 670, 51 St. Rep. 686 (1994).

Suppression Question — Psychological Evaluation — Standard of Review: Where two expert witnesses present conflicting evidence during a suppression hearing as to results of their psychological evaluations of the defendant and the District Court finds one expert's testimony to be more credible than the other's, such determination will be disturbed on appeal only if it is not supported by substantial credible evidence. In re R.P.S., 188 M 317, 613 P2d 999 (1980), following St. v. Grimestad, 183 M 29, 598 P2d 198 (1979).

JUSTIFIABLE USE OF FORCE

Justifiable Use of Force Raised Sua Sponte by Court: At the close of evidence in a misdemeanor assault nonjury trial, the court raised the defense of justifiable use of force sua sponte. Although this section requires that defendant give notice of his intent to rely on such a defense, the trial court also has the authority to raise the defense. The power of the trial court to resolve questions of law necessarily includes the power to determine what the questions of law are. St. v. Nicholls, 200 M 144, 649 P2d 1346, 39 St. Rep. 1635 (1982).

NOTICE OF WITNESSES

No Error in Refusal to Allow Two Impeachment Witnesses After Start of Trial — Failure to Object at Trial Precluding Raising Issue on Appeal: After commencement of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide, LaDue moved to add two additional witnesses, asserting that they would verify that two other witnesses were essentially coordinating their testimony to LaDue's disadvantage and that the other witnesses' testimony at trial differed substantially from their earlier statements to police. The motion was denied. LaDue was convicted on a lesser charge and appealed. After examining the record, the Supreme Court concluded that the testimony of the two additional witnesses was not probative and that the independent statements to police shortly after the incident were not notably inconsistent with the oral testimony at trial. Further, LaDue did not suggest a motive for the other witnesses to fix their testimony to his disadvantage, and no such nefarious intent could be gleaned from the record. LaDue failed to establish good cause for adding two new witnesses after the trial commenced, and the District Court did not err in refusing their testimony. The court properly inquired as to the nature of the testimony to be offered by the proposed witnesses and the circumstances surrounding the matter in controversy. Thus, the court had sufficient information to rule, and the ruling was not in error. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Witness Added During Trial — Inability to Voir Dire Insufficient to Warrant New Trial: Amendments adding to the witness list after trial has started necessarily deprive the opposing party of the opportunity to voir dire prospective jurors with a particular class of witnesses in mind. However, the denial of this opportunity was not so material as to give rise to a claim for a new trial nor did it demonstrate abuse of trial court discretion for allowing witnesses from the particular class to testify. St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Jurisdiction of District Court to Add Witness to List While Appeal Pending Moot Because of Later Reviews by District Court: An appeal was pending before the Supreme Court at the time the District Court granted the state's motion to add a name to the witness list. Any question of the District Court's jurisdiction to add the name became moot because the District Court twice again reviewed the issue of the witness testifying after the Supreme Court ruled on the appeal. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

State Adding Expert Witness to Witness List Shortly Before Trial — Harmless Error: In determining whether the state had good cause to add an expert soil-testing witness to the witness list as required under 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), the Supreme Court examined: (1) the state's lack of knowledge of the witness until just prior to the time of the trial; (2) the delay in having the witness testify to allow the defense to procure a similar witness; and (3) the state's attempts to locate a similar witness for the defense. Any error in relation to the witness' testimony was harmless considering the testimony of the witness and the fact that the District Court granted a defense motion to strike his testimony when it was determined that a defense witness could not be made available and gave a cautionary instruction relating to the stricken testimony. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Withholding of Informants' Names — Harmless Error: Defendant moved for a continuance when, with a trial date set for August 2, the informants' names were not revealed to defendant's attorney until late July 30 and the County Attorney knew defendant's attorney would be out of town on August 1. The District Court denied defendant's motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court held that although the Sheriff and police acted improperly in refusing to comply with the District Court's order to disclose the informants' names, this was harmless error in this case and was not grounds for a continuance. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the continuance because the informants could provide nothing that would refute the state's case. The Supreme Court stated that it did not condone the actions of the law enforcement agencies or the County Attorney. St. v. Warnick, 216 M 102, 699 P2d 1049, 42 St. Rep. 675 (1985).

Notice of Witness to Other Acts or Wrongs — Sex Assault Witness in Sex Assault Case — New Trial: If the prosecution intends to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts it must notify the defendant of that intent and identify the purpose for which the evidence will be introduced. In this sexual assault case, it was reversible error requiring a new trial when the State did not give such notice, and the witness testified that defendant had previously kissed her despite her resistance. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985).

Nondisclosure of Rebuttal Witness — Error: Defendant, a Vietnam veteran, had several disturbing experiences during the war. He had psychological problems upon his return. While working at St. Patrick Hospital in Missoula, he developed animosity towards his supervisor. He felt he had to kill his supervisor before the supervisor killed him. He armed himself and went to the supervisor's home, where he entered and began shooting. In an ensuing struggle, a knife was also used and both men were injured. Defendant was charged with attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated assault. Defendant gave notice he intended to rely on a mental disease or defect to prove he did not have the particular state of mind that is an essential element of the offense charged. The night before the final day of trial, the County Attorney's office found a bar owner who would testify that a couple of days before the shooting he purchased the ammunition used by defendant. Since defendant had twice requested this purchase, it tended to rebut his claim that he did not act knowingly or purposely. On cross-examination, defense counsel found that the witness had contacted the prosecution the day before and moved for a mistrial. The trial court found there was no designed surprise and denied the motion. Defense counsel refused an offered continuance and chose not to examine the witness further. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that failure to give the court and defendant notice of the new rebuttal witness constituted clear error. The court found the error harmless in this case but admonished prosecutors for the future. St. v. Korell, 213 M 316, 690 P2d 992, 41 St. Rep. 2141 (1984).

Witness Added Five Days Before Trial — Three More Witnesses Added Morning of Trial — Not Error to Deny Continuance — Subject of Testimony Considered: It was not error for the District Court to deny a motion for continuance to a criminal defendant when the State added an extra witness 5 days before trial and then added three more witnesses on the morning of trial. The witness added 5 days before trial, an expert, was available for interviewing by the defense during those 5 days, and her testimony was basically corroborated by the defendant. The other three witnesses, local medical employees, testified (per stipulation) on chain of custody of the evidence and (not per stipulation, but de minimis) on preparation and shipping procedures of the evidence. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Failure to Reveal Alibi — Undisclosed Witnesses Allowed: Defendant was convicted of robbery and felony theft. On appeal, he contended that he was denied due process when the State was allowed to use rebuttal witnesses on the last day of trial without giving notice of the witnesses as required by statute. The State contended that because defendant refused to inform the State of the nature of his alibi, the State did not know prior to trial if the information possessed by the rebuttal witnesses was relevant. The District Court allowed defense counsel to talk to the witnesses. No motion for a continuance was made. The statute allows the District Court to permit additions to the witness list for good cause. Defendant's failure to reveal the substance of his alibi was sufficient cause. St. v. Madera, 206 M 140, 670 P2d 552, 40 St. Rep. 1558 (1983).

No Formal Notice Given — State Knowledge That Witnesses Were to Be Called: After a jury trial, defendant was convicted of assault. In his opening statement, defendant's attorney had said he would call two witnesses who would testify that defendant had acted in self-defense. The State did not object to this assertion. In cross-examining the victim, defendant's attorney laid the foundation for the impeachment testimony to come from the two witnesses alluded to in the opening statement. The State did not object to this line of questioning. However, after resting its case, the State filed a motion in limine requesting that the defense not be permitted to present the testimony of the two witnesses because of the defendant's failure to comply with the notice provisions of this section. The District Court granted the State's motion. Later, in the State's rebuttal in closing argument, the State mentioned defendant's failure to produce the witnesses he had promised during the opening statement. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and ordered a new trial. The court ruled that reversal was required by the State's unethical argument to the jury. The Supreme Court further ruled that although no formal written notice within the time limits required under this section had been given, the trial court abused its discretion in not permitting the defense witnesses to testify because the State knew the defendant intended to rely on self-defense and the State's motion in limine was filed too late under local court rules. Finally, the court ruled that the State by its failure to object earlier had waived its right to file the motion in limine. St. v. Keller, 204 M 1, 662 P2d 604, 40 St. Rep. 614 (1983).

No Formal Notice — Good Cause: In a trial for assault, the defendant's attorney stated in his opening statement to the jury that he intended to produce two witnesses who would impeach the victim's testimony. The two had not witnessed the assault but claimed that the victim had told them how the fight had started and who was the first aggressor. Later in the trial, the State's motion to exclude the testimony for failure to comply with the notice provisions of this section was granted. The Supreme Court reversed on this and other grounds and ruled that the District Court should have determined whether the notice requirement could have been dispensed with under the good cause exception. The ruling was based on the fact that there was a factual dispute on the extent of the State's knowledge of defendant's intent to call the two witnesses and because the defendant had provided legal authority to the District Court to the effect that a nonincident impeachment witness, one who is called only to impeach a witness on the ground of a prior inconsistent statement, does not fall within the ambit of such a notice statute. St. v. Keller, 204 M 1, 662 P2d 604, 40 St. Rep. 614 (1983).

Addition of Witnesses to List — Surprise: Montana law provides for the prosecution to furnish to the defendant the names of witnesses it proposes to call. Additions may be made after arraignment. The proper procedure when surprise is claimed from the addition of new prosecution witnesses is to ask for a continuance so that the defendant may prepare. For several reasons, prejudice did not result from the addition of 58 new witnesses on the day of trial. The defendant objected to the addition of witnesses but never requested a continuance. Further, the prosecution was cautioned that the defendant's counsel must be given the opportunity to talk with and examine the new witnesses. Finally, defendant knew of the proposed testimony from either their reports filed earlier or from the court's examination of the County Attorney about the reason for the new witnesses and the nature of their testimony in the presence of the defendant's attorney. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980). [See the subsection (3) 5-day rebuttal witness rule, enacted after decision in this case.]

Rebutting Versus Giving New Evidence: Defendant, as his own sole witness, testified he knew nothing of the planned robbery of a gas station and did not ask a coconspirator to contact friends who worked there. On rebuttal, the coconspirator testified that defendant was aware of the robbery and had asked the coconspirator to telephone the station. Such testimony tended to disprove defendant's testimony and thus was proper rebuttal testimony and not new evidence requiring compliance with this section's notice provisions. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224 (1979).

Witness List Amended on First Day of Trial — Continuance Denied: The trial court properly denied a defense motion for a continuance after permitting the State to amend its witness list on the morning of trial since the State informed the defendant's counsel of a change in the information within hours after the new witness negotiated a plea involving an agreement to testify. The defense counsel knew of the development on Friday but chose to keep other commitments, thus he was estopped from claiming surprise. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20 (1978).

Witness List Amended on First Day of Trial — No Continuance Requested:

The defendant was not prejudiced when, on the first day of the trial, the District Court endorsed two more witnesses for the prosecution because the defendant's counsel and the County Attorney had already discussed the endorsement, the two names were set out in the information as victims, the County Attorney showed good cause for failing to list the names specifically as witnesses prior to the trial, and the defendant's counsel could have asked for a postponement or a continuance. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

The lower court did not err in allowing the addition of the names of 58 new witnesses to the amended information on the day of trial when the defendant failed to ask for a continuance, the witnesses were not prejudicial to the defendant, and the court was careful to provide the defendant with protection against surprise and to ensure that the defendant was able to prepare for the testimony. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Failure of State to List Witnesses Upon Request: When the State failed to list witnesses on an information and continually failed to provide a list of witnesses even after a request by the defendant to do so and a promise by the Deputy County Attorney to the court that he would do so, the State did not make a sufficient showing of "good cause" to add witnesses on the day of trial. Therefore, the defendant had no burden to move for a continuance of the trial date. St. v. Haag, 176 M 395, 578 P2d 740 (1978), distinguished in St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Good Cause to List Additional Witnesses: When the State moved, 6 days before trial, to list additional witnesses, alleging they were discovered after the original information was filed and were necessary to prove its case in light of the defendant's affirmative defense of mental disease or defect, good cause was shown and the motion should have been granted. State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 173 M 221, 566 P2d 1382 (1977).

Addition of Expert Witness in Midtrial: The court did not err in permitting the endorsement of an x-ray by a radiologist as a witness added in midtrial by the prosecution when the defense counsel knew of the existence of the x-ray prior to trial and nothing indicated an intentional or deliberate withholding of evidence by the State or lack of good cause. St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Amendment of Witness List — Remedy When Surprise Claimed: The proper procedure when surprise is claimed from the addition of witnesses is to ask for a continuance so that the defendant may prepare. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Effect of State's Noncompliance With Court Order: Reversal was required when the prosecution withheld evidence and notice of witnesses in violation of orders of the court. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Amendment of Witness List During Trial: Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976). See also St. v. Forsyth, 233 M 389, 761 P2d 363, 45 St. Rep. 1577 (1988).

Amendment of Witness List — Victim: Allowing the amendment of the witness list to include the victim of the crime was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge. St. v. Campbell, 160 M 111, 500 P2d 801 (1972).

Adding Witnesses — Harmless Error: The defendant was not prejudiced by the prosecution's citation, when adding witnesses, of section 94-8904, R.C.M. 1947, which had been repealed and replaced by 46-15-301, MCA (and which, in 1985, was itself repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), since that section is a continuation of section 94-8904, R.C.M. 1947. St. v. Rozzell, 157 M 443, 486 P2d 877 (1971).

Failure to List Witness Excused: In the absence of surprise, testimony concerning the defendant's oral admission of guilt was properly admitted even though the State had not supplied the names of witnesses to the admission. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

NOTICE OF DEFENSE — ALIBI

Reasonably Specific Date in Information — Double Jeopardy Protected: Information charging incest indicated a 10-month period during which the crime was committed. The court found the information sufficiently specific since victim resided with defendant father during entire period and defendant could not establish deprivation of alibi defense. The court applied the test set forth in St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), and held that the two-part test was satisfied. Defendant contended that the broad time frame alleged in the information subjected him to double jeopardy. The court rejected the argument, noting that the State is barred by Art. II, sec. 25, Mont. Const., from retrying defendant for the offense to this particular victim during the time in question. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Definition of "Alibi": An alibi is a defense that places defendant at the relevant time in a different place than the scene of the crime and so removed therefrom as to render it impossible for the defendant to be the guilty party. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985).

Irrelevant Alibi — No Time Correlation: The defense did not, as required by 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), give the prosecution pretrial notice of the identity of and intent to call an alibi witness. The judge therefore struck the witness' testimony. Defendant claimed error on appeal. The witness was not an alibi witness, because he testified he was with defendant from about 7:30 to 8:10, and both defendant and the victim testified defendant arrived at the scene of the crime at about 8:10. It was within the court's discretion to strike the testimony, because it was not relevant. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985).

Frivolous Alibi Defense Denied — Harmless Error: Defendant was convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent. On appeal, defendant contended that he should have been allowed to assert an alibi defense within 10 days after entering his not guilty plea to an amended information. Defendant was charged on August 24, 1981, and was arraigned on an amended information on December 18, 1981, at which time he entered a not guilty plea and moved to assert his alibi defense. Defendant was specifically reminded of his right to assert the defense at his August arraignment and was again asked if he intended to use the defense in November. Defendant contended that he had good cause for not asserting the defense earlier in that he was unable to locate his mother or his friend. The court found that this was not good cause but held that the amended information was a new document requiring a separate arraignment, giving defendant a statutory right to assert the defense within 10 days of the later arraignment. The court found, however, that in this case the purported defense was frivolous as a matter of law and that the error was therefore harmless. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983).

No Notice of Alibi Defense — Testimony Restricted: The trial court did not err in granting the prosecution's motion in limine to restrict the testimony of the defendant's mother as to the whereabouts of the defendant during the time of the robbery since notice of an alibi defense was not given as required by this section. St. v. Johnson, 179 M 61, 585 P2d 1328 (1978).

Alibi Defense — Instruction Rejected: The court properly rejected an instruction concerning the defense of alibi since the defendant's case was not founded upon alibi and no notice of such a defense was given. St. v. McGuinn, 177 M 215, 581 P2d 417 (1978).

Notice of Alibi — Restricting State's Case: A defendant cannot restrict the State's case by asserting an intent to rely on an alibi defense for a limited period of time within which the crime could have occurred. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

Amendment of Information After Notice of Alibi: A motion to amend the date on the information, made after the defendant pleaded not guilty and entered a notice of alibi defense, was properly denied, since it would destroy the defense and be a substantial prejudice to the rights of the defendant. St. v. Tropf, 166 M 79, 530 P2d 1158 (1975).

NOTICE OF DEFENSE — MENTAL DISEASE OR DEFECT

Defense Based on Long-Term Effects of Alcoholism: Under former law, when the defense of intoxication shifts to a defense based on expert testimony as to the long-term effects of alcoholism, it becomes a defense of mental disease or defect within the purview of the statutes requiring notice. St. v. Ostwald, 180 M 530, 591 P2d 646 (1979).

Failure to File Notice of Defense — Effect on Voir Dire: The defendant refused to give notice as required by the statute. He claimed prejudice because he was not allowed to voir dire on the subject of mental disease and defect. However, at the time he wished to voir dire he had not complied with the notice and the issue could not at that time be presented to the jury. The court was correct in refusing to allow the voir dire. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Defenses of Insanity and Self-Defense:

There was no reversible error in making the defendant comply with the insanity and self-defense notice provisions of this section when the state court had already decided that the section required reciprocal duties of the prosecution, the State operated in good faith at the trial, and the facts otherwise revealed no prejudice to the defendant. Radford v. Stewart, 472 F2d 1161 (9th Cir. 1973).

This section, as it related to the defenses of insanity and self-defense, should be interpreted as directory only. State ex rel. Sikora v. District Court, 154 M 241, 462 P2d 897 (1969).

Failure to File Notice of Defense: Under former law, the trial judge could allow psychiatric proof even though the motion was untimely but, when the defendant's counsel did not comply with a court order to submit all motions of defense at the time of pleading to the information or during the 6-month delay in going to trial, the trial court properly denied the defendant's notice of intention to rely on mental disease or defect as not being timely filed. St. v. Bentley, 155 M 383, 472 P2d 864 (1970).

CONSTITUTIONALITY

Effective Assistance of Counsel — Failure to Challenge Constitutionality of Statute: Failure of defense counsel to object to testimony of a rebuttal witness on the grounds that he had not received notice of the witness's testimony, based on a United States Supreme Court decision holding that an Oregon statute which required a defendant utilizing an alibi defense to furnish notice and a witness list violated due process because it did not provide reciprocal discovery for the defendant of the State's rebuttal witnesses, does not fall outside the range of competent counsel. The decision to challenge the constitutionality of a statute is a matter of legal judgment. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980). [The year after this case was decided, this section was amended to require the State to give notice of witnesses rebutting certain defenses.]

Mental Defect Provisions: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that the Montana provision for notice of mental defect or disease and the mental defect or disease provisions in 46-14-101 through 46-14-401 (46-14-401 was renumbered 46-14-217) and 46-15-301 are unconstitutional. (In 1985, 46-15-301 was repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329.) St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments:
Under former law, the defendant's rights under the 5th, 6th, and 14th amendments of the United States Constitution were not violated by the operation of 46-15-301 because neither the defendant's witness list nor his notice of insanity and self-defense was used to make a prima facie case against him. (In 1985, 46-15-301 was repealed and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329.) Radford v. Stewart, 320 F. Supp. 826 (D.C. Mont. 1970), affirmed in 472 F2d 1161 (9th Cir. 1973).

While this section may be unconstitutionally applied, it is constitutional on its face and not repugnant to the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 14th amendments of the United States Constitution. State ex rel. Sikora v. District Court, 154 M 241, 462 P2d 897 (1969), followed in St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

DISCOVERY OF WRITINGS AND OBJECTS

Destruction of Potentially Exculpatory Evidence — Reversal Not Required: Defendant contended that potentially exculpatory evidence from a fire site was destroyed negligently by state fire experts and that the condition of the fire scene prevented his expert from examining the evidence, thereby robbing defendant of his right to present a complete defense. The Supreme Court found that defendant was not entitled to a reversal due to suppression of evidence because: (1) the deputy fire marshal carefully preserved any burned material with evidentiary value while removing nonevidentiary material from the site; (2) a front-end loader used to clean up the scene removed only irrelevant and nonexculpatory debris and never disrupted evidentiary material; (3) all evidentiary material was available at all times for inspection by defendant's expert; and (4) defendant presented no factual basis that the debris was exculpatory or was vital to his defense. St. v. Atlas, 224 M 92, 728 P2d 421, 43 St. Rep. 2042 (1986).

Newly Discovered Evidence — Material Cumulative — Different Result at New Trial Not Probable: An "intelligence" file relating to problems involving the deceased was kept by the Sheriff's office. For the homicide trial, defense demanded all materials held by the Sheriff's office concerning the case, but through apparent inadvertence, the file was not turned over to the defense. It was not discovered until 5 months after the trial during a search of the Sheriff's files by defense counsel and an assistant County Attorney. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a new trial after it had determined: that the file was not deliberately suppressed; that the material in the file was testified to at the trial and the material would have been cumulative; and that the material was not germane to the defendant's defense of use of justifiable force. The Supreme Court held that under the rules set forth in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), a new trial was not necessary because the file was not so material that it would probably produce a different result upon another trial. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Late Notice of Evidence to Be Used — Waiver of Continuance: The night before trial the prosecutor phoned the defense and gave notice that he would use a piece of evidence of a prior criminal act. Judicially mandated notice was served the next morning. The judge granted a 2 ½-day continuance to the defense. Defense counsel waived his right to additional time when he told the judge after the continuance that he had had enough time to investigate the evidence and did not need time beyond the 2 ½ days. St. v. Azure, 208 M 233, 676 P2d 785, 41 St. Rep. 302 (1984).

Police Officer's Handwritten Notes — Not Discoverable — No Good Cause Shown: The defendant attempted to discover the contents of a police officer's handwritten notes of interviews with defendant's witnesses. This section requires a good cause showing before discovery of the handwritten notes is allowed. Defendant did not make the good cause showing. He had continued access to the witnesses and could have discovered the contents of the notes by asking the witnesses what they said to the police officer. Even if the witnesses were hostile, defendant could have discovered the contents of the interviews by other discovery methods such as depositions. St. v. Willis, 207 M 170, 673 P2d 134, 40 St. Rep. 1969 (1983).

Right of Criminal Defendant to Juvenile Record of Victim or Witness: A defendant in a criminal case has the right to obtain only that part of the juvenile record of a victim or witness that relates to charges, adjudications, and status following an adjudication. He does not have the right to obtain the rest of the record containing sensitive or private information, case reports, interviews, and other material. Camitsch v. Risley, 705 F2d 351 (9th Cir. 1983).

Refusal to Review Police Reports for Discoverability — Issue Not Appealable — Not Raised in District Court: The trial court did not err in refusing to review police reports to determine if the reports contained exculpatory material and were discoverable since the record does not indicate that the defendant focused on the police reports or made any written motion for the court to review the reports. For this reason, the issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. The matter cannot be used to put the trial court in error if it was not brought specifically to the court's attention. St. v. Hansen, 194 M 197, 633 P2d 1202, 38 St. Rep. 1541 (1981).

Omnibus Hearing — Admission of After-Acquired Reports: The District Court did not err in failing to suppress two lab reports that were not contained in the omnibus hearing order. The State had not withheld the information; rather, it had only received the reports the day before the trial. The defendant bypassed his opportunity to have the trial continued. The District Court, after denying the motion to suppress, gave the defendant an overnight continuance to prepare further. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980), followed in St. v. Ayers, 2003 MT 114, 315 M 395, 68 P3d 768 (2003).

Discovery of "Rap Sheet" Disallowed — Witness' Bias a Jury Question: The defendant, convicted of theft in the holdup of a truckstop, contended that the trial court had erred in refusing to allow discovery of the "rap sheet" of a suspected accomplice. Defendant argued on appeal that he was denied due process. The reviewing court disagreed saying that (unlike the defendant in the case this defendant relied upon, who was unable to make a record from which to argue the witness' bias or lack of impartiality because the witness' criminal record could not be presented to the jury) this defendant was permitted to present fully evidence of the criminal character and bias of the suspected accomplice. The jury was aware of the immunity bargain between the witness and the prosecution and of the witness' complicity in the truckstop theft. The trial court's denial of the defendant's motion was well within its discretion to control cross-examination. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Timeliness of Discovery — Statements of Witnesses: In light of the discovery provisions in 46-15-302 and 46-15-303 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), the Revised Commission Comments indicating the showing necessary to get access to material in the hands of the prosecutor, and the recognition that in most criminal cases in Montana discovery is conducted on a more informal basis without resort to motion and hearing procedures, the Supreme Court found that the defendant's allegation that the State failed to timely furnish him with the statements of its witnesses was without merit. Any delay was waived by the defendant's failure to file a demand and motion for the material until after trial had begun. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978). See also St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Denial of Discovery: A motion to discover papers went unruled upon, and no objection was made. Therefore, the substantial rights of the defendant were not violated, and a conviction will not be overturned due to harmless error. St. v. Armstrong, 172 M 296, 562 P2d 1129 (1977).

Subpoena of Materials in Prosecutor's Custody: The showing necessary to gain access to material in the hands of the prosecutor is greater than is required to obtain material in the hands of third parties. No error was involved because of a 1-week delay in compliance with a demand made by the defendant after the trial had begun. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Effect of State's Noncompliance With Court Order: Reversal was required when the prosecution withheld evidence and notice of witnesses in violation of orders of the court. St. v. Keller, 170 M 372, 553 P2d 1013 (1976).

Amendment of Witness List When Accused Did Not Claim Surprise or Accept Offer of a Continuance: Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976).

Failure of State to Produce Evidence: When it appeared that the State's failure to produce certain items of physical evidence pursuant to an order to do so was due to the negligent loss, misplacement, or destruction of the items, the District Court correctly refused to grant the defendant's motion to dismiss since he could not show that the failure to produce affected the outcome of the case. St. v. Craig, 169 M 150, 545 P2d 649 (1976).

MOTION TO PRODUCE CONFESSION OR ADMISSION

Failure to Produce Statements — Must Be Prejudicial: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. On appeal he challenged the introduction of several statements not included within the "Notice of Confessions and/or Admissions" filed by the State in response to his motion. The Supreme Court found that the statements should not have been admitted but that the District Court allowed defense counsel the opportunity to interview all possible witnesses to the statements before allowing them and issued an admonishing instruction on one of the statements. The purpose of the production of confessions and admissions statute is to allow the defendant to prepare a defense to the statements. While the substance of the statements may have been detrimental to defendant, he did not demonstrate any prejudice arising from the failure to provide notice of the statements as distinguished from the introduction of the statements. Allowing the examination of witnesses and giving the admonishing instruction removed any prejudice from the introduction of the statements. St. v. Weinberger, 204 M 278, 665 P2d 202, 40 St. Rep. 844 (1983).

Surprise at Retrial: The defendant objected to the testimony of a witness based on surprise. On appeal the case was remanded on other grounds, and the Supreme Court said the defendant will suffer no prejudice because of surprise at retrial. St. v. Blackbird, 187 M 270, 609 P2d 708 (1980).

Timeliness of Discovery: In light of the discovery provisions in 46-15-302 and 46-15-303 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329), the Revised Commission Comments indicating the showing necessary to get access to material in the hands of the prosecutor, and the recognition that in most criminal cases in Montana discovery is conducted on a more informal basis without resort to motion and hearing procedures, the Supreme Court found that the defendant's allegation that the State failed to timely furnish him with the statements of its witnesses was without merit. Any delay was waived by the defendant's failure to file a demand and motion for the material until after trial had begun. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Surprise Testimony Discounted: The Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that trial testimony constituted surprise and should have been excluded when a witness testifying as to admissions made by the defendant quoted certain profane and vulgar language not previously mentioned in a statement provided to the defendant by the prosecution. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Failure to List Witness Excused: In the absence of surprise, testimony concerning the defendant's oral admission of guilt was properly admitted even though the State had not supplied the names of witnesses to the admission. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

46-15-322. Disclosure by prosecution.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the 1987 code procedure that required certain disclosures by the prosecution. See 1987 MCA 46-15-322.

The statute substitutes the phrase "Upon request" for the former language. Subject to limitations of other statutes, this amendment permits discovery at any time during the proceedings. The requirement that the prosecution develop an inventory list of the information available has been eliminated. The Commission determined that the listing requirement was a burden on the prosecution and felt that permitting direct disclosure was sufficient.

Subsection (1)(a) continues the requirement for the disclosure of witness statements. Subsection (1)(b) preserves the requirement that the prosecution disclose statements made by the defendant. The required disclosure of expert witness reports or statements, as well as actual test results, is retained in subsection (1)(c). Subsection (1)(d) reflects the requirement that certain tangible evidence be made available to the defense. The mandatory disclosure of any exculpatory evidence uncovered by the prosecution is retained by subsection (1)(e).

Subsection (3) allows that certain restrictions or stipulations may be imposed to protect physical evidence disclosed under this statute. See 1987 MCA 46-15-322(3).

Subsection (5) preserves 1987 MCA 46-15-322(5) by permitting the disclosure of things not otherwise attainable in a normal investigation. Under the 1987 code, the disclosure of summaries of witness statements may have been tolerated. The subsection amends the code to expressly state that the preparation and existence of summaries of witness statements need not be disclosed.

Subsection (6) requires the prosecution to disclose the existence of rebuttal witnesses who may be called to refute any affirmative defense raised by the prosecution. Unless the affirmative defense is properly raised, the prosecution is not obligated to disclose rebuttal witnesses. See St. v. Sage, 221 Mont. 192 (1986).

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 at end of (2)(c) inserted "and 46-15-324(3)"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Throughout section substituted references to defendant for references to accused; in (1), at beginning, inserted "request" and deleted "arraignment in district court or at such later time as the court may for good cause permit"; at beginning of (1)(c) deleted "the names and addresses"; at beginning of (1)(d) deleted "a list or copies of"; at end of (1)(e) substituted "the defendant's potential sentence" for "his punishment therefore"; in (2), before "control", deleted "possession or"; in (2)(b) substituted "an investigative subpoena" for "a search warrant"; at end of (2)(c) deleted "and 46-15-324(3)"; in (3) deleted former first sentence that read: "The prosecutor, upon written request, shall make available to the defendant for examination, testing, and reproduction any specified items contained in the list submitted under subsection (1)(d)" and at end substituted "subsection (1)(d)" for "this section"; in (5) inserted last sentence concerning preparation or disclosure of summaries of witness testimony; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Permitting State to Offer Expert Testimony Rebutting Matters Raised by Defense for First Time at Trial — No Error in Failure to Disclose Nonexistent Written Report: During Jackson's homicide trial, Jackson presented unexpected expert testimony regarding the manner that wounds were received by a victim of the shooting. The state then called its forensic medical examiner as a rebuttal witness. Although the rebuttal witness was listed prior to trial, Jackson contended that the state erroneously failed to disclose the witness's report. The Supreme Court concluded that Jackson failed to establish a violation of the state's disclosure requirements because the rebuttal witness did not offer an opinion until Jackson's expert opined regarding the bullet's path for the first time at trial and because disclosure is required of only written reports or statements, and there was no report made by the rebuttal witness that could be disclosed. St. v. Jackson, 2009 MT 427, 354 M 63, 221 P3d 1213 (2009).

State's Alleged Failure to Reveal Exculpatory Evidence Unfounded — New Trial Not Warranted: Jackson asserted that a new trial was warranted because the state committed a Brady violation by failing to disclose exculpatory statements made to a professional counselor by a deputy who was wounded during an altercation with Jackson in which another deputy was killed, in which the wounded deputy stated that he felt responsible for the other officer's death. The District Court denied Jackson's motion for a new trial, and on appeal the Supreme Court found no reversible error. The state disclosed the name of the counselor well before trial, identifying the counselor as a person with whom the deputy had discussed the shooting, and the jury heard evidence from other witnesses that the deputy felt guilty about the incident. Thus, the record did not support Jackson's claim that exculpatory evidence was withheld, and denial of Jackson's motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Jackson, 2009 MT 427, 354 M 63, 221 P3d 1213 (2009).

Failure of State to Disclose Findings of Forensics Expert in Homicide Trial — Harmless Error: Morrisey retained a forensics expert to testify during Morrisey's homicide trial. The state had a forensics expert as well, and Morrisey moved for disclosure of the state's expert's findings. The state declined to disclose the findings on grounds that its expert would not be called as a witness during the state's case-in-chief, but only to rebut Morrisey's expert. The trial court denied Morrisey's discovery motion. Following trial, Morrisey appealed on grounds that the state violated 46-15-322 by failing to disclose its expert's conclusions. The Supreme Court agreed that under 46-15-322(1)(c), the prosecution was required to disclose the written report of the state's expert who examined the evidence, regardless of whether the expert was a witness in the state's case-in-chief, and noted that by refusing the disclosure request, the prosecution bound itself not to call the expert as a witness. When the state subsequently called its expert to give an opinion on the evidence, that testimony was objectionable. However, Morrisey had the opportunity to cross-examine the state's expert at length, so any error in allowing the expert's testimony was not prejudicial and was considered harmless. The trial court was affirmed. St. v. Morrisey, 2009 MT 201, 351 M 144, 214 P3d 708 (2009).

No Notice to Defendant of Testimony of Officer Who Ordered DUI Blood Test — Denial of Motion to Suppress DUI Blood Test Affirmed: Grela was taken to the hospital following a vehicle accident. The officer at the scene noticed several empty and full beer cans and a half-full bottle of whiskey in and around the vehicle. Grela was unconscious, but the officer requested a DUI blood test, and Grela was subsequently charged in Municipal Court with DUI. Grela asserted that the test results should be suppressed because he did not consent to withdrawal of the blood and because the state should have provided notice that the officer would be called as an expert witness. The suppression motion was denied and Grela appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Based on the best evidence available to the officers at the accident scene and at the hospital, the officer's belief that Grela was incapable of refusing the blood test was reasonable, so the blood was legally drawn and the test results were admissible. Additionally, Grela was given a copy of the officer's accident report as requested, so Grela had notice that the officer would testify as to the reasons underlying the officer's belief that Grela was incapable of refusing the blood test, and it was not necessary that the officer be disclosed as an expert. Billings v. Grela, 2009 MT 172, 350 M 511, 209 P3d 222 (2009).

Dismissal for Loss of Exculpatory Taped Evidence Not Warranted When Witness Available to Testify in Person: The prosecution lost a videotape of a witness's interview with the sheriff on the night of a stabbing for which Herman was accused. Herman moved to dismiss the case for loss of the tape, which Herman asserted contained exculpatory evidence. The District Court denied the motion and Herman appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Nothing indicated that the state had deliberately or intentionally destroyed the evidence, which would have constituted a per se due process violation, but rather the state appeared to have lost the evidence because of negligence or lack of due diligence, which required Herman to show that the evidence was material, of substantial use, and exculpatory in order to have the case dismissed. Here, even though the tape was destroyed, the witness was available and testified in person regarding the same exculpatory matters contained on the tape. Therefore, Herman's due process rights were not violated because comparable evidence was available. St. v. Herman, 2009 MT 101, 350 M 109, 204 P3d 1254 (2009). See also St. v. Halter, 238 M 408, 777 P2d 1313 (1989).

Defendant's Possession of Detective's Summary Notes From Witness Interviews — Claim of Suppression of Exculpatory Evidence Denied: A detective repeatedly interviewed a witness in Giddings' homicide trial but did not keep the original notes or recordings from the interviews; instead, the detective destroyed the notes after summarizing the interviews, although Giddings was provided with a copy of the summaries. Giddings asserted that the destruction of the original interview materials amounted to the destruction of possible exculpatory evidence in violation of Giddings' right to due process. The Supreme Court disagreed. In order to show that a suppression of material evidence constitutes a due process violation, a defendant must meet the criteria of Brady v. Maryland, 373 US 83 (1963), which includes a showing that: (1) the state possessed evidence, including impeachment evidence, favorable to the defense; (2) defendant did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence; (3) the prosecution suppressed the evidence; and (4) there was a reasonable probability that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different had the evidence been disclosed. Giddings failed to show a Brady violation. Giddings could not show that the destroyed interview notes had or did not have exculpatory value. Giddings had the opportunity to obtain similar evidence by interviewing the detective and the witness and failed to show that the trial outcome would have been different had he possessed the original materials rather than the summaries. Giddings' motion to dismiss on grounds of destruction of exculpatory evidence was properly dismissed. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009), following St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005), and distinguishing St. v. Swanson, 222 M 357, 722 P2d 1155 (1986).

No Showing That Allegedly Withheld State Evidence Constituted Brady Violation — Due Process Not Violated: Giddings moved that the state's case should be dismissed because the state withheld evidence in a homicide trial, which prohibited defense counsel from having sufficient time to analyze scientific evidence to find exculpatory evidence and from having the necessary information to effectively impeach the state witnesses, resulting in a due process violation. The District Court denied the motion, and Giddings appealed. The Supreme Court held that Giddings failed to meet the criteria for showing an improper withholding of information under Brady v. Maryland, 373 US 83 (1963), by failing to prove that any of the information was exculpatory or to demonstrate a reasonable possibility that the evidence would have changed the outcome. Instead, Giddings offered only sweeping generalizations and broad accusations rather than the specific elements necessary to prove a Brady violation. Giddings also failed to establish that the state's actions denied the right to effective assistance of counsel or the right to confront the accusers. Denial of Giddings' motion to dismiss was affirmed. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

Theory That Prosecution Suppressed Material Evidence Favorable to Accused Not Considered for First Time on Appeal: Following conviction for attempted deliberate homicide, drug possession, threats and improper influence in official and political matters, and criminal endangerment, Johnson appealed on grounds that the prosecution had suppressed favorable exculpatory material evidence prior to trial. However, Johnson failed to object at trial or show how the evidence could have been exculpatory. Additionally, Johnson failed to provide a sufficient record and raised the issue for the first time on appeal, so the Supreme Court declined to consider the argument. St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005), followed in St. v. Ditton, 2006 MT 235, 333 M 483, 144 P3d 783 (2006).

Failure of Prosecution to Disclose Immaterial Financial Documents to Defendant — No Brady Violation: During a theft case against Field, police briefly possessed financial documents from the hotel that Field managed but returned the documents to the hotel when it was determined that the documents were not material to the case, and the prosecutor was unaware of the documents until Field requested them after trial. Nevertheless, Field asserted that he should be granted a new trial pursuant to Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963), because the prosecution failed to turn over the documents to him during discovery. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding no Brady violation. There was no evidence that Field sought to obtain the documents from the hotel or that the prosecution failed to honor a request to produce the documents while in the state's possession. Field's failure to procure the documents before trial was a tactical maneuver and not the result of a constitutional violation. St. v. Field, 2005 MT 181, 328 M 26, 116 P3d 813 (2005).

Failure to Provide Notice That Arresting Officer Would Appear as Witness — No Error: At Boettiger's DUI bench trial in Justice's Court, the arresting officer testified regarding Boettiger's actions on the day in question. Boettiger was convicted and appealed to District Court, but the state did not provide Boettiger with written notice that the officer would again be a witness. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the officer to testify over Boettiger's objection, and Boettiger's counsel subjected the officer to extensive cross-examination. Boettiger was again convicted and on appeal alleged error in the state's failure to list the officer as a potential witness. The Supreme Court did not condone the failure to provide notice but found that Boettiger knew that the officer would testify again and failed to demonstrate prejudice as a result of the officer's testimony. The Supreme Court disregarded the irregularity because it did not affect Boettiger's substantive rights, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Boettiger, 2004 MT 313, 324 M 20, 101 P3d 285 (2004), following St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997).

Failure to Establish Substantial Need for Discovery of Arresting Officer's Personnel File: During Peterson's trial for careless driving and DUI, the District Court relied in part on the arresting officer's experience in DUI cases and on the officer's training and awards. Peterson sought to discover the arresting officer's personnel file for purposes of cross-examination. The motion was denied because Peterson failed to demonstrate a substantial need for the file. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. Because Peterson failed to show a substantial need for the file, the District Court did not err in declining to order that the file be made available. Billings v. Peterson, 2004 MT 232, 322 M 444, 97 P3d 532 (2004).

Allowing Late Witness Not Error When Entire Case File Timely Provided to Defendant: The trial court allowed the state to add an expert to the list of prosecution witnesses 4 days before trial. Defendant contended that the disclosure of the intent to have the witness testify was untimely and prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed in light of the fact that the state provided defendant with the entire case file, including the expert's report, several months prior to trial, and the state did not refuse to comply with any request from defendant to examine evidence in the prosecution's control. The statutory disclosure requirements were met. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301 (1986), and Superior Enterprises, LLC v. Mont. Power Co., 2002 MT 139, 310 M 198, 49 P3d 565 (2002).

No Showing That Evidence Exculpatory or Intentionally Withheld — Summary Dismissal Proper: Hiebert sued the county and several county officials for withholding exculpatory evidence in Hiebert's trial for sexual assault. The District Court dismissed the suit on summary judgment, and Hiebert appealed. The prosecution has a duty to disclose all favorable evidence to the defense, and when considering the withholding of exculpatory evidence from the defense, a due process violation of Brady v. Md., 373 US 83 (1963), occurs if: (1) the evidence at issue is favorable to the accused, either because it has exculpatory or impeachment value; (2) the evidence was willfully or inadvertently suppressed by the state; and (3) the suppression resulted in prejudice to the accused. In this case, Hiebert failed to demonstrate that evidentiary transcripts were exculpatory or withheld intentionally, other than by speculating that one official lied in testifying that the transcript was not withheld, and speculation is insufficient to avoid summary judgment. The Supreme Court affirmed summary judgment. Hiebert v. Cascade County, 2002 MT 233, 311 M 471, 56 P3d 848 (2002).

Defendant Aware of Exculpatory Statement Prior to Trial — No Different Result Had Prosecutor Disclosed Evidence: The state interviewed a child abuse victim a few days before Thompson's trial for sexual assault. At the interview, the victim made several contradictory statements about who abused her, including an exculpatory statement that Thompson did not abuse her. Thompson's wife was present at the interview and reported the statement to Thompson and his attorney, who decided to use the information at trial for cross-examination and impeachment purposes. Following Thompson's conviction, he claimed entitlement to relief because the state failed to disclose the exculpatory evidence, arguing that even if he knew about the statement, the state had an independent duty to notify him. The state contended that it was not required to notify Thompson of evidence about which he already knew. Citing Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422 (2000), the Supreme Court concluded that there was no reasonable probability that the result would have been different had the prosecution informed Thompson of the victim's comments and declined to set aside the conviction based on the state's failure to disclose. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001).

Failure to Disclose Inculpatory Evidence Violative of Continuing Duty to Disclose: Stewart was charged with attempting to fraudulently obtain dangerous drugs by altering a prescription from his doctor. Stewart was given prescriptions for three drugs and attempted to fill two at a local pharmacy. The pharmacist believed that one of the two prescriptions had been altered by changing the number of pills from "30" to "80" and refused to return it to Stewart, despite Stewart's request. In the opening statement, Stewart's defense was that someone else in his house had altered the prescription without his knowledge and that, believing the problem was with the doctor's handwriting, he had requested return of the prescription so that he could take it to another pharmacist with whom he had previously dealt and who could better read the handwriting. After hearing this argument and realizing that the third prescription might be at the other pharmacy, the prosecutor dispatched an officer to retrieve it and, upon inspection, discovered that it was altered in an identical manner. On cross-examination after Stewart presented his defense, the prosecutor placed the third prescription in front of Stewart and asked him to identify it. Stewart's attorney objected on grounds that she had never seen it or been notified of its existence. The trial court overruled the objection and allowed the third prescription into evidence, effectively destroying Stewart's defense and changing the entire tenor of the case. During closing, the prosecutor referred to the third prescription 12 times, even though Stewart had never been charged with any crime in connection with it. Stewart argued on appeal that if the third prescription had been revealed when it was discovered, he would have had time to reconsider his decision to testify or exercise his right to remain silent. The Supreme Court found that withholding discoverable inculpatory evidence until a defendant asserts a defense based on the apparent nonexistence of that evidence amounts to trial by ambush that forecloses other possibly viable defenses. Montana's statutory disclosure requirements do not hinge on whether evidence is inculpatory or exculpatory, but simply mandate that the state disclose all additional information or material in its possession, and the penalty for intentional failure to do so may include holding counsel in contempt or declaring a mistrial. The state should have disclosed the third prescription to the defense as part of its continuing duty of disclosure, and the District Court erred in admitting the prescription as evidence. The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Stewart, 2000 MT 379, 303 M 507, 16 P3d 391, 57 St. Rep. 1615 (2000).

Applicability of Brady Rule — Evidence of Accomplice's Rape, Criminal History, and Violent Background Insufficient for New Trial: In a postconviction relief proceeding, petitioner claimed that the state's failure at the first trial to disclose the accomplice's criminal history or sexual assault allegation was prejudicial and warranted a new trial. The Supreme Court found this argument completely without merit. Although the evidence may have been helpful in impeaching the accomplice's testimony, in no way could the failure to disclose this information reasonably be taken to put the whole case in such a different light as to undermine confidence in the verdict. Even in the absence of the accomplice's testimony, there was an overwhelming abundance of other accomplice testimony and corroborative evidence to establish petitioner's guilt. The state did not violate Brady with regard to the guilt phase of petitioner's trial because any favorable information that the state failed to disclose was not material to petitioner's guilt or innocence. Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000).

Refusal to Impose Sanctions for Discovery Violations Affirmed Absent Prejudice or Surprise: Golder argued in a motion in limine and in briefs that the timing of the state's formal disclosure of two witnesses and the nature of their testimony constituted unfair surprise and jeopardized his right to a fair trial. The District Court held that Golder had sufficient notice and denied any sanctions for discovery abuse. The court had ordered disclosure of the materials requested, and that order was ultimately complied with. The refusal to impose sanctions for discovery violations is within the court's discretion. The Supreme Court examined the record and affirmed, finding that any noncompliance with discovery orders was not willful and that no prejudice resulted. St. v. Golder, 2000 MT 239, 301 M 368, 9 P3d 635, 57 St. Rep. 999 (2000), following St. v. Waters, 228 M 490, 743 P2d 617 (1987).

Negligent, Not Intentional, Failure to Provide Defendant With Witness Interview Transcript — No Showing of Materiality of Evidence in Light of Defendant's Confession of Crime: Three taped interviews were conducted with a sexual assault victim. The first two related to Baker's alleged assault of the victim, while the third related to separate allegations that the victim had also been abused by a family member, although Baker's name was also mentioned. Baker was not provided with a copy or transcript of the third interview prior to trial. When that information came out at trial, Baker was provided a copy and viewed it during a recess. Following the break and Baker's review of the transcript, Baker moved for a mistrial on grounds that the prosecution's failure to provide a transcript had denied him exculpatory evidence and impaired his ability to cross-examine witnesses, violating his right to due process and a fair trial. The motion was denied, and Baker appealed. Citing St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 133, 294 M 509, 982 P2d 468 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that an intentional suppression of exculpatory evidence by the prosecution is a per se violation of due process. However, in this case, the state's failure to provide Baker with a transcript of the third interview was negligent rather than intentional, so it did not amount to a due process violation unless the evidence was material, of substantial use, vital to the defense, and exculpatory. In light of the fact that Baker had admitted during one interview that he assaulted the victim and related details of the incident, there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different had the state disclosed the third interview prior to trial. Baker failed to meet the burden of establishing materiality, so his due process right was not violated, nor did the court err in denying his motion for a mistrial. St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 235, 301 M 323, 8 P3d 817, 57 St. Rep. 976 (2000). See also St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177 (1999).

No Brady Violation When Petitioner Could Have Obtained Evidence by Other Available Means: Ellenburg asserted that the state committed a Brady violation (see Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963)) and violated his due process rights by the state's loss or destruction of potentially exculpatory documents seized from his office without a warrant while Ellenburg was in prerelease status in the intensive supervision program following his imprisonment at the state prison. Applying Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that one element of proving a Brady violation is that the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence. In this case, the court affirmed, finding no Brady violation because Ellenburg did not demonstrate that he was unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Reasonableness of In Camera Review of Exculpatory Evidence in Balancing Defendant's Right to Review With Victim's Right to Confidentiality: Duffy sought access to confidential reports, many of which were handwritten notes from mental health professionals who were involved in the treatment of Duffy's daughters whom Duffy was alleged to have assaulted. The District Court examined the documents in camera and ordered a redacted one-page copy to be disclosed to defense counsel. Duffy asserted that the in camera procedure was unfair because review by a judge is no substitute for review by the defendant's advocate. However, equally important to the defendant's right to discover exculpatory evidence is the victim's right to protect confidential relations. When these competing interests conflict, they must be balanced by the District Court through in camera review, and the court did not err in doing so. To allow defense counsel general access to a victim's confidential records could adversely affect the state's interest in uncovering and treating abuse. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), following St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89 (1990). See also Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39 (1986).

Question of Gun Ownership — Pawnshop Records Allowed as Rebuttal to Character Evidence Regarding Defendant's Credibility: Weitzel was charged with felony assault. The state's witnesses testified that Weitzel had assaulted Brewer with a handgun. As part of Weitzel's character evidence, he testified that he did not presently own a handgun, but went on to describe how he had purchased a handgun as a gift for his brother several years earlier. Weitzel's brother confirmed that he had received a gun as a gift and corroborated that Weitzel did not presently own a handgun. Over Weitzel's objection, the District Court allowed the state to introduce, as rebuttal evidence, pawnshop records showing that Weitzel had pawned a handgun in 1996 and then retrieved it, ruling that the evidence was very relevant to Weitzel's credibility. On appeal, Weitzel alleged error in the introduction of the pawnshop records, contending that there was no basis in the record for the introduction and that the state failed to follow Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and this section when it did not disclose the records in advance of trial. The Supreme Court held that Weitzel opened the door to the rebuttal testimony by choosing to testify as to his gun ownership. The records were properly introduced to rebut the misimpression that Weitzel had purchased only one handgun in the past, as a gift for his brother. Further, the state was not obligated to disclose its knowledge of the records before trial because the prosecution is under no statutory duty to provide pretrial notice of a witness called to impeach the credibility of a defense witness. The rebuttal evidence did not become relevant until Weitzel and his brother testified, and the state had no reason to know in advance of trial that Weitzel would defend against the charges by testifying that he did not own or possess any handguns. Once Weitzel opened the door to the question of his character, the state was not precluded from presenting rebuttal testimony without adhering to the notice requirements. St. v. Weitzel, 2000 MT 86, 299 M 192, 998 P2d 1154, 57 St. Rep. 368 (2000), following St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

Criteria Necessary to Establish Brady Violation: The suppression by the prosecution of material evidence favorable to the accused violates the due process rights of the accused, pursuant to Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), including failing to disclose an agreement with a prosecution witness in exchange for testimony if the agreement provides tangible benefits. When there is no agreement, there is no duty to disclose. To establish a Brady violation, the petitioner must establish that: (1) the state possessed evidence, including impeachment evidence, favorable to the defense; (2) the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence; (3) the prosecution suppressed the favorable evidence; and (4) had the evidence been disclosed, a reasonable probability exists that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different. Here, Gollehon asserted that pretrial and posttrial agreements by the state with a prosecution witness prejudiced Gollehon's due process rights because if the jury had known of the agreements, the credibility of the witness would have been in doubt. However, aside from a guarantee of the witness's safety, which was disclosed to the jury at trial, Gollehon could not establish a Brady violation through the existence of an undisclosed pretrial agreement. Further, in order for posttrial assistance to be relevant, there must have been an agreement for parole before trial in order to support a Brady violation. In the absence of evidence of a pretrial agreement, there can be no Brady violation because no evidence was suppressed from the jury. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999), followed in St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000), and St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005). See also Giglio v. U.S., 405 US 150, 766 L Ed 2d 104, 92 S Ct 763 (1972), Alderson v. Zant, 22 F3d 1541 (11th Cir. 1994), and Mills v. Singletary, 63 F3d 999 (11th Cir. 1995).

Release of Victim's Belongings to Family — No Negation of Circumstantial Facts: Buckles was involved in a one-car accident wherein his passenger was killed and drugs were found at the scene. Buckles' blood test indicated traces of drugs, and he was charged with negligent homicide and possession with intent to sell. Buckles contended that the state deliberately suppressed material evidence relevant to the charge of possession with intent to sell when it released the passenger's personal effects to the passenger's mother, claiming that if Buckles had had access to the passenger's belongings before they were released, an expert might have found traces of drugs that would suggest that the passenger, rather than Buckles, possessed the drugs found at the scene. The Supreme Court noted that all the passenger's belongings had been documented and logged and that, even if there were a trace of drugs found in the passenger's belongings, that evidence would not negate the very strong circumstantial facts indicating that the drugs were hidden at the accident scene by Buckles and that they were originally in Buckles' bag. Buckles could have proceeded to trial and established ownership of the items through his own testimony and testimony of the passenger's mother, but this Buckles did not do. The negligent homicide and possession with intent to sell convictions were affirmed. St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177, 56 St. Rep. 331 (1999).

No Evidence of Intentional or Negligent Suppression of Exculpatory Evidence: The defendant argued that the state had suppressed evidence of conversations by law enforcement personnel with an individual who indicated to them that the defendant was innocent of the crimes charged. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the state had not suppressed evidence, that the defendant knew of the existence of the individual, and that the individual had potentially favorable evidence but that the defense had not obtained the individual's testimony through its own failure to act. St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 686 (1998).

Admissibility of Booking Photograph Not Part of Reciprocal Discovery Package: McKeon contended that a booking photograph taken 2 days after commission of a robbery unfairly surprised him, allowing the prosecution an unfair advantage and prejudicing his case because the photograph was not part of the reciprocal discovery package and was produced only the day before trial. The Iowa state trooper who had arrested McKeon brought the photograph when he came to Montana to testify, and as soon as the prosecution became aware of the photograph, McKeon was notified. McKeon had based his mistaken identity defense on the fact that the witness description of a robbery suspect did not match his appearance at trial, but the booking photograph showed that the description was accurate at the time of the robbery. Absent a showing that the prosecution had intentionally withheld the photograph until immediately before trial, the Supreme Court held that the prosecution had complied with the spirit of the discovery rules. McKeon's decision to alter his appearance at trial from his described appearance at the time of the robbery was a strategic decision that failed, and admission of the booking photograph did not result in unfair prejudice. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

No Obligation for State to Furnish Summaries of Testimony — Failure to Provide Transcript — No Surprise or Prejudice Found: Sol was convicted in Justice's Court of DUI and appealed to District Court. He argued that the state had failed to make available to him summaries of witnesses' testimony and had failed to deliver to him a copy of a summary of the testimony of one of the state's experts after he was informed of the identity of the expert. The Supreme Court held that there was no requirement in this section for the state to provide a summary of the testimony of any witness and that the state's obligation to provide reports completed by its expert had been satisfied by notification of where the reports could be obtained. The Supreme Court also noted that Sol was unable to point to any prejudice or surprise that he suffered as a result of the alleged discovery violations. Because Sol had failed to order a transcript of the District Court trial in compliance with former Rule 9(b), M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court was unable to determine whether disputed evidence had been offered at trial and, if it was, whether it resulted in surprise or prejudice. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Alleged Failure to Disclose Confession During Discovery — No Prior Record of Confession — Confession First Alleged by Peace Officer at Trial: Defendant moved for a mistrial because the state did not disclose to him during discovery the testimony that a peace officer gave at trial as to the defendant's confession to the officer. The court correctly found that any prejudice to defendant was removed when his counsel, during cross-examination, elicited from the officer testimony that there was no record, written, taped, or otherwise, of a confession and that the officer's testimony that defendant confessed was an assumption the officer made from certain statements of defendant, which were not themselves an admission of guilt. Moreover, the material from which the officer made the assumption was available to defendant during discovery, and defendant did not make a contemporaneous objection to the testimony at trial. The lower court properly refused to grant a mistrial. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Conditional Disclosure of Videotape Including Undercover Agent: Although this section allows a prosecutor to impose reasonable conditions on the disclosure of physical evidence during discovery, it is a per se violation of due process for the state to intentionally or deliberately suppress evidence of facts that would be favorable to the defendant. The state provided a videotape of illegal hunting activities engaged in by defendant, but edited the tape, especially those parts that might identify its undercover investigator. The state allowed the defendant's attorney to view the unedited tape. There was no discovery violation. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Failure to Make Motion for Production of Information — Denial of Motion to Exclude Testimony on Subject of Information: Defendant requested a peace officer's personnel file and monthly activity reports, and the state refused the request. Because defendant did not make a motion to the court for production of the information, the court properly denied his motion shortly before the trial to exclude the officer's testimony. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

No Duty to Disclose Which Items Produced During Discovery Would Be Introduced at Trial: During discovery, the state produced a photo of defendant and records showing a hunting license suspension. The District Court properly denied the defendant's motion to exclude them at trial when defendant moved for their exclusion on the grounds that the state had not told him it would introduce them at trial. The state had no such duty. The duty is to produce material that "may" be used at trial. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Duty of Prosecution to Give Defendant All Requested Exculpatory Information — Applicability of Brady Rule — Remand for Resentencing: Under Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), the prosecution is required to give a criminal defendant all requested exculpatory information material either to the defendant's guilt or to punishment. Under U.S. v. Bagley, 473 US 667, 87 L Ed 2d 481, 105 S Ct 3375 (1985), the prosecution must also deliver to the defendant all evidence significant for impeachment purposes. In order to require reversal of a defendant's conviction or sentence, a Brady violation must relate to material information. The standard for materiality was set out in Kyles v. Whitley, 514 US 419, 131 L Ed 2d 490, 115 S Ct 1555, 63 USLW 4303 (1995), holding that the defendant must show that there is a reasonable probability that had the information been provided, the result would have been different. The effect of suppressed Brady material must be considered collectively rather than on an item-by-item basis. In the present case, defendant raised numerous issues in an attempt to show that the state had failed to disclose certain materials. After examining each issue, the Supreme Court found that all but two were immaterial and that those two would not have affected the outcome of the trial even if they had been disclosed. However, there was a reasonable probability that had that information been provided to the defendant, the result of the sentencing hearing could have been different if the undisclosed information could have been used to support defendant's contention of mitigating circumstances. Therefore, the court vacated the sentences and remanded for resentencing. Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995), followed in Kills On Top v. St., 279 M 384, 928 P2d 182, 53 St. Rep. 1197 (1996), and St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177, 56 St. Rep. 331 (1999). See also Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422, 57 St. Rep. 1444 (2000), holding that it was harmless error for the District Court to fail to address new claims in its Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law and Order dismissing petitioner's amended petition for postconviction relief.

Informant's Violation of Employment Contract With Police Not Exculpatory Evidence: Hatfield argued that Turner violated the terms of his contract with the police because at the time that he bought drugs from Hatfield, he had not been directed by the investigating officer. Hatfield contended that if he had known of the contract before trial, he would have been able to use the contract violations to impeach the veracity of Turner's testimony. The Supreme Court held that Hatfield was able to present his version of events concerning the drug sale and that the jury apparently believed the state's account. Therefore, there was no basis to conclude that the employment contract would have tended to negate Hatfield's guilt. There was no duty on the state's part to disclose the contract's existence. St. v. Hatfield, 269 M 307, 888 P2d 899, 52 St. Rep. 1 (1995).

Calling of Rebuttal Witness Without Prior Notice — Not Prejudicial Error: The state called a witness on rebuttal that appeared to be an attempt to rebut defendant's alibi defense in violation of the notice requirements of this section. However, defendant's objection to the testimony was sustained, and the witness stepped down. Defendant was thus not prejudiced by the testimony of the witness despite the fact that proper notice was not given. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

New Trial Not Granted Based on Defendant's Argument That His Failure to Discover Victim's Blood Test Was Excusable Mistake: Barrack moved for a new trial on the basis that the state had not provided him with the results of the victim's blood test and that he had not obtained the results until he subpoenaed them from the hospital prior to sentencing. The Supreme Court held that the state had no duty to provide the test results when it had never requested or obtained the results from the hospital and when the defendant could have obtained the results from the hospital at any time. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994), following St. v. Heth, 230 M 268, 750 P2d 103 (1988).

Mandatory Disclosure Required: The state failed to turn over evidence of prior contact with defendant prior to trial but maintained that under St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230 (1988), there was no duty to disclose the types of information set out in this section until the state actually developed exculpatory information. Clarifying Shaver, the Supreme Court found that while subsection(1)(e) of this section imposes a mandatory duty on the prosecution to disclose all material that might be generically referred to as exculpatory, subsections (1)(a) through (1)(d) and (2) contain no such limiting language. Under the plain language of those subsections, the prosecution is obligated to fully disclose all material and information listed that is within the prosecution's possession and control, whether inculpatory or exculpatory. It is not up to the state or its agents to decide the inculpatory or exculpatory nature of the material or information. That decision lies with the defendant. St. v. Licht, 266 M 123, 879 P2d 670, 51 St. Rep. 686 (1994), followed in St. v. Hatfield, 269 M 307, 888 P2d 899, 52 St. Rep. 1 (1995), and discussed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Denial of Defendant's Access to Rape Victim's Counselor and Counselor's Records Upheld: Muir was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under 16 years of age. Prior to and during trial, Muir requested access to the victim's psychological counselor and to the counselor's records because the counselor was listed as a potential witness. However, after an in camera review of the records by the District Court, Muir was given access only to an investigator's note of an interview with the victim's counselor. The Supreme Court held that Muir was properly denied access to the counselor and the counselor's records because the victim's conversations with the counselor are privileged and the District Court found no exculpatory evidence in the records. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court also reasoned that a defendant's right to pretrial discovery is not equivalent to a defendant's constitutional right of confrontation and that Muir had shown no correlation between the victim's emotional problems and her consent to sexual intercourse. St. v. Muir, 263 M 211, 867 P2d 1094, 51 St. Rep. 19 (1994).

Defendant to Request Copies of Evidentiary Documents: The prosecution sent Gollehon a list of 211 pieces of evidence and a letter stating that if he wanted copies of any of the documents to notify the state. Gollehon did not request any documents and did not claim any discovery violations during trial. On appeal, he argued that the state had failed to provide him with copies of evidence to be used against him. The Supreme Court held that, after offering to provide copies of evidence, the state may assume that the defendant has copies of any evidence not requested and held that the state has no duty to provide copies not requested. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1718 (1993).

Claim of Discovery Violation During Trial — Lack of Proof That State Failed to Provide Pertinent Evidence: Gollehon claimed that he learned during the course of trial of a possible discovery violation, whereupon he moved for dismissal or, in the alternative, for a continuance. Both motions were denied. Investigators for the state had provided Gollehon with 213 pieces of evidence gathered in the case, including lists of witnesses that had been questioned. Gollehon did not request the lists and made the decision not to personally interview the witnesses or question them on the stand. Gollehon could not provide any evidence that any exculpatory evidence would have been obtained and was therefore not entitled to claim a discovery abuse. The motions were properly denied. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Introduction of Undisclosed Tape Recording for Impeachment Purposes: Defendant argued that the trial court erred in allowing the state to use an undisclosed tape recording to impeach one of the defense's witnesses. The Supreme Court held that this section does not require disclosure of recorded statements when used to impeach defense witnesses. St. v. Stewart, 253 M 475, 833 P2d 1085, 49 St. Rep. 540 (1992).

Chain of Custody — Drugs Under Official Seal: Briner contended that two packets of methamphetamine he allegedly sold were improperly admitted into evidence because there were several fatal gaps in the chain of custody. The state did not offer testimony from the person who mailed the packets from the Sheriff's office to the state crime lab for testing, the person who received them at the crime lab and mailed them back to the Sheriff, or the person at the Sheriff's office who received them from the crime lab and returned them to the evidence locker. However, the time periods in question were after the drugs were in official custody and under seal, and Briner showed no evidence to overcome the resulting presumption that there was no tampering with the drugs. St. v. Briner, 253 M 158, 831 P2d 1365, 49 St. Rep. 402 (1992).

Reasonable Means by Defense Counsel to Obtain Comparable Evidence — No Prejudice in Allowing Testimony: On the morning of the trial, defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude the testimony of two witnesses because the prosecution failed to produce a copy of the written statement of one of the witnesses that was given to the Sheriff's office on the night of the incident. The witness stated that she had thrown away her copy, and no statement was ever produced. Defendant argued that allowing the testimony constituted prejudicial error. Following the standard for lost or destroyed evidence set out in St. v. Halter, 238 M 408, 777 P2d 1313 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion in limine because defense counsel had other reasonable means to obtain comparable evidence during the 9 months prior to trial and had failed to allege the exculpatory value of the evidence or to show how the introduction of the written statement could have changed the outcome of the trial. St. v. West, 252 M 83, 826 P2d 940, 49 St. Rep. 170 (1992), followed in St. v. Sweet, 1998 MT 30, 287 M 336, 954 P2d 1133, 55 St. Rep. 110 (1998). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 133, 294 M 509, 982 P2d 468, 56 St. Rep. 536 (1999).

Proper Addition of Witness Twenty-Four Days Before Trial — No Surprise: The state moved to add a witness after arraignment, replacing "Unknown, State Crime Lab" on the information with the name of the scientist later determined to be testifying. Disclosure was not made earlier because it was not known which scientist would testify; however, there was no indication of willful noncompliance with the discovery statutes. A 24-day period was sufficient to eliminate surprise. The motion to add the witness was properly granted. St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991).

Amendment of Information as to Form — Addition of Witnesses — Arraignment Not Necessary: An original information charged defendant with sexual assault and incest over a continuous period of time. Three months before trial, the state amended the information to add witnesses and to exclude the period of time the victim lived outside defendant's home. The amendment was one of form and not substance, and expanding the witness list did not prejudice the substantial rights of defendant. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Prosecution's Duty Only to Make Material Available: The defendant argued that the state intentionally suppressed evidence until trial. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the material was always available to the defense but that the right to examine the evidence had not been exercised. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990), followed in Missoula v. Lesko, 2003 MT 177, 316 M 401, 73 P3d 166 (2003).

Refusal to Allow Discovery in Criminal Case — Due Process and Standard of Proof — Contempt Upheld: Petitioner, a Yellowstone County Deputy Attorney, was ordered by the District Court in an omnibus hearing to allow discovery of the state witnesses and any written statements they had made. At the time of the hearing, petitioner knew of the existence of a 70-page statement by a drug informant but did not disclose it to the court or to the defendant in a criminal case because petitioner believed it to be "intelligence information" since the affidavit did not mention the defendant in the criminal case by name. Petitioner was held in contempt for failing to turn over the affidavit and petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. The Supreme Court noted that at the District Court hearing on the contempt charge, while the petitioner's supervisors testified that they believed the decision of whether the affidavit was relevant and should therefore be turned over to defense counsel should be made by the District Court, petitioner testified that that decision was for her to make. The Supreme Court also held that petitioner received due process in the form of a show cause hearing and that the standard of proof applicable to the District Court's finding of contempt required the affirmance of that finding unless it was not supported by substantial evidence. Because the Supreme Court found substantial evidence in the transcripts that petitioner refused to recognize the District Court's authority, the Supreme Court affirmed the findings and conclusions and refused to issue the writ. State ex rel. O'Connor v. District Court, 245 M 88, 799 P2d 1056, 47 St. Rep. 1844 (1990), discussed in St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Destruction of Exculpatory Evidence to Prejudice of Defendant — No Bull: Defendant was charged with felony theft and illegal branding of a bull. At an omnibus hearing, he was granted discovery of all the state's written and recorded statements, names of state witnesses, copies of any statements, inspection of all physical and documentary evidence in the state's possession, and discovery of all special or additional evidence coming thereafter into the state's possession. Several months later, defendant requested inspection of the bull to allow his expert to inspect the brands; however, by that time the bull had been sold and slaughtered. The District Court dismissed the charges because the state was negligent in preserving necessary evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed after finding that: (1) the evidence destroyed had an exculpatory value to defendant; (2) the exculpatory value of the evidence was apparent prior to its destruction; (3) comparable evidence was not within defendant's ability to obtain by other reasonably available means; and (4) there was an expectation that the lost evidence would play a significant role in the defense. Further, the lower court was correct in determining that an evidentiary hearing to determine the exculpatory value of the evidence was not necessary because that which could develop from an actual inspection of the bull by experts was never developed because of the slaughter. At that point, the state had nothing to rebut in an evidentiary hearing. St. v. Halter, 238 M 408, 777 P2d 1313, 46 St. Rep. 1375 (1989), distinguishing St. v. Heth, 230 M 268, 750 P2d 103, 45 St. Rep. 194 (1988); St. v. Amaya, 227 M 390, 739 P2d 955, 44 St. Rep. 1173 (1987); St. v. Palmer, 207 M 152, 673 P2d 1234 (1983); and St. v. Craig, 169 M 150, 545 P2d 649 (1976). Halter followed in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993). See also St. v. Turner, 265 M 337, 877 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 467 (1994).

Raising Issue of Nondisclosure — Objection Must Be Made at Trial: The defendant's attorney made a general objection, stating no grounds to a line of questioning pursued by the prosecutor.

The judge overruled the objection but cautioned the prosecutor to limit his questions to a certain area. An exchange of questions and answers followed without the defense attorney objecting that the answers given by the defendant included a prior nondisclosed statement of his client. The Supreme Court ruled that no objection had been made at trial, and therefore the issue could not be raised on appeal. St. v. Rudolph, 238 M 135, 777 P2d 296, 46 St. Rep. 1150 (1989).

Statutes Ineffective Until Exculpatory Knowledge Gathered: Although this section and 46-15-327 require the state to disclose all pertinent information it may gather, and the duty to disclose is continuing, the statutes have no effect until the state actually develops the knowledge of a specific act, fact, or information that exculpates the defendant. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), clarified in St. v. Licht, 266 M 123, 879 P2d 670, 51 St. Rep. 686 (1994).

No Affirmative Duty of Police to Gather Exculpatory Evidence: Police officers may not frustrate or hamper a defendant's right to obtain exculpatory evidence, but they have no affirmative duty to gather such evidence absent express statutory mandate. St. v. Heth, 230 M 268, 750 P2d 103, 45 St. Rep. 194 (1988).

Introduction Into Evidence of Article of Controversy Rather Than Photographs of Article — No Prejudice or Surprise: Defendant was not prejudiced or unduly surprised by the introduction of the item of controversy in an attempted theft trial, despite the state's failure to list the item. Defendant knew of the item, and the state notified him that photographs of the item would be introduced into evidence and later informed him that the item itself would be introduced. St. v. Waters, 228 M 490, 743 P2d 617, 44 St. Rep. 1705 (1987).

Listing of New Witnesses Ten Days Before Trial — Defense Acquiescence in Noncontinuance: The state gave notice 10 days prior to trial of intent to possibly call 12 additional witnesses. After defense objection, the state agreed not to call five of those witnesses, whereupon the defense appeared to acquiesce in the decision not to continue the trial date. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the new witnesses. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987).

Suppression of Stolen Truck Not Due Process Violation: Defendant appealed his conviction for theft, contending that the failure to provide a jury view of the allegedly stolen truck and the state's subsequent disposition of the truck constituted an illegal suppression of physical evidence prejudicing his defense and violating his due process rights. The court affirmed the conviction, ruling that the defendant failed to show the suppressed evidence was exculpatory. Negligent suppression requires a reversal of conviction where the result would have been different had the evidence been disclosed. St. v. Amaya, 227 M 390, 739 P2d 955, 44 St. Rep. 1173 (1987).

Prosecution's Duty to Provide Names of Rebuttal Witnesses Contingent on Defendant's Notice of Intent to Interpose Affirmative Defense: Defendant was charged with deliberate homicide and convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide. On appeal, he claimed that the prosecution had failed to comply with 46-15-301(3), repealed by sec. 11, Ch. 202, L. 1985, and replaced by 46-15-322(6). The prosecution had offered testimony of witnesses for the purpose of rebutting defendant's contention that he did not have the necessary state of mind required for the offense of deliberate homicide but had not given the defendant prior notice of this testimony. The Supreme Court ruled that this was not error because the defendant had not notified the prosecutor prior to trial of intention to use the state of mind affirmative defense. The prosecution's burden of providing statutory notice of rebuttal witnesses does not arise until the defendant has given notice that he intends to interpose an affirmative defense. St. v. Sage, 221 M 192, 717 P2d 1096, 43 St. Rep. 738 (1986).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is chiefly a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-15-323 and requires a defendant to submit to certain tests and disclose other information to the prosecution.

Subsection (1) requires the defendant, upon request and upon the court's approval, to submit to the taking of certain samples or other tests for the purpose of obtaining evidence. The requirement of "showing good cause" was replaced with "approval of the court" in recognition of the varying burdens of proof required before the sample may be obtained. The defendant's right to counsel has not been expressly retained (1987 MCA 46-15-323(2)), but the right is preserved. See 46-8-101. The list of samples or tests to which the defendant may be required to submit is not all inclusive.

Subsections (2) through (5) preserve 1987 MCA 46-15-323(3). In general, except for new time limitations, the statute should not change established procedure.

Subsection (2) retains the first sentence of 1987 MCA 46-15-323(3) and requires the disclosure of the intent to rely on certain affirmative defenses. The statute requires notice within 10 days after the omnibus hearing but preserves the court's discretion to allow notice at a later time.

Subsection (3) requires the defendant, within 10 days after receiving a report of a psychiatric or psychological examination, to give written notice of the intent to introduce such evidence at trial. The statute allows the court discretion to permit notice at a later time. The difference between this subsection and subsection (2) is that the latter recognizes affirmative defenses that are distinct from a defense based on lack of mental state.

Subsection (4) includes a restatement of the second sentence of 1987 MCA 46-15-323(3). In addition, the subsection requires the defendant to disclose to the prosecution all written reports or statements made by certain witnesses.

Subsection (5) is a restatement of the 1987 code and allows amendments to the witness list that is required under this statute. To obtain the right to amend, the defendant must move the court and show good cause for the amendment.

Subsection (6) retains and clarifies the disclosure requirement contained in 1987 MCA 46-15-323(4). Rather than requiring such disclosure 30 days from arraignment, the code has been amended to require disclosure 10 days after the omnibus hearing. The Commission recognized that the disclosure of such evidence may occur at any time before the omnibus hearing upon agreement between the parties.

Subsection (7) is essentially a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-15-323(5). The subsection limits the code designation of "agent" to defense counsel's staff or investigators.

Subsection (8) preserves the 1987 code practice allowing the prosecution to obtain from the defendant things that could not otherwise be obtained. In accordance with 46-13-101, all motions should be written unless otherwise required.

2001 Amendment: Chapter 303 in (3) near beginning after "psychologist" inserted "or advanced practice registered nurse"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 20, 2001.

1993 Amendments: Chapter 182 in (2) and (6) substituted "Within 30 days after the arraignment" for "Within 10 days after the omnibus hearing in district court"; and made minor changes in style.

Chapter 262 near beginning of (2) and near beginning of (6), before "court", deleted "district"; near middle of (4), after "made by them", inserted "including all reports and statements"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: Throughout section substituted references to defendant for references to accused; in (1), at end, substituted "approval of the court" for "for good cause shown"; deleted former (2) that read: "(2) The accused is entitled to the presence of counsel at the taking of any evidence pursuant to subsection (1). Subsection (1) supplements and does not limit any other procedures established by law"; in (2) reduced time from "30 days after arraignment" to "10 days after the omnibus hearing"; at beginning of (3) inserted "Within 10 days after receiving a report of the defendant's mental condition from a psychiatrist or psychologist or at a later time as the court may for good cause permit, the defendant shall provide the prosecutor with a written notice of the defendant's intention to introduce evidence at trial of the defense that due to a mental disease or defect"; in (4), after "persons", inserted "other than the defendant" and after "defense" inserted "together with all written reports or statements made by them concerning the results of physical examinations, scientific tests, experiments, or comparisons, except that the defendant need not include a privileged report or statement unless he intends to use the privileged report or statement, or the witness who made it, at trial"; in (5), at end of first sentence, inserted "and disclose their reports or statements as required by this section", in second sentence, after "list", inserted "and the witness's report or statement has been disclosed as required by this section", and deleted former last sentence that read: "Any evidence that reasonably becomes available after the initial 30 days shall be admitted if 46-15-327 is complied with"; at beginning of (6) substituted "Within 10 days after the omnibus hearing in district court or at a later time as the court may for good cause permit" for "Simultaneously with the notice of defenses submitted under subsection (3)"; in (6)(a), after "witnesses", substituted "in the defense case-in-chief" for "at trial" and at end deleted "made by them in connection with the particular case"; at end of (7) substituted "defense counsel, and defense counsel's staff or investigators" for "or his attorneys and agents"; in (8) inserted last sentence concerning preparation and disclosure of summaries of witness testimony; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Nonrecord-Based Assertion of Ineffective Counsel for Failure to Raise Parental Discipline Defense at Trial for Partner or Family Member Assault Appropriate for Postconviction Proceedings, Not Direct Appeal: At her trial for partner or family member assault, Fender's counsel did not raise a parental discipline defense. Fender asserted that she was entitled to a new trial because failure of counsel to raise the defense constituted ineffective assistance of counsel, but the District Court denied the motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court was unable to determine from the record whether counsel's action was strategic, but because the alleged error was nonrecord-based, the question of whether there was merit to the parental discipline defense was more appropriate for postconviction proceedings, so the denial of a new trial was affirmed. St. v. Fender, 2007 MT 268, 339 M 395, 170 P3d 971 (2007).

Failure to Show Good Cause for Endorsing Expert Witness Five Days Before Trial — No Prejudice — Sanction Proper: Only 5 days before trial and more than 1 year after arraignment on criminal charges, DeMary moved to endorse an expert witness to rebut the state's expert. DeMary was aware of the state's expert at least 4 months before trial but failed to provide any explanation for waiting until 5 days before trial to seek endorsement. Although this section allows a defendant to add witnesses more than 30 days after arraignment if good cause is shown, DeMary failed to demonstrate good cause for the tardiness of the motion, nor did he show that the state was prepared to address the expert's testimony. DeMary also failed to demonstrate prejudice in the disallowance of his expert's testimony because the state never called the witness that DeMary's proposed expert was to refute. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in sanctioning DeMary for failure to comply with this section by disallowing the expert. St. v. DeMary, 2003 MT 307, 318 M 200, 79 P3d 817 (2003).

No Error in Denial of Continuance When Expert Testimony Properly Denied: DeMary sought to endorse an expert witness 5 days before trial, but the motion was properly denied because DeMary failed to comply with 46-15-323. DeMary then moved for a continuance in an effort to convince the trial court to reverse its decision, but the continuance motion was also denied, and DeMary appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Because the trial court did not abuse its discretion or prejudice DeMary by denying the expert's testimony, there was little reason to continue the trial date, so the continuance was properly denied. St. v. DeMary, 2003 MT 307, 318 M 200, 79 P3d 817 (2003).

Nonprejudicial Preclusion of Expert Witness Not Violative of Right to Fair Trial or Effective Counsel: DeMary contended that the District Court's denial of a motion to endorse an expert witness 5 days before trial constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and denied DeMary's right to a fair trial. Under the Strickland test, a defendant must show that counsel's performance was deficient and that the performance prejudiced the defendant and deprived the defendant of a fair trial. However, DeMary failed to comply with this section and failed to demonstrate prejudice in the disallowance of his expert's testimony because the state never called the witness that DeMary's proposed expert was to refute. Absent a showing of sufficient prejudice, DeMary could not show that the trial was unfair, and the assertion of ineffective assistance of counsel failed. St. v. DeMary, 2003 MT 307, 318 M 200, 79 P3d 817 (2003).

Record Devoid of Reasons for Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire — Ineffective Assistance Claim Improperly Raised on Direct Appeal: Defendant's claims of ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire could not be addressed without considering matters outside the record and were therefore inappropriate for direct appeal. The claims were thus dismissed without prejudice to defendant's pursuit of the claims in postconviction proceedings. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), following St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrmann, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005).

Record Devoid of Pretrial Tactical Decisions — Evidentiary Hearing Required on Ineffective Assistance Claim: In St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999), the Supreme Court held that the prosecutor in Soraich's murder trial was entitled to comment on a theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support and because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. Soraich then filed a petition for postconviction relief, claiming that defense counsel rendered ineffective assistance by stating that counsel would prove that the state's key witness gave inconsistent statements, without first determining whether an investigator's statement could be introduced as impeachment evidence. The District Court denied the petition, holding that Soraich should have raised the ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal because the claim was based on facts of record in the underlying case, so the claim was procedurally barred from postconviction review. To determine whether the ineffective assistance claim should have been raised on direct appeal or in a postconviction hearing, the Supreme Court cited the two-part process in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984). First, the trial record must adequately document a challenged act or omission of defense counsel for the defendant to raise an ineffective assistance claim on direct appeal. Second, the record on appeal must afford sufficient understanding of the reason for counsel's act or omission to answer the threshold question of whether the alleged error expresses a trial strategy or tactical decision, and if the record does not supply the reason for counsel's act or omission, the claim must be raised by postconviction relief. The record here did not contain any information about why defense counsel promised the jury that the investigator's testimony would prove Soraich's defense, but then failed to call the investigator as a witness. Without an evidentiary hearing and direct questioning of defense counsel, any guesses on what led to the failure to call the investigator as a witness were purely speculative. Because the record was devoid of counsel's pretrial tactical decisions, Soraich could not satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test, so 46-21-105 did not bar Soraich's postconviction assertion of ineffective assistance at trial. An evidentiary hearing was necessary to address the second prong of the Strickland test, and the District Court improperly dismissed Soraich's petition for postconviction relief. Therefore, the case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the ineffective assistance claim. Soraich v. St., 2002 MT 187, 311 M 90, 53 P3d 878 (2002). On remand, the District Court again denied relief, holding that under the second prong of the Strickland test, any allegedly deficient performance of counsel did not prejudice Soraich. Soraich appealed again, asserting that counsel's failure to call a witness to impeach a state witness resulted in prejudice. The Supreme Court disagreed. The witness had already been impeached through the testimony of another defense witness and by cross-examination concerning all of the inconsistencies in the questionable testimony. Failure to call another witness to establish the same point did not create a reasonable probability that the trial result would have been different and did not constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court was affirmed. Soraich v. St., 2004 MT 215, 322 M 375, 97 P3d 529 (2004). See also St. v. Harris, 2001 MT 231, 306 M 525, 36 P3d 372 (2001).

Exclusion of Witnesses Constituting Abuse of Discretion — Harmless Error: Berg's counsel failed to previously disclose witnesses by timely filing a witness list with the District Court pursuant to this section. The court imposed the harshest sanction available by excluding Berg's witnesses, and Berg contended that he was entitled to a new trial because the court erred by excluding his witnesses. Berg's failure to disclose was not willful, nor would the state have been unduly prejudiced or surprised by Berg's noncompliance because the witnesses were known to the state, being among the same witnesses that the state intended to call. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion in imposing such a harsh sanction, and a less severe sanction should have been imposed. However, the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was not so prejudicial that Berg was deprived of a fair trial. The jury was provided with the essence of the witnesses' testimony through the cross-examination of one of the state's witnesses, so the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was harmless error. St. v. Berg, 1999 MT 282, 296 M 546, 991 P2d 428, 56 St. Rep. 1138 (1999), followed in St. v. Dezeeuw, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Failure to Notify of Intent to Introduce Character Evidence — Testimony Precluded: After indicating in an omnibus hearing memorandum that he did not intend to introduce character evidence at his criminal trial, Root nevertheless sought to allow a witness to testify regarding his good character and reputation for nonviolence. The trial court may exercise its discretion to preclude certain testimony if the defendant fails to disclose the intent to introduce character evidence. Because Root failed to disclose that the witness would provide character evidence, as required in this section, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in prohibiting it. St. v. Root, 1999 MT 203, 296 M 1, 987 P2d 1140, 56 St. Rep. 792 (1999). See also St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439 (1990).

Error in Requiring Summaries of Defense Witnesses' Testimony — Due Process Violated — No Prejudicial Error Found: When Huerta was tried on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of a juvenile, he attempted to introduce testimony of 26 witnesses who would testify that the child's mother had the habit of severely punishing the child. In an effort to reduce delay caused by redundant testimony, the District Court required Huerta to summarize the testimony of all of the witnesses by affidavits. Huerta claimed that the required affidavits were ordered in violation of 46-15-328 and in violation of his due process rights because a similar burden was not placed upon the prosecution. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's order was in violation of subsection (8) of this section, which specifically prohibits summaries of defense testimony, and in violation of Huerta's right of due process because Wardius v. Oreg., 412 US 470 (1973), and State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987), require reciprocal discovery. However, the Supreme Court also held that Huerta did not establish that the violation of his rights was reversible error pursuant to 46-20-701 because he failed to show how the violations of statute and due process affected the outcome of the trial. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Allowing Prosecution to Depose Nontestifying Expert Witness Deficient Representation — No Prejudice: The defendant alleged that his counsel was ineffective because he allowed the prosecution to depose the defendant's nontestifying expert witness. The Supreme Court held that allowing the deposition constituted deficient representation but that the defendant suffered no prejudice as a result of the error. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Admissibility of Booking Photograph Not Part of Reciprocal Discovery Package: McKeon contended that a booking photograph taken 2 days after commission of a robbery unfairly surprised him, allowing the prosecution an unfair advantage and prejudicing his case because the photograph was not part of the reciprocal discovery package and was produced only the day before trial. The Iowa state trooper who had arrested McKeon brought the photograph when he came to Montana to testify, and as soon as the prosecution became aware of the photograph, McKeon was notified. McKeon had based his mistaken identity defense on the fact that the witness description of a robbery suspect did not match his appearance at trial, but the booking photograph showed that the description was accurate at the time of the robbery. Absent a showing that the prosecution had intentionally withheld the photograph until immediately before trial, the Supreme Court held that the prosecution had complied with the spirit of the discovery rules. McKeon's decision to alter his appearance at trial from his described appearance at the time of the robbery was a strategic decision that failed, and admission of the booking photograph did not result in unfair prejudice. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Failure to Comply With Disclosure Requirements of Disclosure Order — Sanctions Appropriate: Under this section, a defendant is required to provide the prosecution written notice of certain defenses within 30 days after arraignment and to simultaneously make available to the state the names and addresses of experts whom defendant intends to call at trial, together with reports and statements generated by those experts in connection with the case. Because of defendant's late notice of the intention to call an expert and to provide any written report or resume from the witness, the state was precluded from effectively meeting the proposed expert testimony. It was within the discretion and flexibility of the District Court to sanction defendant under 46-15-329 by prohibiting the expert from testifying. St. v. Haskins, 269 M 202, 887 P2d 1189, 51 St. Rep. 1474 (1994).

Constitutionality of Disclosure Statutes — Failure to Provide Psychiatric Reports — Defense of Mental Disease or Defect Precluded: Defendant was examined by a psychiatrist, and the trial court ordered submission of the medical report to the court. Following additional examination by three more psychiatrists or psychologists, defendant gave notice of the intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense, but the notice did not specify the names and addresses of persons defendant intended to call as witnesses to support his defense. The state moved for discovery of the names, addresses, and any statements or reports required to be disclosed under this section. Defense counsel refused to provide the information because disclosure could not be done without disclosing privileged or incriminating information. The trial court advised counsel that 46-15-328 provides for protective orders and for excising privileged or incriminating information and ordered disclosure. The trial court ruled that nondisclosure precluded defendant's use of the mental disease or defect defense. Defense counsel appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the disclosure requirements were an unconstitutional violation of the right against self-incrimination under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court previously affirmed Montana's reciprocal discovery provisions against attack on the same constitutional grounds in State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987). In this case, the court noted that the discovery provisions allow a defendant to be examined by as many psychiatrists as desired and that only statements of those that are to be called as witnesses at trial need be disclosed. Further, as set out in Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), the attorney-client privilege extends only to the point of testimonial use of that communication. Defendant was advised but refused to avail himself of the protective order provisions of 46-15-328, and in doing so, the refusal to comply with constitutional statutory discovery provisions precluded the use of the mental disease or defect defense. St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

Authority to Compel Evaluation When Defense Based on Battered Woman Syndrome: Defendant Hess contended that the District Court had no authority to compel a psychiatric and psychological evaluation of a defendant who asserts the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force based on battered woman syndrome. Defendant asserted that statutes governing the procedure for mental evaluation when mental state is an issue do not expressly provide for battered woman syndrome or place the defendant's mental state at issue when the syndrome is a factor. The Supreme Court noted that the defendant put her own mental state at issue by relying on that defense and then calling an expert to testify in support of that defense; therefore, 46-14-205 authorizes the state to request an evaluation for the limited purposes of rebuttal once mental state becomes an issue, despite the lack of a specific statutory reference to the defense of justifiable use of force based on battered woman syndrome. St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992), followed, with respect to a psychological defense not based upon mental disease or defect, in Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998).

Defendant Precluded From Calling Nondisclosed Witness: The defendant was not allowed to call a former probation officer in order to impeach the testimony of a codefendant. The Supreme Court held that the lower court properly excluded the testimony because defendant knew before the trial that the codefendant was going to testify against him and had a duty to disclose any witness he intended to call to impeach the codefendant's testimony. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990), followed in St. v. Root, 1999 MT 203, 296 M 1, 987 P2d 1140, 56 St. Rep. 792 (1999).

No Prejudice Through Order in Companion Case: In a companion case involving defendant's brother, the trial court, over the brother's objection, ordered the production of statements made by individuals whom the brother intended to call as witnesses, pursuant to this section. Pursuant to an order in his own case, defendant was required to produce the same information. Defendant did not object to the order in his own case and was precluded from raising the issue on appeal. Further, defendant lacked standing to assert the privilege that was alleged by his brother; the defendant did not demonstrate any prejudice to him as a result of the order in the companion case. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Statements Taken by Defendant From State's Witnesses Discoverable: The defendant argued that the lower court erred in ordering him to turn over to the prosecution statements taken from the state's witnesses. The Supreme Court ruled that the discovery of those statements was not unconstitutional, that the defendant had not shown he was prejudiced by their discovery, and that he also had listed all of the state's witnesses on his own list of witnesses, thereby making their statements discoverable. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Reasonable Restrictions on Confrontation of Child Witness: Defendant in an incest case contended his attorney could not conduct an effective interview unless defendant was present for consultation during the interview. The state argued that defendant's presence would harm the mental well-being of the minor victim. The Supreme Court held that the accused does not have a constitutional right to interview witnesses personally and that reasonable restrictions on the accused's access to the witness comports with the guarantees of the confrontation clause. A witness unwilling to be interviewed may be deposed, but an interview under circumstances directed by the witness would reflect unwillingness only if the attached conditions make it untenable for defense counsel to discover needed material. St. v. Smith, 235 M 99, 765 P2d 742, 45 St. Rep. 2190 (1988). See also St. v. Pecora, 190 M 115, 619 P2d 173, 37 St. Rep. 1742 (1980).

Work Product Doctrine Not to Encompass Substantial Evidence — Investigator's Report Subject to Discovery: In anticipation of a codefendant's testimony, a private investigator was hired to prepare a report for impeachment purposes. Defendant's counsel failed to provide the state with the report, claiming exemption under the work product doctrine of 46-15-324. Counsel's election to use the report constituted waiver of the product privilege, and his attempt to label the report "impeachment material" was not sufficient for the report to escape discovery. The privilege is not inviolate nor is the scope of the doctrine so broad as to encompass substantial evidence. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Reciprocal Pretrial Discovery Statutes Constitutional: In criminal cases, statutes requiring defendant to reveal to prosecutor a list of witnesses and exhibits expected to be used at trial does not violate the state or federal constitution. State ex rel. Carculis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604, 44 St. Rep. 1954 (1987).

Exhibit Not Linked to Event in Dispute — Notice Period Not Met — Exhibit Properly Excludable: Defendant attempted to introduce BB pellets as physical evidence that he did not fire in the direction of another person. The pellets were properly excluded as lacking probative value since no ballistics tests were conducted that would tie the pellets to the alleged weapon or the alleged time and place of the incident. Further, defendant attempted to introduce the exhibit as tangible evidence after the 30-day notice period set out in this section and was unable to vouch for the exhibit to the trial court's satisfaction. St. v. Keup, 228 M 194, 741 P2d 1330, 44 St. Rep. 1451 (1987).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-15-324. The statute protects both the work product and superseded notes from discovery unless otherwise provided in this statute. The expansion to include protection of superseded notes is a logical extension of the work product rule. The Commission decided that an express statement of this protection was required because a strict definition of work product would not include such materials.

The statute continues express recognition of the principle that exculpatory information should always be presented to the defense. Of course, that requirement is not reciprocal. The 1987 code's procedure for disclosing the existence of any informants has not been retained.

(a) disclosure would result in substantial risk to the informant or to his operational effectiveness; and

(b) the failure to disclose will not infringe the constitutional rights of the accused"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Failing to Disclose Evidence With No Exculpatory or Impeachment Value: Fish contended on appeal that the prosecution in a sexual intercourse without consent trial improperly withheld evidence until trial that the victim had admitted being intoxicated about a week before the crime. However, the Supreme Court found no error. The evidence had neither exculpatory nor impeachment value in the case, and defense counsel extensively cross-examined the victim on that issue at trial. Fish's argument that the evidence was improperly withheld failed. St. v. Fish, 2009 MT 47, 349 M 286, 204 P3d 681 (2009).

Discovery of Identity of Confidential Informant Properly Denied: DuBray contended that the identity of a confidential informant should have been disclosed in discovery. Applying the balancing test in Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53 (1957), the Supreme Court found nothing to persuade that disclosure of the informant's identity was warranted. The informant did not testify at trial, and DuBray offered nothing concrete or substantive to establish that disclosure was necessary to properly prepare for trial, that the informant might possess exculpatory information, or that the informant may have been involved in the crime. Mere speculation about possible relevancy of the informant's testimony was insufficient to warrant disclosure of the informant's identity. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003). See also St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672 (1987).

Failure to Disclose Drug Crime Informant Upheld: The possibility that a confidential police informant might have been an exculpatory witness was an insufficient basis for requiring disclosure of the informant's identity to the person charged with possession of marijuana with intent to sell. Moreover, the state had a strong interest in protecting the flow of information regarding the drug trade in the county and showed that the flow could be impaired without the future services of the informant and that the informant might be placed in danger by disclosure. Disclosure was properly denied. St. v. Sarbaum, 270 M 176, 890 P2d 1284, 52 St. Rep. 133 (1995).

Test for Disclosure of Identity of Informer: There is no fixed rule as to when an informant's identity must by disclosed. It depends on a balancing of the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the charged person's right to prepare a defense and on the circumstances of the case, taking into account the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors. St. v. Sarbaum, 270 M 176, 890 P2d 1284, 52 St. Rep. 133 (1995).

Motion to Disclose Informant's Identity Denied:

Defendant alleged that disclosure of the identity of the police informants was necessary to his defense because the informants had provided false information to the authorities regarding methamphetamine production and marijuana growing operations that were never found and because further examination would show the informants to be patently unreliable. However, the court properly refused to disclose the identities because: (1) although methamphetamine production articles described in the warrant application were not found, other articles consistent with methamphetamine production were found; (2) the warrant application stated the that informant believed marijuana was being grown, not that the informant had seen the marijuana; and (3) it was in the public interest not to disclose the identity of another informant who was still being used in a separate police investigation. Mere speculation or conjecture about the relevance of the informants' testimony was inadequate. Because defendant failed to demonstrate the falsity of the information, refusal to disclose their identities was proper. (See 1993 amendment.) St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299, 48 St. Rep. 376 (1991).

Defendant's motion to disclose the identity of the state's confidential informants was properly denied because, under the applicable test that balances the public's interest against the defendant's right to prepare her defense and to confront and examine her accusers, she did not demonstrate that the need for disclosure outweighs the government's interest. Defendant's contention that the state must first disclose the relevance of the informants' testimony misconstrues the balancing test under which the burden is on the defendant to show the need for disclosure. The record is bare regarding defendant's basis for making the motion for disclosure. (See 1993 amendment.) St. v. Babella, 237 M 311, 772 P2d 875, 46 St. Rep. 827 (1989).

Defendant's motion to disclose the identity of the state's confidential informant was properly denied when the informant's information was not used as a basis for probable cause to arrest and the informant took no active part in the alleged crime but simply supplied information. There was no evidence that disclosure outweighed the public interest in protecting the flow of information or that the informant's testimony would be relevant to any issue in the case. Further, defendant failed to substantiate the claim that his constitutional rights were infringed by nondisclosure or that the informant would be exposed to no risk upon disclosure. (See 1993 amendment.) St. v. Coates, 233 M 303, 759 P2d 999, 45 St. Rep. 1508 (1988).

Work Product Doctrine Not to Encompass Substantial Evidence — Investigator's Report Subject to Discovery: In anticipation of a codefendant's testimony, a private investigator was hired to prepare a report for impeachment purposes. Defendant's counsel failed to provide the state with the report, claiming exemption under the work product doctrine of this section. Counsel's election to use the report constituted waiver of the product privilege, and his attempt to label the report "impeachment material" was not sufficient for the report to escape discovery. The privilege is not inviolate nor is the scope of the doctrine so broad as to encompass substantial evidence. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Nondisclosure of Witness Proper: Defendant appeals from his conviction for criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs), asserting that nondisclosure of the identity of a confidential informant was prejudicial. The court held that defendant did not meet the burden of showing that the informant would have been a material witness whose testimony might result in exoneration or that failure to disclose the identity of the informant would infringe defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672, 44 St. Rep. 1251 (1987).

Case Notes

Defendant Aware of Exculpatory Statement Prior to Trial — No Different Result Had Prosecutor Disclosed Evidence: The state interviewed a child abuse victim a few days before Thompson's trial for sexual assault. At the interview, the victim made several contradictory statements about who abused her, including an exculpatory statement that Thompson did not abuse her. Thompson's wife was present at the interview and reported the statement to Thompson and his attorney, who decided to use the information at trial for cross-examination and impeachment purposes. Following Thompson's conviction, he claimed entitlement to relief because the state failed to disclose the exculpatory evidence, arguing that even if he knew about the statement, the state had an independent duty to notify him. The state contended that it was not required to notify Thompson of evidence about which he already knew. Citing Kills On Top v. St., 2000 MT 340, 303 M 164, 15 P3d 422 (2000), the Supreme Court concluded that there was no reasonable probability that the result would have been different had the prosecution informed Thompson of the victim's comments and declined to set aside the conviction based on the state's failure to disclose. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001).

Failure to Disclose Inculpatory Evidence Violative of Continuing Duty to Disclose: Stewart was charged with attempting to fraudulently obtain dangerous drugs by altering a prescription from his doctor. Stewart was given prescriptions for three drugs and attempted to fill two at a local pharmacy. The pharmacist believed that one of the two prescriptions had been altered by changing the number of pills from "30" to "80" and refused to return it to Stewart, despite Stewart's request. In the opening statement, Stewart's defense was that someone else in his house had altered the prescription without his knowledge and that, believing the problem was with the doctor's handwriting, he had requested return of the prescription so that he could take it to another pharmacist with whom he had previously dealt and who could better read the handwriting. After hearing this argument and realizing that the third prescription might be at the other pharmacy, the prosecutor dispatched an officer to retrieve it and, upon inspection, discovered that it was altered in an identical manner. On cross-examination after Stewart presented his defense, the prosecutor placed the third prescription in front of Stewart and asked him to identify it. Stewart's attorney objected on grounds that she had never seen it or been notified of its existence. The trial court overruled the objection and allowed the third prescription into evidence, effectively destroying Stewart's defense and changing the entire tenor of the case. During closing, the prosecutor referred to the third prescription 12 times, even though Stewart had never been charged with any crime in connection with it. Stewart argued on appeal that if the third prescription had been revealed when it was discovered, he would have had time to reconsider his decision to testify or exercise his right to remain silent. The Supreme Court found that withholding discoverable inculpatory evidence until a defendant asserts a defense based on the apparent nonexistence of that evidence amounts to trial by ambush that forecloses other possibly viable defenses. Montana's statutory disclosure requirements do not hinge on whether evidence is inculpatory or exculpatory, but simply mandate that the state disclose all additional information or material in its possession, and the penalty for intentional failure to do so may include holding counsel in contempt or declaring a mistrial. The state should have disclosed the third prescription to the defense as part of its continuing duty of disclosure, and the District Court erred in admitting the prescription as evidence. The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Stewart, 2000 MT 379, 303 M 507, 16 P3d 391, 57 St. Rep. 1615 (2000).

Negligent, Not Intentional, Failure to Provide Defendant With Witness Interview Transcript — No Showing of Materiality of Evidence in Light of Defendant's Confession of Crime: Three taped interviews were conducted with a sexual assault victim. The first two related to Baker's alleged assault of the victim, while the third related to separate allegations that the victim had also been abused by a family member, although Baker's name was also mentioned. Baker was not provided with a copy or transcript of the third interview prior to trial. When that information came out at trial, Baker was provided a copy and viewed it during a recess. Following the break and Baker's review of the transcript, Baker moved for a mistrial on grounds that the prosecution's failure to provide a transcript had denied him exculpatory evidence and impaired his ability to cross-examine witnesses, violating his right to due process and a fair trial. The motion was denied, and Baker appealed. Citing St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 133, 294 M 509, 982 P2d 468 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that an intentional suppression of exculpatory evidence by the prosecution is a per se violation of due process. However, in this case, the state's failure to provide Baker with a transcript of the third interview was negligent rather than intentional, so it did not amount to a due process violation unless the evidence was material, of substantial use, vital to the defense, and exculpatory. In light of the fact that Baker had admitted during one interview that he assaulted the victim and related details of the incident, there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have been different had the state disclosed the third interview prior to trial. Baker failed to meet the burden of establishing materiality, so his due process right was not violated, nor did the court err in denying his motion for a mistrial. St. v. Baker, 2000 MT 235, 301 M 323, 8 P3d 817, 57 St. Rep. 976 (2000). See also St. v. Buckles, 1999 MT 79, 294 M 95, 979 P2d 177 (1999).

No Brady Violation When Petitioner Could Have Obtained Evidence by Other Available Means: Ellenburg asserted that the state committed a Brady violation (see Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963)) and violated his due process rights by the state's loss or destruction of potentially exculpatory documents seized from his office without a warrant while Ellenburg was in prerelease status in the intensive supervision program following his imprisonment at the state prison. Applying Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395 (1999), the Supreme Court noted that one element of proving a Brady violation is that the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence. In this case, the court affirmed, finding no Brady violation because Ellenburg did not demonstrate that he was unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means. St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT 232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000).

Criteria Necessary to Establish Brady Violation: The suppression by the prosecution of material evidence favorable to the accused violates the due process rights of the accused, pursuant to Brady v. Md., 373 US 83, 10 L Ed 2d 215, 83 S Ct 1194 (1963), including failing to disclose an agreement with a prosecution witness in exchange for testimony if the agreement provides tangible benefits. When there is no agreement, there is no duty to disclose. To establish a Brady violation, the petitioner must establish that: (1) the state possessed evidence, including impeachment evidence, favorable to the defense; (2) the petitioner did not possess the evidence and could not have obtained it with reasonable diligence; (3) the prosecution suppressed the favorable evidence; and (4) had the evidence been disclosed, a reasonable probability exists that the outcome of the proceedings would have been different. Here, Gollehon asserted that pretrial and posttrial agreements by the state with a prosecution witness prejudiced Gollehon's due process rights because if the jury had known of the agreements, the credibility of the witness would have been in doubt. However, aside from a guarantee of the witness's safety, which was disclosed to the jury at trial, Gollehon could not establish a Brady violation through the existence of an undisclosed pretrial agreement. Further, in order for posttrial assistance to be relevant, there must have been an agreement for parole before trial in order to support a Brady violation. In the absence of evidence of a pretrial agreement, there can be no Brady violation because no evidence was suppressed from the jury. Gollehon's claim for relief was denied. Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395, 56 St. Rep. 811 (1999), followed in St. v. Ellenburg, 2000 MT

232, 301 M 289, 8 P3d 801, 57 St. Rep. 958 (2000), and St. v. Johnson, 2005 MT 318, 329 M 497, 125 P3d 1096 (2005). See also Giglio v. U.S., 405 US 150, 766 L Ed 2d 104, 92 S Ct 763 (1972), Alderson v. Zant, 22 F3d 1541 (11th Cir. 1994), and Mills v. Singletary, 63 F3d 999 (11th Cir. 1995).

Admissibility of Booking Photograph Not Part of Reciprocal Discovery Package: McKeon contended that a booking photograph taken 2 days after commission of a robbery unfairly surprised him, allowing the prosecution an unfair advantage and prejudicing his case because the photograph was not part of the reciprocal discovery package and was produced only the day before trial. The Iowa state trooper who had arrested McKeon brought the photograph when he came to Montana to testify, and as soon as the prosecution became aware of the photograph, McKeon was notified. McKeon had based his mistaken identity defense on the fact that the witness description of a robbery suspect did not match his appearance at trial, but the booking photograph showed that the description was accurate at the time of the robbery. Absent a showing that the prosecution had intentionally withheld the photograph until immediately before trial, the Supreme Court held that the prosecution had complied with the spirit of the discovery rules. McKeon's decision to alter his appearance at trial from his described appearance at the time of the robbery was a strategic decision that failed, and admission of the booking photograph did not result in unfair prejudice. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Mandatory Disclosure Required: The state failed to turn over evidence of prior contact with defendant prior to trial but maintained that under St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230 (1988), there was no duty to disclose the types of information set out in 46-15-322 until the state actually developed exculpatory information. Clarifying Shaver, the Supreme Court found that while 46-15-322(1)(e) imposes a mandatory duty on the prosecution to disclose all material that might be generically referred to as exculpatory, subsections (1)(a) through (1)(d) and (2) contain no such limiting language. Under the plain language of those subsections, the prosecution is obligated to fully disclose all material and information listed that is within the prosecution's possession and control, whether inculpatory or exculpatory. It is not up to the state or its agents to decide the inculpatory or exculpatory nature of the material or information. That decision lies with the defendant. St. v. Licht, 266 M 123, 879 P2d 670, 51 St. Rep. 686 (1994).

Testimony Allowed Despite Failure to Disclose Diagnosis Before Trial — Sanctions Appropriate: A medical expert examined defendant before trial in order to determine defendant's mental state but neglected to include a diagnosis. The trial court correctly concluded that the state breached its duty to disclose as required by this section. Under 46-15-329, the court allowed the expert to testify but did not allow testimony as to the diagnosis. Defendant contended that he was effectively prevented from cross-examining the expert for fear of inadvertently bringing up the diagnosis and that cross-examination prohibited his right to address the discovery violation. The sanctions applied against the state were within the court's discretion because the actual testimony was no different from what was contemplated and defendant could point to no damage caused by the testimony. The court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the expert to testify after it was established that the state had failed to disclose the diagnosis before trial. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Reasonable Means by Defense Counsel to Obtain Comparable Evidence — No Prejudice in Allowing Testimony: On the morning of the trial, defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude the testimony of two witnesses because the prosecution failed to produce a copy of the written statement of one of the witnesses that was given to the Sheriff's office on the night of the incident. The witness stated that she had thrown away her copy, and no statement was ever produced. Defendant argued that allowing the testimony constituted prejudicial error. Following the standard for lost or destroyed evidence set out in St. v. Halter, 238 M 408, 777 P2d 1313 (1989), the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion in limine because defense counsel had other reasonable means to obtain comparable evidence during the 9 months prior to trial and had failed to allege the exculpatory value of the evidence or to show how the introduction of the written statement could have changed the outcome of the trial. St. v. West, 252 M 83, 826 P2d 940, 49 St. Rep. 170 (1992), followed in St. v. Sweet, 1998 MT 30, 287 M 336, 954 P2d 1133, 55 St. Rep. 110 (1998). See also St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 133, 294 M 509, 982 P2d 468, 56 St. Rep. 536 (1999).

Revised Transcript Provided on Day of Trial but Tape Accessible — No Prejudice: An audio tape of a drug transaction was admitted into evidence, but the written transcript of the tape contained errors in the identification of speakers, so neither that transcript nor a subsequently revised version, introduced on the day of trial, was admitted. Defendant maintained that changing the names on the transcript and not disclosing it until the day of trial violated the rules of discovery, resulting in prejudice. However, the Supreme Court found no prejudice because neither transcript was admitted as evidence and defendant's access to the best evidence, the tape itself, ruled out the possibility that defendant's case was substantially impaired. St. v. Moreno, 248 M 91, 809 P2d 574, 48 St. Rep. 339 (1991).

Statutes Ineffective Until Exculpatory Knowledge Gathered: Although 46-15-322 and this section require the state to disclose all pertinent information it may gather, and the duty to disclose is continuing, the statutes have no effect until the state actually develops the knowledge of a specific act, fact, or information that exculpates the defendant. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988), clarified in St. v. Licht, 266 M 123, 879 P2d 670, 51 St. Rep. 686 (1994).

46-15-328. Excision and protective orders.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is modeled after 1987 MCA 46-15-328. Subsection (1) amends the 1987 code and treats the protection of witness identities in the same manner as all other evidence. The statute does not retain the 1987 code's requirement that the identity of the witnesses be disclosed at least 5 days prior to trial. Under the statute, the protection and the extent of protection from disclosure is a matter fully within a court's discretion. The Commission felt it was unwise to continue the time restraints on this discretion that were present in the 1987 code. Compare subsection (1) and 1987 MCA 46-15-328(1). The remainder of the statute preserves the 1987 code with minor changes to conform to the revised statutory format.

1991 Amendment: In (1), before "disclosure", inserted "any" and after "disclosure" deleted "of the identity of any witness be deferred for any reasonable period of time, not to extend beyond 5 days prior to the date set for trial, or that any other disclosures required by 46-15-321 through 46-15-329 be denied"; in (1)(a), before "disclosure", inserted "unrestricted"; in (2) and (4), after "discoverable", deleted "under 46-15-321 through 46-15-329"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Constitutionality of Disclosure Statutes — Failure to Provide Psychiatric Reports — Defense of Mental Disease or Defect Precluded: Defendant was examined by a psychiatrist, and the trial court ordered submission of the medical report to the court. Following additional examination by three more psychiatrists or psychologists, defendant gave notice of the intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense, but the notice did not specify the names and addresses of persons defendant intended to call as witnesses to support his defense. The state moved for discovery of the names, addresses, and any statements or reports required to be disclosed under 46-15-323. Defense counsel refused to provide the information because disclosure could not be done without disclosing privileged or incriminating information. The trial court advised counsel that this section provides for protective orders and for excising privileged or incriminating information and ordered disclosure. The trial court ruled that nondisclosure precluded defendant's use of the mental disease or defect defense. Defense counsel appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the disclosure requirements were an unconstitutional violation of the right against self-incrimination under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court previously affirmed Montana's reciprocal discovery provisions against attack on the same constitutional grounds in State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987). In this case, the court noted that the discovery provisions allow a defendant to be examined by as many psychiatrists as desired and that only statements of those that are to be called as witnesses at trial need be disclosed. Further, as set out in Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), the attorney-client privilege extends only to the point of testimonial use of that communication. Defendant was advised but refused to avail himself of the protective order provisions of this section, and in doing so, the refusal to comply with constitutional statutory discovery provisions precluded the use of the mental disease or defect defense. St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

Defendant's Motion for Protective Order Denied: The defendant's counsel moved for a protective order to conceal the contents of a witness's testimony. The denial of the motion was affirmed on appeal on the basis that the defendant's attorney failed to show that the disclosure of the witness's identity would result in a risk of harm to the witness outweighing the usefulness of the testimony to either party. St. v. Rudolph, 238 M 135, 777 P2d 296, 46 St. Rep. 1150 (1989).

In Camera Ex Parte Inspection Constitutional: An in camera inspection of information conducted ex parte in the presence of opposing counsel does not violate defendant's right against self-incrimination. State ex rel. Carculis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604, 44 St. Rep. 1954 (1987).

46-15-329. Sanctions.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is chiefly a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-15-329, which describes the sanctions a court may impose for noncompliance with discovery. Subsection (3) provides that before a witness, party, or counsel may be held in contempt, an intentional violation must be shown.

Source: See source note under 46-15-322.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In introductory clause, in two places, substituted "this part" for "46-15-321 through 46-15-329"; and at end of (3) inserted "for an intentional violation".

Case Notes

Failure to Show Good Cause for Endorsing Expert Witness Five Days Before Trial — No Prejudice — Sanction Proper: Only 5 days before trial and more than 1 year after arraignment on criminal charges, DeMary moved to endorse an expert witness to rebut the state's expert. DeMary was aware of the state's expert at least 4 months before trial but failed to provide any explanation for waiting until 5 days before trial to seek endorsement. Although 46-15-323 allows a defendant to add witnesses more than 30 days after arraignment if good cause is shown, DeMary failed to demonstrate good cause for the tardiness of the motion, nor did he show that the state was prepared to address the expert's testimony. DeMary also failed to demonstrate prejudice in the disallowance of his expert's testimony because the state never called the witness that DeMary's proposed expert was to refute. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in sanctioning DeMary for failure to comply with 46-15-323 by disallowing the expert. St. v. DeMary, 2003 MT 307, 318 M 200, 79 P3d 817 (2003).

Nonprejudicial Preclusion of Expert Witness Not Violative of Right to Fair Trial or Effective Counsel: DeMary contended that the District Court's denial of a motion to endorse an expert witness 5 days before trial constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and denied DeMary's right to a fair trial. Under the Strickland test, a defendant must show that counsel's performance was deficient and that the performance prejudiced the defendant and deprived the defendant of a fair trial. However, DeMary failed to comply with 46-15-323 and failed to demonstrate prejudice in the disallowance of his expert's testimony because the state never called the witness that DeMary's proposed expert was to refute. Absent a showing of sufficient prejudice, DeMary could not show that the trial was unfair, and the assertion of ineffective assistance of counsel failed. St. v. DeMary, 2003 MT 307, 318 M 200, 79 P3d 817 (2003).

Refusal to Impose Sanctions for Discovery Violations Affirmed Absent Prejudice or Surprise: Golder argued in a motion in limine and in briefs that the timing of the state's formal disclosure of two witnesses and the nature of their testimony constituted unfair surprise and jeopardized his right to a fair trial. The District Court held that Golder had sufficient notice and denied any sanctions for discovery abuse. The court had ordered disclosure of the materials requested, and that order was ultimately complied with. The refusal to impose sanctions for discovery violations is within the court's discretion. The Supreme Court examined the record and affirmed, finding that any noncompliance with discovery orders was not willful and that no prejudice resulted. St. v. Golder, 2000 MT 239, 301 M 368, 9 P3d 635, 57 St. Rep. 999 (2000), following St. v. Waters, 228 M 490, 743 P2d 617 (1987).

Constitutional Right to Present Witnesses to Be Considered in Applying Sanction for Untimely Disclosure of Witnesses: Dezeeuw was charged by information with aggravated assault. His counsel failed to timely disclose witnesses and, as a result, was sanctioned by the District Court when the court refused to allow the testimony of one of Dezeeuw's witnesses who was an eye witness to the assault. The Supreme Court held that in determining whether the District Court abused its discretion in applying the severest of sanctions, Dezeeuw's right under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., to present witnesses in his behalf must be taken into consideration. The Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in applying the severest sanction, that Dezeeuw was prejudiced by the exclusion of his witness's testimony, and that Dezeeuw should therefore be given a new trial. St. v. Dezeeuw, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Exclusion of Witnesses Constituting Abuse of Discretion — Harmless Error: Berg's counsel failed to previously disclose witnesses by timely filing a witness list with the District Court pursuant to 46-15-323. The court imposed the harshest sanction available by excluding Berg's witnesses, and Berg contended that he was entitled to a new trial because the court erred by excluding his witnesses. Berg's failure to disclose was not willful, nor would the state have been unduly prejudiced or surprised by Berg's noncompliance because the witnesses were known to the state, being among the same witnesses that the state intended to call. Thus, the District Court abused its discretion in imposing such a harsh sanction, and a less severe sanction should have been imposed. However, the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was not so prejudicial that Berg was deprived of a fair trial. The jury was provided with the essence of the witnesses' testimony through the cross-examination of one of the state's witnesses, so the exclusion of Berg's witnesses was harmless error. St. v. Berg, 1999 MT 282, 296 M 546, 991 P2d 428, 56 St. Rep. 1138 (1999), followed in St. v. Dezeeuw, 1999 MT 331, 297 M 379, 992 P2d 1276, 56 St. Rep. 1323 (1999).

Failure to Notify of Intent to Introduce Character Evidence — Testimony Precluded: After indicating in an omnibus hearing memorandum that he did not intend to introduce character evidence at his criminal trial, Root nevertheless sought to allow a witness to testify regarding his good character and reputation for nonviolence. The trial court may exercise its discretion to preclude certain testimony if the defendant fails to disclose the intent to introduce character evidence. Because Root failed to disclose that the witness would provide character evidence, as required in 46-15-323, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in prohibiting it. St. v. Root, 1999 MT 203, 296 M 1, 987 P2d 1140, 56 St. Rep. 792 (1999). See also St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439 (1990).

Mistrial Correctly Denied for Alleged Coaching of Witness: Rendon was convicted of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of Melanie's son. Rendon alleged that at trial, during the son's testimony, the son was coached by a person in the audience to answer "yes" or "no" to questions from the prosecution. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly denied a motion for mistrial because the District Court was in the best position to determine whether coaching of the witness had occurred. St. v. Rendon, 273 M 303, 903 P2d 183, 52 St. Rep. 985 (1995).

Failure to Comply With Disclosure Requirements of Disclosure Order — Sanctions Appropriate: Under 46-15-323, a defendant is required to provide the prosecution written notice of certain defenses within 30 days after arraignment and to simultaneously make available to the state the names and addresses of experts whom defendant intends to call at trial, together with reports and statements generated by those experts in connection with the case. Because of defendant's late notice of the intention to call an expert and to provide any written report or resume from the witness, the state was precluded from effectively meeting the proposed expert testimony. It was within the discretion and flexibility of the District Court to sanction defendant under this section by prohibiting the expert from testifying. St. v. Haskins, 269 M 202, 887 P2d 1189, 51 St. Rep. 1474 (1994).

Constitutionality of Disclosure Statutes — Failure to Provide Psychiatric Reports — Defense of Mental Disease or Defect Precluded: Defendant was examined by a psychiatrist, and the trial court ordered submission of the medical report to the court. Following additional examination by three more psychiatrists or psychologists, defendant gave notice of the intention to rely on mental disease or defect as a defense, but the notice did not specify the names and addresses of persons defendant intended to call as witnesses to support his defense. The state moved for discovery of the names, addresses, and any statements or reports required to be disclosed under 46-15-323. Defense counsel refused to provide the information because disclosure could not be done without disclosing privileged or incriminating information. The trial court advised counsel that 46-15-328 provides for protective orders and for excising privileged or incriminating information and ordered disclosure. The trial court ruled that nondisclosure precluded defendant's use of the mental disease or defect defense. Defense counsel appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the disclosure requirements were an unconstitutional violation of the right against self-incrimination under the federal and state constitutions. The Supreme Court previously affirmed Montana's reciprocal discovery provisions against attack on the same constitutional grounds in State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987). In this case, the court noted that the discovery provisions allow a defendant to be examined by as many psychiatrists as desired and that only statements of those that are to be called as witnesses at trial need be disclosed. Further, as set out in Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990), the attorney-client privilege extends only to the point of testimonial use of that communication. Defendant was advised but refused to avail himself of the protective order provisions of 46-15-328, and in doing so, the refusal to comply with constitutional statutory discovery provisions precluded the use of the mental disease or defect defense. St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994).

Constitutionality of Sanction Provisions: This section is consistent with the goal of reciprocal discovery to enhance the search for truth. Once it is determined that reciprocal pretrial disclosures subject to constitutional or statutory limitations are permissible, the District Court may exercise its discretion in enforcing those permissible disclosures. St. v. Davidson, 266 M 404, 880 P2d 1331, 51 St. Rep. 867 (1994), following State ex rel. Carkulis v. District Court, 229 M 265, 746 P2d 604 (1987).

Violation of Protective Order by Use of Term "Victim" — Voir Dire — Mistrial Not Warranted: Dixon was charged with rape of H.D. During voir dire of the jury, the prosecutor commented on a question asked by the defense counsel, saying that the question was very inappropriate for the defense to ask. Later, after the District Court had granted a defense motion in limine to prohibit the prosecution from using the word "victim", the prosecutor referred to H.D. as a "female rape victim". The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly refused the defense request for a mistrial in both instances, saying that the prosecutor's comments were insignificant when viewed in the context of the entire record. The District Court had instructed the jury to consider only the evidence and not to use the prosecutor's comments as evidence. St. v. Dixon, 264 M 38, 869 P2d 779, 51 St. Rep. 135 (1994).

Standard for Review of Denial of Mistrial: The standard for review of denial of a motion for a mistrial is whether there is clear and convincing evidence that the trial judge's ruling was erroneous, whether there is a manifest necessity to declare a mistrial, and whether defendant was denied a fair trial. St. v. Greytak, 262 M 401, 865 P2d 1096, 50 St. Rep. 1610 (1993), followed in St. v. Rendon, 273 M 303, 903 P2d 183, 52 St. Rep. 985 (1995), and St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998). See also St. v. Novak, 2005 MT 294, 329 M 309, 124 P3d 182 (2005).

Testimony Allowed Despite Failure to Disclose Diagnosis Before Trial — Sanctions Appropriate: A medical expert examined defendant before trial in order to determine defendant's mental state but neglected to include a diagnosis. The trial court correctly concluded that the state breached its duty to disclose as required by 46-15-327. Under this section, the court allowed the expert to testify but did not allow testimony as to the diagnosis. Defendant contended that he was effectively prevented from cross-examining the expert for fear of inadvertently bringing up the diagnosis and that cross-examination prohibited his right to address the discovery violation. The sanctions applied against the state were within the court's discretion because the actual testimony was no different from what was contemplated and defendant could point to no damage caused by the testimony. The court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the expert to testify after it was established that the state had failed to disclose the diagnosis before trial. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Refusal to Allow Discovery in Criminal Case — Due Process and Standard of Proof — Contempt Upheld: Petitioner, a Yellowstone County Deputy Attorney, was ordered by the District Court in an omnibus hearing to allow discovery of the state witnesses and any written statements they had made. At the time of the hearing, petitioner knew of the existence of a 70-page statement by a drug informant but did not disclose it to the court or to the defendant in a criminal case because petitioner believed it to be "intelligence information" since the affidavit did not mention the defendant in the criminal case by name. Petitioner was held in contempt for failing to turn over the affidavit and petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari. The Supreme Court noted that at the District Court hearing on the contempt charge, while the petitioner's supervisors testified that they believed the decision of whether the affidavit was relevant and should therefore be turned over to defense counsel should be made by the District Court, petitioner testified that that decision was for her to make. The Supreme Court also held that petitioner received due process in the form of a show cause hearing and that the standard of proof applicable to the District Court's finding of contempt required the affirmance of that finding unless it was not supported by substantial evidence. Because the Supreme Court found substantial evidence in the transcripts that petitioner refused to recognize the District Court's authority, the Supreme Court affirmed the findings and conclusions and refused to issue the writ. State ex rel. O'Connor v. District Court, 245 M 88, 799 P2d 1056, 47 St. Rep. 1844 (1990).

Claim of Bias Against Defense Counsel — Right to Fair Trial Not Affected: Defendant claimed he was denied a fair trial because of judicial bias against defense counsel. However, his right to a fair trial was not adversely affected when: (1) the trial court acted within its statutory power under this section; (2) comments made by the judge were done outside the presence of the jury; and (3) adverse rulings against defense counsel were simply proper compliance with Montana law. St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230, 45 St. Rep. 1617 (1988).

Sanctions Discretionary: This section provides a means of enforcing discovery orders by endowing the District Court with flexibility to impose sanctions commensurate with failure to comply with discovery orders. The section does not mandate automatic exclusion for noncompliance. Imposition of sanctions is left to the sound discretion of the District Court, allowing the court to consider why disclosure was not made, whether the noncompliance was willful, the amount of prejudice to the opposing party, and any other relevant circumstances. Absent abuse of this discretion, the court's decision must be upheld. St. v. Waters, 228 M 490, 743 P2d 617, 44 St. Rep. 1705 (1987), followed in St. v. Van Voast, 247 M 194, 805 P2d 1380, 48 St. Rep. 160 (1991), and St. v. Golder, 2000 MT 239, 301 M 368, 9 P3d 635, 57 St. Rep. 999 (2000). See also St. v. 46-15-330. Investigation not to be impeded.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute adopts a provision from the uniform rules that expressly states the understanding that a party may not interfere with another's investigation of a case. See Rule 412, Unif. R. Crim. P. (1974). The statute is adopted as a clear statement of a previously unwritten rule.

46-15-331. Compelling testimony or production of evidence — immunity.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is modeled after 1987 MCA 46-15-331. The statute governs the practice of compelling testimony and provides for immunity associated with such testimony.

The 1987 code's allowance that a Supreme Court Justice may order testimony or grant immunity has not been continued. The Commission felt that such discretion should remain with the court in which the trial is pending. The statute has been reworded and amended to clarify that testimony of incriminating information may not be compelled without a grant of, at a minimum, use immunity.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: In (1), near beginning, substituted "judge of the district or municipal court" for "justice of the supreme court or judge of the district court" and at end inserted "following a grant of immunity"; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: In second sentence, after "proceeding", substituted "no compelled testimony or evidence or any information directly or indirectly derived from such testimony or evidence may be used against the witness in any criminal prosecution. Nothing in this section prohibits a prosecutor from granting immunity from prosecution for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which a witness is compelled to testify if the prosecutor determines, in his sole discretion, that the ends of justice would be served thereby. Immunity may not extend to prosecution or punishment for false statements given in any testimony required under this section" for "he cannot be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture, other than a prosecution or action for perjury or contempt, for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he testified or produced evidence".

Type of Immunity Changed in 1983: The 1983 amendment changed "transactional immunity", under which the person testifying cannot be prosecuted for any transaction or matter that he testified about, to "use and derivative use immunity" (the federal courts' rule), under which neither the compelled testimony or evidence, nor any information derived from it, may be used against the person in any criminal prosecution. The critical result is that the person may now be prosecuted for an offense he was compelled to testify about, but the testimony and information derived from it may not be used against him.

Case Notes

Information Gained Through State Transactional Immunity Deal Usable in Federal Sentencing: Information revealed by defendants to the state under a grant of transactional immunity, in connection with an incident unrelated to the instant federal convictions, could be used by the federal court at sentencing. The immunity agreement did not compel self-incrimination. Statements were not given pursuant to a subpoena or other compulsory process, defendants were not constrained to accept the state's offer of immunity, and no evidence indicated that defendants' invocation of privilege would have resulted in negative consequences. U.S. v. Camp, 72 F3d 759 (1995).

Limited Agreement Not to Prosecute for Deviate Sexual Conduct — Not Grant of Statutory Immunity — Independently Derived Evidence Applicable: The Jefferson County Attorney contractually agreed not to prosecute Myrhow for criminal acts related to an investigation of deviate sexual conduct by Marks, of which Myrhow had knowledge. However, until other incidents came to light as part of a separate investigation, Myrhow at no time related that he was involved in other unrelated incidents of deviate sexual conduct, including an incident committed prior to the contractual agreement. Myrhow contended that the immunity granted for his information regarding Marks's conduct also extended to his own conduct. The District Court properly found that Myrhow had been granted de facto immunity from prosecution for acts directly related to the Marks investigation, but that immunity was a limited, contractual, transactional immunity arising solely from the agreement not to prosecute, rather than from this section. The statutory immunity provided by this section did not apply because that immunity is granted only when a witness is compelled to testify by court order, a circumstance inapplicable to this case. Because the evidence used to convict Myrhow was derived independently of the Marks investigation and independently of any immunized evidence Myrhow provided through his agreement with the County Attorney, the District Court correctly convicted Myrhow for deviate sexual conduct committed prior to the immunity agreement. St. v. Myrhow, 262 M 229, 865 P2d 231, 50 St. Rep. 1528 (1993).

Grant of Immunity Within Discretion of Court: It is within the discretion of the District Court whether to grant immunity to witnesses. When almost no information was given to the court regarding witnesses' testimony, the court did not abuse its discretion by stating that it would not compel incriminating testimony rather than grant immunity. St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992).

Denial of Request for Continuance Upon Grant of Witness Immunity: On the third day of trial, a prosecution witness was granted immunity in exchange for testimony at trial. Defense counsel sought but was denied a continuance to prepare for cross-examination of the witness, later alleging prejudice because the continuance was denied. The trial court did provide a pause in the proceedings to allow for examination of the immunity agreements. If anything, the grant of immunity was an aid to the defense because defense counsel was subsequently able to fully examine the witness on cross-examination. St. v. Briner, 253 M 158, 831 P2d 1365, 49 St. Rep. 402 (1992).

Refusal of Immunity to Witness Invoking Fifth Amendment Privilege — Violation of Right of Confrontation: Defendant appealed his conviction of aggravated assault, contending that the District Court violated his right of confrontation by refusing to grant immunity to a witness to the assault who, following interrogation, invoked his fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination before the defense counsel had completed full cross-examination. In reversing the conviction and remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that because evidence relating to the assault, including statements about who instigated the fight and who fired the rifle, were in conflict, full examination was a critical aspect of the defendant's right of confrontation. St. v. Young, 249 M 257, 815 P2d 590, 48 St. Rep. 696 (1991).

Pretrial Depositions of Accomplices Properly Denied: The grant of an order pursuant to this section is discretionary with the court. In line with most jurisdictions, Montana law does not specifically authorize pretrial discovery depositions in criminal cases. The rationale is that the prior recorded statements of prosecution witnesses afford an alternative discovery source. Absent any showing of prejudice to defendant, the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's denial of a motion for pretrial depositions of accomplices. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Misrepresentation of Statute by Prosecutor — Not Prosecutorial Misconduct or Suppression of Evidence: Defendant claimed that the prosecution misrepresented the immunity statute to the court in an effort to prevent testimony by a witness, which amounted to a suppression of evidence. The Supreme Court found the prosecutor was incorrect in his interpretation, due to a statutory amendment, but that neither the court nor defense counsel was aware of the amendment either; therefore, the innocent misstatement of the law did not rise to the level of a knowing, bad faith scheme or action constituting misconduct. St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987).

Fundamental Fairness Required: Defendant was charged with sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). Defendant contended he had been entrapped because a paid informer had used persistent and harassing techniques over a period of a month and a half to induce defendant to obtain drugs for him. Defendant wished to present the testimony of Worley to show the informant's techniques. Worley claimed his United States Constitution fifth amendment right against self-incrimination and refused to answer questions regarding his connection with the informant. The trial court refused to grant Worley immunity and ruled his testimony irrelevant and immaterial. Defendant also attempted to use the testimony of Surman to show that the informant had used similar techniques before. The trial court ruled the testimony immaterial and irrelevant to the defense of entrapment. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the testimony was relevant and admissible. The case was remanded for a new trial because defendant was denied his right to present a full and meaningful defense. The court analogized to Rule 404, Montana Rules of Evidence, which allows the introduction of evidence of other crimes in certain circumstances. The court held that fundamental fairness requires that the principle behind the rule must be equally available to show a plan or method of operation by a state informant. St. v. Chapman, 209 M 57, 679 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 550 (1984).

Production of Evidence Not Requested in District Court — No Supreme Court Review: Defendant pleaded guilty to two counts of sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). In a sentence appeal, he claimed that the State had failed to produce an exculpatory tape recording allegedly made of a conversation which took place in a motel during a drug transaction. The Supreme Court found that the record indicated that there was no such tape recording. The court further stated that since there was no indication that the defendant had made a written motion pursuant to 46-15-302 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329) or 46-15-311 (renumbered 46-15-331 in 1985) to require production of the tape, the issue was not properly before the appellate court. St. v. Baker, 205 M 244, 667 P2d 416, 40 St. Rep. 1244 (1983).

Immunity Agreement Versus Plea Bargain: The Supreme Court held that there was sufficient evidence of record to support the finding of the District Court that there existed no oral immunity agreement between the appellant and the State and that the agreement made was actually a plea bargain, which was fully honored. St. v. Evans, 178 M 96, 582 P2d 1211 (1978).

Remedy for State's Failure to Comply With Discovery Motions: The defendant waived the right to challenge an alleged failure of the prosecution to comply with the defendant's discovery motions by not objecting to the introduction of statements but rather moving to strike them only after completing cross-examination of the prosecution's last witness. St. v. Cripps, 177 M 410, 582 P2d 312 (1978).

What Constitutes Judicial Proceeding:

Transactional immunity from prosecution provisions of 46-15-311 (renumbered 46-15-331 in 1985) apply to proceedings before grand juries because the grand jury is a judicial inquisitorial body. Kelly v. Grand Jury, 170 M 284, 552 P2d 1399 (1976). [See compiler's comment under this section on 1983 immunity change.]

A person refusing to testify as required by this section is subject to contempt notwithstanding the fact that the question was asked for investigatory purposes. The term "judicial proceeding" encompasses every proceeding before a competent court. St. v. Lambert, 167 M 406, 538 P2d 1351 (1975).

Pretrial Interview of State's Witness: No obligation exists on the part of a State's witness to allow the defense counsel to interview her prior to trial when the defense counsel did not take her deposition, cross-examine her at trial, or call her as a witness in their case. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389 (1975).

Proof of Unwillingness of Witness: An affidavit showing that a witness had not answered the defendant's mailed request to contact his attorney to arrange for an interview did not sufficiently establish the witness's unwillingness to provide information so as to require a court-ordered deposition. St. v. Dunn, 155 M 319, 472 P2d 288 (1970).

Accused's Rights — State Requiring Witness's Statement: The accused's rights were not violated on the theory that a witness was intimidated into giving damaging testimony by the County Attorney's threat of holding the witness unless she gave a statement. Petition of Gallagher, 150 M 476, 436 P2d 530 (1968).

Case Notes

Records of Hospital Medical Staff Committee Held Privileged — No Waiver Found in Administrator's Affidavit: Plaintiff sought to discover documents from a hospital medical staff committee supporting his theory that because of conditions placed upon the staff privileges of a physician previously suspended for performing his hospital duties while intoxicated, the relationship between the hospital and the physician changed from independent contractor to principal and agent. On appeal from a District Court order quashing a deposition subpoena and giving summary judgment to the defendant, the Supreme Court affirmed that the members of the hospital's medical staff committee were immune from subpoena. The Supreme Court held that 50-16-203 applies to all members of the hospital's committee, to the hospital itself, and to patients whose files are reviewed by a committee and that even if the hospital had waived its privilege, it could not waive the privilege personal to the members of the committee. The Supreme Court also held that there was no issue as to the discoverable nature of the hospital administrator's files because there was no evidence in the record of any attempt to subpoena his files. Sistok v. Kalispell Regional Hosp., 251 M 38, 823 P2d 251, 48 St. Rep. 1151 (1991), distinguished in Huether v. District Court, 2000 MT 158, 300 M 212, 4 P3d 1193, 57 St. Rep. 647 (2000), and overruled to the extent that Sistok may not be read to apply to a hospital patient seeking disclosure of information concerning that patient's care or treatment.

Part Case Notes

Videotape — "Best Evidence" of Transcript: Defendant was charged with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and sexual intercourse without consent. The alleged victim was a 4-year-old who had been left in his care for several days. The child was determined to be competent and allowed to testify. A police officer who had interviewed and videotaped the child recounted portions of the videotaped interview. In an effort to refresh the officer's memory, defense counsel read from the transcript of the interview. Later, in an apparent effort to discredit the child's testimony, defense counsel again read from the transcript. Over objection by the prosecution, defense counsel entered the transcript into evidence. Subsequently, the prosecution offered the videotape as the best evidence of the transcript. The videotape was admitted and shown to the jury. Defense counsel contended this was error as he was not present to confront and cross-examine the child at the taping. The court held that 46-15-401 (now repealed) and 46-15-402 apply only when videotaped testimony will be used in lieu of testimony by the witness at trial. Here, the child testified at trial. Once the transcript was admitted, it was within the province of the trial court to admit what it considered a more accurate version of the same thing under the "best evidence" rule. St. v. Rogers, 213 M 302, 692 P2d 2, 41 St. Rep. 2131 (1984).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts: The trial court did not commit error in admitting prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony of prior uncharged sexual assaults by prosecutrix's stepfather for the limited purpose of showing plan, scheme, or design, as there was no showing of substantial prejudice to the defendant by admitting such evidence. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), following St. v. Jensen, 153 M 233, 455 P2d 631 (1969), and clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

2005 Amendment: Chapter 504 inserted (2) requiring the office of restorative justice to pay for the medical examination of a victim of an alleged incident of sexual intercourse without consent, sexual assault, or incest if the cost is not the responsibility of a local law enforcement agency and funds are available; in (3) after "agency" inserted "or the state"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 186 in (1), near beginning after "consent", inserted "sexual assault, or incest", near middle, after "alleged", substituted "offense" for "sexual intercourse without consent", after "agency" substituted "or" for "and", and near end, after "prosecution", inserted "or resolution"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 1997.

Attorney General's Opinions

Clarification of What Entity Responsible for Costs: The county is to bear the expenses of the medical examination if the alleged crime occurred within the county's jurisdiction and the examination is directed by the county. By contrast, if a city law enforcement agency directs that the examination be conducted and the alleged crime occurred within the city's jurisdiction, the city is to bear the costs of the examination. Although general costs associated with prosecution of felonies are to be paid by counties, this section concerns a special area of criminal law and represents an exception to the conclusion in 38 A.G. Op. 77 (1980), concerning general costs. 40 A.G. Op. 66 (1984).

CHAPTER 16
TRIAL

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Part 1
General Provisions

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part embodies the statutes concerning jury selection for criminal cases. The statutes are generally a restatement of the 1987 code and are intended to govern practice in both District Court and lower courts. See 1987 MCA Title 46, ch. 16, part 3. Minor amendments have been made to reflect case law and to maintain conformity with the statute format.

A defendant's right to be present at criminal proceedings is derived from the constitutional right to confront adverse witnesses in criminal cases. See Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. Several 1987 code sections addressed the defendant's right to be present at various phases of a criminal prosecution. See 1987 MCA 46-12-103 and 46-16-502. These generally stated provisions have been condensed into a single statute.

The statutes are modeled after the California Rules of Criminal Procedure (1986)—chiefly, Rules 977 and 1043. The rules are compatible with the federal rules. See Rule 43, Fed. R. Crim. P. (1986).

Part Case Notes

Shackling of Defendant at Trial to Ensure Security of Courtroom — No Due Process Violation: At Herrick's attempted deliberate homicide trial, the trial court agreed to provide additional security measures, including leg shackles, reasoning that the jury was not likely to see the shackles while Herrick was seated. Following conviction, Herrick appealed on grounds that the use of shackles violated his due process right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution entitles a criminal defendant to appear before a jury free of shackles and other physical restraints and concluded that the Montana Constitution does not provide more protection with regard to shackling than the U.S. Constitution. However, that right is not absolute, and a trial judge's decision to shackle a defendant is not unconstitutional per se (see Morgan v. Bunnell, 24 F3d 49 (9th Cir. 1994)). The Supreme Court adopted the two-part test in Morgan for determining whether a trial court has abused its discretion in restraining a defendant at trial. Under that test, the trial court must be persuaded by compelling circumstances that some measure is needed to maintain the security of the courtroom and must pursue less restrictive alternatives before imposing physical restraints. In this case, the trial court satisfied both parts of the test. The facts presented compelling circumstances to support the court's exercise of its broad discretion in determining that additional security was necessary, and the court took great care to prevent the jury from being aware that Herrick's ankles were shackled. Nothing indicated that the jury saw the leg restraints at any time, so Herrick's rights to individual dignity, a fair trial, and due process were not violated. St. v. Herrick, 2004 MT 323, 324 M 76, 101 P3d 755 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Finch, 975 P2d 967 (Wash. 1999). See also Ill. v. Allen, 397 US 337 (1970), followed in St. v. Merrill, 2008 MT 143, 343 M 130, 183 P3d 56 (2008), to the extent that keeping a defendant shackled during trial without establishing compelling circumstances for security measures constitutes a violation of the defendant's constitutional due process rights.

Conclusive Presumption: Under 46-16-107 (now repealed) there is a conclusive presumption that the defendant was present at all stages of the proceedings unless the record affirmatively shows the contrary. Petition of Eldiwitw, 153 M 468, 457 P2d 909 (1969).

Extent of Right to Be Present: A defendant's constitutional and statutory right to be present at his trial does not encompass proceedings before the court involving matters of law. The right is violated only if the defendant is prevented from being personally present when the jury is hearing his cause or if he is prevented from attending such other proceedings where his presence is essential to a fair and just determination of a substantial issue. St. v. Peters, 146 M 188, 405 P2d 642 (1965).

What Is Not Considered Part of Trial:

A section (now repealed) required the personal presence of the defendant at the trial in felony cases. After the jury had retired to the jury room for deliberation of its verdict, the jury members requested that certain exhibits, consisting of a gun, a pair of shoes, and other articles found in the defendant's room, be sent to them. While the defendant was not present in the courtroom, his counsel gave his consent. The court held that the proceeding did not constitute a part of the trial and therefore the defendant's presence was not required. St. v. Olson, 87 M 389, 287 P 938 (1930).

Since the settlement of instructions was not part of the "trial" within the meaning of a former section (now repealed), the absence of one charged with a felony during such settlement does not constitute reversible error. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

No Waiver: One charged with crime cannot waive his right to be present at his trial. St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922).

Court's Power: The District Court was vested with the power of appointment of some attorney in any criminal case when the emergency contemplated by a former section (now repealed) arose, and the power of removal when a disqualification of the attorney appointed appeared appropriate. While the court would usually choose someone from among the local attorneys, it was not required to do so. State ex rel. McGrade v. District Court, 52 M 371, 157 P 1157 (1916).

Commission Comments

The purpose of this provision is to provide a general format for proceeding. It is intended to avoid the felony-misdemeanor confusion in the District Court. This section is applicable to the trial de novo of misdemeanor cases that have been appealed to the District Court.

The clerk should keep a calendar of all criminal actions pending in the court, enumerating them according to the date of the filing of the indictment or information, specifying opposite the title of each action whether it is for a felony or a misdemeanor, and whether the defendant is in custody or on bail.

Case Notes

Prejudicial Delay of Trial: The rights of an accused convict, who was held in maximum security without counsel for a period of 4 months and whose trial was held 7 months after his motion for a speedy trial (during which time many of his witnesses disappeared), were severely prejudiced, and upon appeal the conviction and sentence were vacated with prejudice. Additional Instruction to Jury: It was not error for the trial judge to send an additional instruction to the jury after it had been unable to reach a verdict because the judge did not direct the jury to enter a finding of guilty or not guilty. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Expert — Duty to Determine Qualifications — Relevance of Degree of Qualifications: Whether a witness is an expert is largely within the discretion of the trial judge. Defendant objected that a witness was not qualified. The trial judge said: "The court is going to permit her to testify. If the jury doesn't believe she is qualified—well, that will be up to the jury to decide". The judge did not leave to the jury the decision whether the witness was qualified. He made that decision when he permitted the testimony and then stated that the jury could determine the degree of the qualifications. The degree of qualification affects the weight, not the admissibility, of the testimony. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985), followed in St. v. Martin, 226 M 463, 736 P2d 477, 44 St. Rep. 804 (1987).

Any Evidence Consistent With Theory of Innocence — Jury Not Bound to Acquit: Because of the presumption of innocence, the defendant contended that the jury must accept his interpretation of facts in a criminal trial when testimony at trial could reasonably be interpreted to support either the State's or defendant's view. A jury is not bound to accept defendant's view and reject State's view simply because the defendant would be found not guilty under the former and guilty under the latter. It is the duty of the jury to resolve conflicts of evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Criminal Mental State — Jury Question: Whether a defendant acted with the requisite mental state is a question for the jury, and because a state of mind is rarely susceptible of direct or positive proof, it must usually be inferred from the facts testified to by witnesses and the circumstances as developed by the evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Credibility of Witnesses — Jury Issue: Defendant was convicted, after a jury trial, of felony theft. The District Judge denied defendant's motion for a new trial, ruling that although the judge himself had some personal doubts about the case, the jury had apparently determined that there was sufficient credible evidence to convict the defendant. The Supreme Court affirmed, stating that the trial court was correct in its interpretation of the rule of a judge in a criminal jury trial. St. v. Hall, 203 M 528, 662 P2d 1306, 40 St. Rep. 621 (1983).

Determination of Questions of Law: At the close of evidence in a misdemeanor assault nonjury trial, the court raised the defense of justifiable use of force sua sponte. Although 46-15-301 (repealed in 1985 and replaced with 46-15-321 [now repealed] through 46-15-329) requires that defendant give notice of his intent to rely on such a defense, the trial court also has the authority to raise the defense. The power of the trial court to resolve questions of law necessarily includes the power to determine what the questions of law are. St. v. Nicholls, 200 M 144, 649 P2d 1346, 39 St. Rep. 1635 (1982).

Oral Statement by Judge Not a Finding of Fact: At the close of evidence in a misdemeanor assault nonjury trial, the court made an oral statement that the defendant could have and did hit the victim. The court then requested briefs on the issue of justification. A month later the court vacated its factual finding and dismissed the charge. Because the court was still in the process of its judicial determination of facts and law when it made the oral statement, it could properly vacate its statement. St. v. Nicholls, 200 M 144, 649 P2d 1346, 39 St. Rep. 1635 (1982).

Waiver of Jury Trial When Only Questions of Law Raised: Where defendant raised only legal questions in his challenge to the constitutionality of 61-3-301, his waiver of jury trial was effective regardless of whether or not the judge told him that only legal questions were involved and that the judge alone decided legal questions, since only the court can decide questions of law. St. v. Turk, 197 M 311, 643 P2d 224, 39 St. Rep. 584 (1982).

Jury to Determine Intent: Under former law, a defendant charged with larceny by a bailee who had created a fiduciary obligation when he acted on behalf of his clients was estopped from asserting as a defense that he harbored the felonious intent prior to the creation of the fiduciary relationship, thereby arguing that the State had failed to prove the element of intent set out in the statute. Furthermore, intent is a question for the jury, which was resolved against the defendant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Instructions When Facts Weak: The trial court was bound to instruct the jury on manslaughter, despite the fact that the court may have considered the evidence in support of manslaughter weak and inconclusive, since the weight to be given the evidence was a question for the jury. St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973).

Erroneous Directed Verdict — Conflicting Evidence: In a prosecution for unlawfully driving a truck with an overload, which is a misdemeanor, it was error for the court to instruct and direct the jury to return a verdict of guilty when the evidence as to the true weight of the truck was in conflict as shown by two different state police scales. St. v. Baillargeron, 126 M 310, 249 P2d 799 (1952).

Jury Disregarding Law: The jury has the power to disregard the law as declared and acquit the defendant, however convincing the evidence may be, and the court has no power to punish it for such conduct. St. v. Koch, 33 M 490, 85 P 272 (1906).

Case Notes

Testimony by Accused: The defendant, who voluntarily testified that he had shot the victim (but only in self-defense), could not on appeal argue that he had been compelled to testify in order to correct errors presented by the prosecution. St. v. Grady, 166 M 168, 531 P2d 681 (1975).

Issue of Prior Convictions:

The bar to a prosecution for misdemeanor where defendant is not brought to trial within time allowed may properly be raised by a plea of not guilty. St. v. Porter, 130 M 299, 300 P2d 952 (1956).

The plea of not guilty of the offense charged in the information puts in issue allegations of prior convictions, as well the other allegations therein contained, and there is no merit in the contention that, since the defendant never pleaded to the charge of prior convictions, no issue was raised as to that allegation. St. v. Gordon, 35 M 458, 90 P 173 (1907).

Plea Applied to Information as a Whole: When the defendant was charged with liquor violations in four counts and entered a plea of not guilty "to the offense charged", he was held to have pleaded to the information as a whole. St. v. Grasswick, 77 M 326, 250 P 613 (1926).

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38 section 115-2. Kentucky Rules of Criminal Procedure, 8.10; R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6803.

Subsection (1) is consistent with the present law, which provides that a plea of guilty by the defendant must be entered in open court.

Subsection (1) is designed to prevent the defendant from pleading guilty without knowledge of the consequences of such a plea.

Subsection [(2)] is similar to the present law. The only change from the present law is that a plea of guilty may be allowed to be withdrawn before or after judgment. The present law provides for withdrawal before judgment only. In State ex rel. Foot v. District Court (81 Mont. 495), the Montana Supreme Court held that even though R.C.M. 1947, section 94-6803 [repealed], expressly states that the motion to withdraw a guilty plea shall be made before judgment, a court may consider the motion after judgment.

The burden is placed on the defendant to show by affidavits or by oral testimony that withdrawal of his plea should be allowed (State v. McAllister, 96 Mont. [348]). As was stated in State v. Nance (120 Mont. 152), no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to what showing the defendant must make to move the court but each case must depend on its own facts and circumstances.

A change of plea should ordinarily be permitted if it fairly appears that the defendant was in ignorance of his rights and of the consequences of his act, if influenced unduly and improperly either by hope or by fear in making it, or if it appears that the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension (See State v. Nichols, 46 Mont. 470, 128 P. 543; State ex rel. Foot, 81 Mont. 495, 263 P. 979). In determining if sufficient showing has been made, a factor that should be given substantial consideration is whether the defendant appeared without counsel at the time of the plea.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 222 in (3) in first sentence near beginning after "section" deleted "in cases in which the defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense", near middle after "to be" deleted "observed and", and after "present" inserted "and allowing the party speaking to be seen" and in second sentence at end inserted "and has informed the defendant that the defendant has the right to object to its use"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective July 1, 2005.

2003 Amendments — Composite Section: Chapter 96 in (1) near beginning after "nolo contendere" substituted "must" for "may". Amendment effective March 24, 2003.

Chapter 346 in (2) near beginning of introductory clause after "before" deleted "or after", after "judgment" inserted "or, except when a claim of innocence is supported by evidence of a fundamental miscarriage of justice, within 1 year after judgment becomes final", and inserted last sentence and (2)(a) through (2)(c) concerning when a judgment becomes final for purposes of subsection (2). Amendment effective July 1, 2003.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 96, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, in State v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 Mont. 172, 36 P.3d 922 (2001), the Montana Supreme Court held that in section 46-16-105, MCA, when the term "may" is used to confer power on an officer, court, or tribunal and the public or a third person has an interest in the exercise of the power, then the exercise of the power becomes imperative."

Applicability: Section 3, Ch. 346, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to all offenders who plead guilty on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective July 1, 2003.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 throughout section after "plea of guilty" inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 163 in (1)(a), at beginning, inserted "subject to the provisions of subsection (3)"; inserted (3) regarding the acceptability of a guilty plea disclosed through audio-video communications; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

GENERAL

Plea Colloquy Sufficient — Motion to Withdraw Plea Properly Denied: Robinson pleaded guilty to DUI fourth offense in 2006. Pursuant to a plea agreement, sentencing was deferred for 1 year, provided Robinson paid child support during that year. Just prior to sentencing, Robinson moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the plea colloquy was inadequate, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. When accepting a plea, it is sufficient that the District Court ensure that defendant admits committing the acts that constitute the crime charged. In this case, the plea colloquy was sufficient. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Robinson, 2009 MT 170, 350 M 493, 208 P3d 851 (2009).

Competence of Counsel — No Grounds to Withdraw Guilty Plea: Voluntariness of a plea depends upon whether counsel's advice was within the range of competence demanded of attorneys in a criminal case. When defense counsel rendered effective representation of defendant leading up to guilty pleas, a request to withdraw a guilty plea on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel was rejected. Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674, 54 St. Rep. 654 (1997).

Defendant's Misunderstanding as to Release on Own Recognizance Not Grounds for Setting Aside Guilty Plea — Basis for Withdrawal of Plea to Be Raised at Trial Level: Nelson argued that he should have been allowed to withdraw his guilty plea to assault charges because he believed that part of the plea bargain was release on his own recognizance pending sentencing. He also argued that he had not been adequately advised that he could be designated a dangerous offender, thus restricting his eligibility for parole. The Supreme Court stated that Nelson had not, at the trial level, moved to have his guilty plea set aside on the grounds that he had not been adequately advised that he could be designated a dangerous offender. Therefore, he could not raise the issue for the first time on appeal. The Supreme Court held that Nelson's argument that he believed that his plea agreement included release pending sentencing was not related to the voluntary nature of his guilty plea and therefore was not grounds for withdrawal of the plea. St. v. Nelson, 274 M 11, 906 P2d 663, 52 St. Rep. 1069 (1995).

Defendant Need Not Be Apprised of Parole Eligibility Limits: This section requires the District Court to advise a defendant of the consequences of a guilty plea and of the maximum sentence that may be imposed, and 46-12-202 (renumbered 46-12-210) and 46-12-204 outline other specific items of which a defendant must be advised by the court. However, these statutes do not require the court to advise a defendant of any possibility of limitations on his parole eligibility. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989), followed in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Waiver of Jury Trial: The entering of a plea of guilty by a defendant waives his right to a jury trial. St. v. Peters, 140 M 162, 369 P2d 418 (1962).

ACCEPTANCE OR REFUSAL OF GUILTY PLEA

Statutory Right to Plead Guilty to DUI and Related Misdemeanor Citations Not Violated by City Court's Refusal to Accept Pleas: There was no prejudice and any error was harmless when the state dismissed DUI charges prior to the District Court trial on one felony count and two misdemeanor charges of negligent vehicular assault. St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 375, 346 M 491, 197 P3d 956 (2008).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Voluntary Guilty Plea: McFarlane contended that his guilty plea was entered both involuntarily and unintelligently because trial counsel provided ineffective assistance in explaining a guilty plea and because he did not understand what acts amount to being guilty of burglary. The Supreme Court declined to address the ineffective assistance claims because they were raised for the first time on appeal. Regarding the voluntariness issue, the court applied the Brady standard to determine whether McFarlane was fully aware of the direct consequences of a guilty plea. The court noted that during the plea colloquy, McFarlane expressed understanding of the charges, the maximum penalties, and the waiver of the right to a trial and stated that he had discussed the consequences of a guilty plea with counsel and was satisfied with counsel's services. McFarlane's argument that he misunderstood or was confused about the meaning of a guilty plea was further belied by the fact that McFarlane fled the jurisdiction for more than 2 years to avoid imposition of a sentence and by the fact that McFarlane had a criminal history of 13 counts of burglary in six separate proceedings spanning nearly 40 years and was thus well acquainted with the criminal justice system and burglary charges in particular. Denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057 (2008).

No Ineffective Assistance in Counsel's Failure to Cite Proper Standard for Plea Withdrawal and to Challenge Plea Colloquy: McFarlane contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel for his motion to withdraw a guilty plea when counsel cited the test in St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), rather than the more lenient test in Brady v. U.S., 397 US 742 (1970), which replaced the Huttinger test (see St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005)). The Supreme Court held that despite counsel's improper reliance on Huttinger, the outcome would have been the same if counsel had relied on Brady, so McFarlane's challenge failed because he did not show that but for counsel's deficient performance, he would not have entered a guilty plea. McFarlane also contended that he received ineffective assistance because counsel failed to challenge the adequacy of the plea colloquy when the colloquy was flawed by the District Court's failure to enumerate lesser included offenses of which McFarlane might have been convicted had he proceeded to trial. The Supreme Court noted that although the District Court did not enumerate lesser included offenses, McFarlane was clearly informed that by pleading guilty, the opportunity to be convicted of a lesser offense would be lost. Additionally, pursuant to St. v. Thee, 2001 MT 294, 307 M 450, 37 P3d 741 (2001), the court had no duty to inform McFarlane about the possibility of lesser included offenses if none existed, and McFarlane failed to demonstrate any lesser included offenses to burglary that would have been applicable under the circumstances of his charge. Thus, McFarlane's ineffective assistance claim was without merit, and denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057 (2008).

Motion to Correct Sentence Not Considered Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Plain Error Review of Nolo Contendere Plea Inappropriate: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt asked the Supreme Court to exercise plain error review, find that the plea agreement was violated, and allow Holt to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The court declined. Holt made no motion in trial court to review the guilty plea, so that issue was not properly before the Supreme Court. Holt's speculation that he would not have entered the plea agreement had he considered the possibility of good time did not implicate Holt's fundamental constitutional rights, and failure to apply plain error review did not result in a manifest miscarriage of justice, leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the proceedings, or compromise the integrity of the judicial process. The Supreme Court refused to consider Holt's District Court motion to correct the sentence as a motion to withdraw the guilty plea and thus declined to consider Holt's argument that he be allowed to withdraw the nolo contendere plea based on plain error review. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Wright, 2001 MT 282, 307 M 349, 42 P3d 753 (2001).

Voluntary Nolo Contendere Guilty Plea — No Good Cause to Withdraw Plea: Although maintaining innocence to sexual assault charges, Leitheiser sought to avoid trial and possible sex offender treatment, so Leitheiser entered plea negotiations, and the state agreed to amend the information to consist of charges of felony assault on a minor and to remain silent regarding sex offender treatment in exchange for Leitheiser's guilty plea. At the change of plea hearing, Leitheiser entered a voluntary guilty plea to the amended charges. The trial court did not accept the guilty plea at that time, but ordered Leitheiser to undergo a presentence interview. The probation officer recommended sexual offender treatment, and Leitheiser moved to withdraw the nolo contendere guilty plea. The motion was denied, and Leitheiser appealed, contending that the plea to nonsexual charges combined with the bargain that the prosecution would not recommend sexual offender treatment induced the guilty plea. The Supreme Court disagreed. Leitheiser's guilty plea was voluntary, and the state kept its part of the plea bargain. Leitheiser's grievance was with the probation officer, who was not a party to the plea bargain, rather than with the prosecution. Denial of Leitheiser's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. Leitheiser, 2006 MT 70, 331 M 464, 133 P3d 185 (2006). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Lack of Participation in Sexual Offender Programs Warranting Revocation of Suspended Sentence: Van Haele contended that because he was not adequately advised by the District Court that one consequence of a guilty plea was that failure to complete a sexual offender program would be denial of probation status, he should be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and that the District Court erroneously denied his motion to withdraw the plea. Reviewing the case to determine whether the District Court's findings were erroneous, the Supreme Court disagreed with the factual predicate of Van Haele's argument. It was not Van Haele's failure to complete the prison sex offender program that resulted in Van Haele's denial of admission to an outpatient treatment program, but rather it was Van Haele's recantation of his admission of guilt and his various behavioral problems that placed insurmountable obstacles in the way of acceptance into an outpatient program, although Van Haele's refusal to participate in the prison program contributed to the problem. The District Court had adequate evidence at Van Haele's revocation hearing to determine that the lack of participation in sexual offender programs was adequate to warrant revocation of Van Haele's suspended sentence. St. v. Van Haele, 2005 MT 153, 327 M 400, 114 P3d 225 (2005).

Failure of Trial Court to Inquire About Satisfaction of Counsel at Hearing on Change of Plea Not Error — No Bearing Between Satisfaction With Counsel and Voluntariness of Plea: A court may permit withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, including involuntariness of the plea or other criteria. In this case, defendant contended that good cause existed because the trial court failed to inquire regarding defendant's satisfaction with counsel and with counsel's advice when defendant had expressed dissatisfaction with counsel shortly before a change of plea hearing. The Supreme Court held that defendant's dissatisfaction with counsel had no bearing on whether defendant understood the consequences of the plea or whether the plea was induced by threats, misrepresentations, or an improper promise. Finding no other factors to bear upon voluntariness or implicate good cause, the trial court's denial of defendant's motion to withdraw the guilty plea was affirmed. St. v. Warclub, 2005 MT 149, 327 M 352, 114 P3d 254 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

Adoption of Federal Test for Voluntariness of Guilty Pleas — Huttinger Overruled — Standard of Review: Since St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), the Supreme Court has applied a good cause test in determining whether to permit a plea of guilty or nolo contendere to be withdrawn and a plea of not guilty substituted. The good cause test involved a balancing of three conflicting factors: (1) the adequacy of the interrogation by the District Court of the defendant at the entry of the guilty plea as to the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea; (2) the promptness with which the defendant attempted to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) the fact that the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. None of the factors required a court to consider the voluntariness, knowledge, or intelligence of a defendant's plea, although a defendant has been allowed to withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing that the plea was made unknowingly or involuntarily. Citing Bousley v. U.S., 523 US 614 (1998), the Supreme Court concluded that the ultimate test for withdrawal of a plea is voluntariness, which subsumes the relevant elements of the Huttinger test, so Huttinger was overruled. Therefore, a guilty plea may be withdrawn only upon a showing that the plea was made involuntarily, and the Supreme Court will review questions of voluntariness in pleas and plea agreements de novo. St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), overruling St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991), and overruling St. v. Martin, 2004 MT 288, 323 M 320, 100 P3d 146 (2004), and other cases that have applied the abuse of discretion standard, and followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005), and St. v. McFarlane, 2008 MT 18, 341 M 166, 176 P3d 1057

(2008). See also St. v. Warclub, 2005 MT 149, 327 M 352, 114 P3d 254 (2005), in which the Supreme Court clarified Lone Elk and held that, with respect to appeals of denials of motions to withdraw guilty pleas, the court will review the findings of fact to determine if they are clearly erroneous and the conclusions of law to determine if they are correct. When voluntariness of the plea is at issue, the court will review that ultimate mixed question of law and fact de novo to determine if the trial court was correct in holding that the plea was voluntary. Warclub was followed in St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005), and Maldonado v. St., 2008 MT 253, 345 M 69, 190 P3d 1043 (2008). Warclub and Lone Elk were followed in St. v. Leitheiser, 2006 MT 70, 331 M 464, 133 P3d 185 (2006). In St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008), the Supreme Court noted that the standard for reviewing the voluntariness of a guilty plea adopted in St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991) (overruled in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005)), under which a plea would be considered involuntary when it appeared that defendant was laboring under such a strong inducement, fundamental mistake, or serious mental condition that the possibility existed that defendant may have pleaded guilty to a crime for which he was innocent, had been followed in other cases. To avoid confusion, the court overruled the following cases to the extent that they may be read as supporting the Miller standard: St. v. Pelke, 143 M 262, 389 P2d 154 (1964), St. v. LeMay, 144 M 315, 396 P2d 83 (1964), St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975), State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978), St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979), St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050 (1979), Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7 (1990), St. v. Milinovich, 248 M 373, 812 P2d 338 (1991), St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284 (1992), St. v. Barker, 257 M 31, 847 P2d 300 (1993), St. v. Skroch, 267 M 349, 883 P2d 1256 (1994), St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26 (1998), St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002), St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002), St. v. Chase, 2006 MT 13, 331 M 1, 127 P3d 1038 (2006), and St. v. Milligan, 2008 MT 36, 341 M 316, 177 P3d 500 (2008). Lone Elk and Deserly were overruled in St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009), to the extent that application of the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea is disapproved.

Effects of Fear and Medication Not Affecting Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Plea Proper: Lone Elk contended that he should have been allowed to withdraw a guilty plea because: (1) he was unduly influenced by hope and fear and pleaded guilty to a burglary charge because he was afraid that if he went to trial and was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent he would be required to complete sex offender treatment; and (2) the guilty plea was involuntary because he was not stabilized on his antidepressant medication at the time that the plea was entered. The Supreme Court held that the effect of neither fear nor medication affected the voluntariness of Lone Elk's guilty plea, so the trial court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005), and St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005). Right of Defendant to Plead Guilty Over State's Objection — Erroneous Refusal to Accept Guilty Plea: Peplow was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Prior to trial, Peplow tried to enter guilty pleas to the driving with a suspended or revoked license and driving without insurance counts, but the trial court ruled that it was not required to accept the pleas because Peplow's actions giving rise to the counts were part of the res gestae and probative of the issue of impairment; the trial court proceeded to trial on all counts. Peplow appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in refusing the guilty pleas. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court considered a defendant's right to plead guilty over the state's objection. The court noted the numerous statutory procedural safeguards in place to ensure that: (1) a guilty plea is made knowingly, voluntarily, and intelligently; (2) there is a factual basis for the plea; (3) the court is not bound by any plea agreements; and (4) a defendant may not withdraw a guilty plea if the plea agreement is not accepted. The Supreme Court cited Lamb v. Missoula Imports, 230 M 183, 748 P2d 965 (1988), for the proposition that when the word "may" is used to confer power upon an officer, court, or tribunal and the public or a third person has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of power becomes imperative. Under this section, a plea of guilty "may" be accepted before or during trial. The Supreme Court construed this language to mandate the acceptance of a guilty plea as long as the statutory requirements are met. Further, under this section, a defendant may plead guilty or not guilty without limitation on the right to plead. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Court Misstatement of Maximum Possible Penalty at Change of Plea Hearing — Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Noncompliant Plea: Roach requested a hearing to change his plea to guilty on burglary and theft charges. Roach was questioned regarding his understanding of his constitutional rights, and a discussion was held concerning possible penalties. The District Court Judge erroneously informed Roach that the maximum penalty for both crimes was 10 years and $50,000. Neither Roach's counsel nor the County Attorney, who were both present, responded or objected in any way to the court's misstatement of the maximum possible penalty. Roach was sentenced 2 months later to consecutive sentences of 20 years suspended for burglary and 10 years with no time suspended for theft, plus restitution. Roach later asserted that he was misled by the District Court, that his change of plea was coerced and based on misinformation, and that he should have been granted postconviction relief allowing him to either withdraw the guilty plea or be sentenced in conformity with the penalty that he was advised of at the change of plea hearing. The Supreme Court agreed. Because Roach was misinformed about the maximum possible sentence, his plea was neither knowing nor in compliance with statutory requirements. The District Court erred in refusing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea; the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to allow withdrawal. St. v. Roach, 1999 MT 38, 293 M 311, 975 P2d 817, 56 St. Rep. 161 (1999), following St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993).

Plea Entered Voluntarily and With Full Knowledge: Defendant's guilty plea, entered voluntarily and with full knowledge, was upheld absent anything in the record to suggest that he was unable to hear or understand what the court asked or that he was not in full control of his faculties. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990).

Discussion of Defense Strategy Beyond Duty of Trial Court: Defendant argued that the trial court did not adequately inform him of his alternatives to a guilty plea and therefore prevented him from making a voluntary and intelligent choice. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Day, 195 M 151, 635 P2d 568 (1981), held that the responsibility to discuss potential defenses, potential constitutional challenges, and affirmative defenses is vested in the defense counsel, not in the trial judge. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988).

Adequacy of Interrogation Related to Guilty Plea:

The court's interrogation of defendant prior to entry of a guilty plea was sufficient when: (1) defendant had signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights by plea of guilty, which contained a recitation of the charge against him and its penalty, an enumeration of the constitutional rights waived when one pleads guilty, an acknowledgment of defendant's satisfaction with his counsel, a denial that defendant was under the influence of drugs or alcohol, and an admission of guilt; and (2) the trial judge had reviewed the acknowledgment of waiver, discussed with defendant the constitutional rights he would be foregoing by pleading guilty, and ascertained that defendant was aware of the maximum penalties involved. St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984).

Under the circumstances, the failure to specify the name of the victim, the date, or the place of the alleged offense or the particular crime or to determine if the defendant was satisfied with his appointed counsel caused the District Court's interrogation concerning a guilty plea to be inadequate. St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979).

Plea Agreement Not Followed — Prospective Application of ABA Standard: The American Bar Association standards, requiring the sentencing court to inform a defendant if it is not going to accept the entire plea bargain and then give the defendant an opportunity to affirm or withdraw the guilty plea, adopted in St. v. Cavanaugh, 207 M 237, 673 P2d 482, 40 St. Rep. 2007 (1983), applies prospectively only. The defendant was sentenced prior to the Cavanaugh decision and is not entitled to its benefit. St. v. Wilkinson, 208 M 446, 679 P2d 767, 41 St. Rep. 456 (1984).

Failure to Inform of Defense — Knowledge of Defense Not Shown: Courts should be especially cautious in applying penal sanctions to estranged parents who are struggling over the custody of their children, since such situations are better regulated by custody orders enforced through contempt proceedings. Husband took child from wife in violation of a custody order, and the police arrested husband at a shopping center at which he told wife he would be. Husband had not left the state and had not attempted to hide the child. Police arrested the husband, apparently did not give him an opportunity to return the child voluntarily to the child's mother, and returned the child themselves. Defendant pleaded guilty to custodial interference, and the record did not indicate that husband was aware of the defense that a person who has not left the state does not commit the offense if he voluntarily returns the child. Twenty-six months after his pleading guilty and being sentenced, defendant's motion to withdraw his plea was denied on the ground of undue delay. It was reversible error to accept the plea without fully informing husband of the available defense, though defendant had stated he voluntarily entered the plea and an attorney appointed for defendant, who was present even though defendant refused to accept him as counsel, stated he believed husband voluntarily entered the plea with full understanding of what was involved. The plea was not an intelligent choice when there was a defense available. Denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was reversed and the cause remanded with directions to allow withdrawal of the plea. St. v. Lance, 201 M 30, 651 P2d 1003, 39 St. Rep. 1932 (1982).

In-Depth Examination When Record Requires: The standard by which the validity of a guilty plea is judged is whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to defendant as affirmatively disclosed by the record, and while it is clear that courts are not required to articulate specific rights when accepting a guilty plea, an in-depth examination by the court is desirable and mandatory in cases where the record requires it. St. v. Lance, 201 M 30, 651 P2d 1003, 39 St. Rep. 1932 (1982).

Refusal to Accept Guilty Plea Where Defendant Denies Guilt: The trial court properly refused to accept a burglary defendant's guilty plea because the defendant stated several times during extensive questioning that it was not his intent to commit a theft. Although a court may accept a guilty plea under these circumstances, it is not required to so accept. See N.C. v. Alford, 400 US 25, 27 L Ed 2d 162, 91 S Ct 160 (1970). St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

Pleading Guilty to Get Out of Jail — Accepting Plea — Issue of Voluntariness: The defendant asserted trial court error in the failure to inquire into the voluntariness of the defendant's pleas when he stated his guilty pleas were made to get out of jail and out of the county. The defendant's objection to his confinement in maximum security quarters was stated, but there was no suggestion that conditions in the jail were substandard or in any way abusive. There is nothing in the record to suggest that the jail conditions coerced the defendant into entering his plea. In any case, a prisoner's dislike of the security quarters is not per se a factor in determining the voluntariness of his plea. Under these circumstances, there was no error committed by the District Court in accepting defendant's guilty plea without further inquiry. In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980).

Understanding Charge and Consequences — Knowledge of Possibility of Mitigating Charge: Defendant was charged with and pleaded guilty to various crimes, including felony theft. The argument that the trial court had a duty to inform him that he might mitigate the charge and reduce his sentence was rejected because the arraignment record showed that defendant had been informed by counsel that the acts he had committed might constitute only a misdemeanor. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's repetition of this explanation to the defendant would not have added to his understanding of the charge and was not required. Defendant's argument that the record fails to establish that he understood the consequences of a guilty plea to deliberate homicide and that the trial court had a duty to inform him that he might mitigate this charge was also rejected. Defendant had been charged with both willful and deliberate murder and felony murder. The affidavit of probable cause stated that the defendant confessed to entering a service station with the intent to rob and had shot the deceased in the course of the robbery. Thus, it was clearly on the record that the State had a case on the charge of felony murder. In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980).

Retroactive Application of Criminal Procedure Rule: The decision made in St. v. Azure, 175 M 189, 573 P2d 179 (1977), requires that the trial court must advise a defendant of matters relating to lesser included offenses before accepting a guilty plea. This is a new procedural requirement that will not be applied retroactively. To apply it retroactively would seriously hamper the administration of justice by requiring conformity to as yet unannounced requirements. St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979).

Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Knowledge of Lesser Included Offenses: Defendant contends that his guilty plea was not voluntary because he did not understand the difference between aggravated assault and the lesser included offense of misdemeanor assault. The Supreme Court said that this argument only applies where there is a fundamental mistake such as where the defendant pleads guilty to nighttime burglary, a felony, when the burglary was committed in the daytime, a lesser offense. There is no fundamental mistake in this case where the defendant was informed of all the elements of aggravated assault. St. v. Campbell, 182 M 521, 597 P2d 1146 (1979).

Standard to Judge Validity of Guilty Plea: The standard by which the validity of a guilty plea is judged is whether the plea represents a voluntary and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant as affirmatively disclosed by the record. While it is clear that courts are not required to articulate specific rights when accepting a guilty plea, an in-depth examination by the trial court is desirable and mandatory in cases in which the record requires it. Yother v. St., 182 M 351, 597 P2d 79 (1979).

Change of Plea to Guilty: When a court has done all that it can to determine that the proposed plea of guilty is voluntarily made and that the defendant understands what he is doing and is advised of the consequences of his plea, including the nature and extent of his punishment, has been adequately advised by counsel, and has been treated fairly at all stages of the prosecution against him, and in fact the defendant states he is guilty of the charges made, then this court has a duty to support the District Court when it allows a plea of guilty to be entered in place of a plea of not guilty. St. v. Lewis, 177 M 474, 582 P2d 346 (1978), followed in St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992).

Improper Acceptance of Guilty Plea: Because the court did not determine whether the defendant understood the different elements and effects of deliberate homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide, acceptance of his guilty plea was improper. The court should have granted the defendant's motion for leave to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Azure, 175 M 189, 573 P2d 179 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Milinovich, 269 M 68, 887 P2d 214, 51 St. Rep. 1433 (1994).

Voluntariness of Guilty Plea — Examination of Defendant: Although examination by the court as to the voluntariness of a guilty plea is desirable and in some cases mandatory, when the record indicated that the defendant's guilty plea was entered voluntarily with full understanding of the charge and with full appreciation of his constitutional rights and the possible penalty, the fact that the trial court did not specifically question the defendant at the time of the plea change did not amount to reversible error. St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975).

WITHDRAWAL OF GUILTY PLEA

Voluntary Guilty Plea — Withdrawal of Plea Properly Denied: Usrey pleaded guilty through a plea agreement to sexual intercourse without consent with a 6-year-old girl but later sought to withdraw the plea on grounds that it was involuntary because Usrey did not understand the plea agreement and because the District Court did not explain the rights Usrey was waiving. The Supreme Court examined the plea bargain language and affirmed. Although the written plea agreement did not state the specific maximum penalty upon conviction of sexual intercourse without consent and the District Court did not state the penalty when Usrey pleaded guilty, the court did ask Usrey if he was mindful of the maximum penalty, which was clearly stated in the information, and Usrey replied affirmatively. Also, the plea bargain called for a sentence far less than the maximum penalty, and the sentence that Usrey bargained for and that was imposed was far less than the maximum. Additionally, Usrey was not misled to his detriment simply because the District Court did not use the exact words of 46-12-210(1)(d) in telling Usrey that he might not be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea if the plea bargain was rejected. The record contained substantial evidence supporting the District Court's conclusions that Usrey understood the proceedings and was mentally competent to enter a voluntary guilty plea, and the District Court did not err in denying the motion to withdraw the plea on grounds of involuntariness. St. v. Usrey, 2009 MT 227, 351 M 341, 212 P3d 279 (2009).

Failure of Defendant to Present Evidence of Constitutionally Infirm Prior DUI Conviction — Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Properly Denied: Robinson pleaded guilty to a fourth DUI and later moved to withdraw the plea, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Robinson contended that the plea was not voluntary and that the District Court improperly accepted the plea because one of the prior convictions was unconstitutionally infirm. However, when the plea was offered, Robinson voluntarily admitted to three prior DUIs and that he was pleading guilty to a felony. The District Court was not required to extract an admission regarding every element of the crime. It was sufficient that the court ensured that Robinson admitted the acts that constituted the offense. It was Robinson's obligation to present the District Court with any evidence regarding irregularities in prior convictions. Since he did not do so, there was nothing in the record to support that argument, and the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Robinson, 2009 MT 170, 350 M 493, 208 P3d 851 (2009). See also St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007).

Alleged Assault Victim's Recanted Allegations Not Considered New Evidence Warranting Withdrawal of Voluntary Guilty Plea: Tyler was charged with assaulting his partner Williams. Williams subsequently recanted the allegations to Tyler's investigator. Nevertheless, Tyler pleaded guilty. At the sentencing hearing, Williams appeared and again recanted the assault allegations. Tyler moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that Williams' testimony constituted newly discovered evidence. The District Court disagreed and disallowed the motion. Tyler appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Even if Tyler was unaware that Williams recanted, which appeared unlikely from the record, Williams' evidence could have been discovered with any amount of due diligence. Thus, Williams' recantation could not be considered newly discovered evidence constituting good cause to allow Tyler to withdraw the guilty plea, which was voluntarily given. St. v. Tyler, 2009 MT 75, 349 M 461, 204 P3d 685 (2009).

No Possibility of Lesser Plea Instruction — No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: As part of a plea agreement, Swensen pleaded guilty to felony assault and signed a waiver of rights, including the right to a jury instruction on a lesser included offense. Swensen subsequently moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the District Court failed to specifically advise him about the lesser included offense of misdemeanor assault during the change of plea hearing. The District Court denied the motion and Swensen was sentenced pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. Swensen appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A court may at any time before judgment and within 1 year after final judgment allow a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, which includes the minimal constitutional requirement that a guilty plea be voluntary and intelligent and may include additional criteria such as the discovery of new exculpatory evidence. In this case, Swensen's guilty plea to aggravated assault was voluntary, and the District Court's interrogation during the change of plea hearing was adequate. Additionally, Swensen's admissions on the record about the nature of the injuries inflicted on the victim effectively eliminated the possibility that Swensen was entitled to a lesser included offense instruction. Absent good cause, the District Court did not err in denying Swensen's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Swensen, 2009 MT 42, 349 M 268, 203 P3d 786 (2009). See also St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 265, 968 P2d 705 (1998).

Criminal Mischief Guilty Plea Based on Quality of Construction Work — Lack of Factual Basis for Plea Casting Doubt on Voluntariness — Remand: Wise was charged with elder abuse by exploitation and criminal mischief for allegedly performing shoddy construction work on an elderly woman's property. Wise agreed to plead guilty to criminal mischief in exchange for dismissal of the elder abuse charge. At the change of plea hearing, Wise acknowledged performing shoddy construction work but did not admit guilt sufficient to be convicted of criminal mischief. Nevertheless, the trial court did not allow Wise to withdraw the guilty plea and Wise was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although a court need not extract an admission from a defendant of every element of a crime in order to establish a factual basis for a guilty plea, the court must ascertain from the defendant's admissions that the defendant's acts generally satisfy the elements of the crime to which the defendant is pleading guilty. In this case, shoddy construction work, without more, did not constitute criminal mischief, and the trial court incorrectly concluded that there was a factual basis for Wise's plea, which cast doubt on the voluntariness of the plea, warranting reversal and remand for further proceedings. St. v. Wise, 2009 MT 32, 349 M 187, 203 P3d 741 (2009), following St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007).

Alford Plea Entered Voluntarily — Motion to Withdraw Plea Properly Denied: Locke moved to withdraw his Alford plea to felony robbery, but the motion was denied. On appeal, Locke argued that the District Court failed to establish a factual basis for the Alford plea when it reviewed only the information and affidavit and that failure to establish a factual basis provided good cause to withdraw the plea. The statutory procedure in 46-12-212 allows a defendant to plead guilty without actually admitting the charge if the defendant has reviewed the evidence and is capable of making a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice and if the record contains strong evidence of guilt. In this case, the statutory factors were met. Locke was fully aware of the direct consequences of the plea, and nothing in the record indicated that Locke was incapable of making a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice. Because Locke failed to establish that the plea was involuntary, the Supreme Court affirmed denial of Locke's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Locke, 2008 MT 423, 347 M 387, 198 P3d 316 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Frazier, 2007 MT 40, 336 M 81, 153 P3d 18 (2007).

Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Admissions to Allegations in Revocation Petition: Defendant's admissions to a petition to revoke were held to be involuntary in the county that declined to follow a global plea bargain negotiated in another county where defendant had earlier entered a plea of guilty to a new felony because the Supreme Court held he had done so on the basis of an unenforceable and eventually unfilled promise. St. v. Jones, 2008 MT 331, 346 M 173, 194 P3d 86 (2008).

Inability of District Court to Impose Sentence in Plea Agreement — Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Allowed: Deserly negotiated a plea agreement on a felony assault with a weapon charge wherein the state would recommend a 10-year sentence with the Department of Corrections and Deserly would be designated a persistent felony offender. However, after the plea was entered, the District Court and Deserly discovered that under 46-18-201, all but the first 5 years of a department commitment must be suspended, so the sentence in the plea agreement was not one that could be legally imposed. Deserly then moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds of good cause, but the District Court denied the motion, and Deserly appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Under St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), a defendant's plea is not voluntary if the court, the prosecutor, defense counsel, or some other party induced the plea, however slightly, by misrepresentation, including unfulfilled or unfulfillable promises. At the time Deserly entered the plea, it was reasonable for him to expect that the District Court could at least consider, if not actually impose, the recommended sentence, and Deserly was induced, at least in part, by the prospect of being able to receive the sentence that he and the prosecutor had negotiated and agreed to recommend. Because Deserly was induced by an unfulfillable promise of an illegal sentence, albeit unintentionally, his plea was not voluntary, and the case was remanded for further proceedings to allow Deserly to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Objection to Release of Tribal Court Juvenile Record Not Good Cause for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Phillips contended that intervening causes, including release of Phillips' tribal court juvenile record and the consequential failure of the Department of Corrections to recommend placement in the intensive supervision program as recommended in a plea agreement, constituted good cause to allow withdrawal of his guilty plea. The Supreme Court disagreed. The argument was premised on Phillips' expectations in the sentencing process, but the conditions of the plea agreement were recommendations only and were not assured, and there was no promise of placement in the program. Once Phillips was sentenced to the Department, placement was in the hands of the Department, not the sentencing court. Thus, Phillips' objection to the release of his juvenile record did not establish good cause for withdrawal of the guilty plea, and denial of the motion to do so was not error. St. v. Phillips, 2007 MT 117, 337 M 248, 159 P3d 1078 (2007).

No Right to Be Informed of Possibility of Lesser Included Offense When No Such Possibility Exists: Defendant was charged with felony attempted sexual assault, but ultimately pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of felony attempted kidnapping. After being sentenced to 10 years in prison, defendant appealed the conviction on grounds that the trial court erred by failing to inform defendant that he could have been convicted on a lesser charge of unlawful restraint and by failing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. However, only those lesser included offenses applicable to the charge of felony attempted sexual assault were relevant to defendant's decision to plead nolo contendere. The court and the state could not be faulted for failing to inform defendant of any lesser included offense that was not relevant to defendant's decision, and defendant had no right to be informed of the possibility of submitting a lesser included offense instruction to the jury when no such possibility existed. Absent anything in the record that an omission, misinformation, or mental incapacity hindered defendant's ability to enter knowingly and intelligently into a plea agreement, the trial court did not err in holding that defendant failed to establish good cause to withdraw the plea, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Iafornaro, 2007 MT 77, 336 M 489, 155 P3d 1238 (2007).

Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Involuntary Guilty Plea — Remand: Chase entered a guilty plea after being told by the trial court that his defense to a DUI charge would probably have failed and after Chase's counsel unilaterally withdrew the defense without notifying Chase. There was a legitimate basis for Chase's belief that his defense had not been adequately pursued, giving rise to uncertainty regarding Chase's guilt, and the colloquy conducted by the trial court appeared to have unintentionally prompted a guilty plea from Chase that was not knowing and intelligent. Chase's fundamental misunderstanding concerning the availability of his defense, coupled with the questionable voluntariness of the plea, was sufficient to allow withdrawal of the plea, and the trial court committed reversible error in denying Chase's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Chase, 2006 MT 13, 331 M 1, 127 P3d 1038 (2006), following St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26 (1998).

No Showing of Good Cause to Withdraw Guilty Plea After Four and One-Half Years: About 4 1/2 years after Favi's guilty plea on drug charges, Favi moved to withdraw the guilty plea. During that time, multiple warrants were issued for Favi's arrest for violating sentencing conditions, but ultimately Favi successfully completed the sentence. At no time did Favi raise the issue of the validity of the sentence. The District Court found no good cause to withdraw the guilty plea, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Favi's plea was voluntary, knowing, and intelligent, and Favi was sufficiently apprised of his rights and of the consequences of the plea. Absent a showing of good cause, denial of the motion to withdraw the plea was proper. St. v. Favi, 2005 MT 288, 329 M 273, 124 P3d 164 (2005), distinguishing St. v. Jones, 278 M 121, 923 P2d 560 (1996). See also St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Voluntary Guilty Plea Proper: Pursuant to a plea agreement, defendant pleaded guilty to sexual intercourse without consent. Some 4 years after entering the plea, defendant moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court's plea colloquy adequately addressed the elements of the offense and laid the factual basis for acceptance of the plea and that defendant's guilty plea, which was entered after defendant signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights and after engaging in a proper colloquy with counsel and the court, was voluntary. Thus, denial of the motion to withdraw the plea was proper. St. v. Muhammad, 2005 MT 234, 328 M 397, 121 P3d 521 (2005).

Withdrawal of Plea Based on Evidence That, After Guilty Plea, Assault Victim Told Public Defender That Defendant Wasn't the Assailant: Martin was charged with assault with a weapon and criminal possession of dangerous drugs. In exchange for the drug charge being dropped, he pleaded guilty to the assault charge. Two days before the sentencing date, a woman claiming to be the victim told the public defender's office that Martin was not her assailant. Martin moved for withdrawal of his guilty plea. Martin's motion was denied. Because Martin conceded in the lower court that his plea was in exchange for dropping the drug charge, he could not claim on appeal that it was not and that it was therefore error to refuse to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. Martin obtained a benefit the moment that the plea agreement was entered into, and it did not matter that the drug charge had not been dropped and that he had not been sentenced at the time that he moved for withdrawal of the plea. Moreover, the defendant did not receive ineffective assistance of counsel. Because the woman did not testify at the hearing, her identity as the victim was not confirmed, the woman gave an incorrect birth date, and a witness told the police that Martin told the witness that Martin had stabbed the victim. The court did not abuse its discretion when it refused to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea based on what a woman had told the public defender's office. St. v. Martin, 2004 MT 288, 323 M 320, 100 P3d 146 (2004).

Criteria of Effective Assistance of Defense Counsel — Prejudice From Ineffective Counsel Warranting Withdrawal of Alford Plea: In a petition for postconviction relief from a drug conviction, Henderson contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel and should be allowed to withdraw his Alford plea, but the District Court denied the petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the Strickland test to determine whether Henderson's counsel was ineffective. The first part of the test requires that defendant show that counsel's performance was deficient. The overarching duty of a criminal defense counsel is to advocate on behalf of the defendant and to meet, test, and refute the prosecution's case. Henderson met the first Strickland requirement by showing that counsel performed no investigation, research, or analysis, filed no pretrial motions, and spent only 4 hours on the case, which included clerical work, appearing in court with Henderson on two occasions, and an hour persuading Henderson to plead guilty. The sum of counsel's actual legal work was asking the County Attorney to propose a plea bargain and then signing the prosecution's first offer. Counsel's utter failure to advocate for Henderson in a meaningful way constituted deficient performance. The second Strickland requirement is a showing by defendant of a reasonable probability that but for counsel's deficient performance, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Henderson also met this test by showing that the decision to enter the Alford plea was clearly influenced by counsel's lack of effective assistance and that, but for the ineffective assistance, he would not have entered the plea. Thus, the lack of effective assistance in this case constituted sufficient good cause to authorize Henderson to withdraw the Alford plea and proceed to trial. The Supreme Court granted the petition for postconviction relief and remanded for trial. St. v. Henderson, 2004 MT 173, 322 M 69, 93 P3d 1231 (2004).

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Nolo Contendere Pleas Made Knowingly: White asserted that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw nolo contendere pleas, arguing that he could not have made a knowing waiver of his rights because he was not in possession of all evidence that might have influenced his decision, including inconsistent statements by a witness. The Supreme Court held that even if White did not know of the statement, the lack of knowledge was irrelevant to the criteria in 46-12-210 regarding whether the pleas were made knowingly. White was clearly informed of the nature of the charges, the mandatory minimum penalty, the maximum penalty, and the possibility of the imposition of restitution. Under the good cause factors in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999), White's nolo contendere pleas were made knowingly, and the District Court did not err in disallowing withdrawal of the pleas. St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004). See also St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997).

No Good Cause Established for Withdrawal of Knowing, Voluntary Guilty Plea: Morgan entered a plea agreement that dismissed four felony charges in exchange for Morgan's guilty plea to three counts of attempted deliberate homicide and one count of assault, which was a significant benefit. Morgan's guilty plea was knowing and voluntary, and absent good cause for withdrawing the plea, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow Morgan to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Morgan, 2003 MT 193, 316 M 509, 74 P3d 1047 (2003). See also St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

Failure of District Court Judge to Abide by Plea Agreement Entered With Previous District Court Judge — Doubt Regarding Plea Resolved in Favor of New Trial: At a change of plea hearing in December 2000, Tweed pleaded guilty to two counts of sexual intercourse without consent pursuant to a plea agreement in which the state agreed to drop two counts of felony sexual assault and recommended 30-year concurrent sentences on each count with 20 years suspended. In March 2001, Tweed appeared for sentencing before a new District Court Judge. The new judge called the probation officer who conducted the presentence investigation, and pursuant to the probation officer's recommendations, the new judge rejected the terms of the plea agreement and sentenced Tweed to concurrent 30-year sentences with only 10 years suspended. Tweed moved to withdraw the guilty pleas, but the motion was denied, and Tweed appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's contradictory statements gave credence to Tweed's claim that he held a mistaken understanding of the binding effect upon the court of the pretrial agreement's sentencing recommendations. In view of the irregularities in the interrogation at the change of plea hearing, any doubt about whether Tweed was precluded from entering a knowing, voluntary, and intelligent plea should be resolved in favor of a trial on the merits. The denial of Tweed's motion to withdraw the guilty pleas was an abuse of discretion, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Tweed, 2002 MT 286, 312 M 482, 59 P3d 1105 (2002).

Postconviction Relief Based on Claims of Newly Discovered Evidence Consisting of Defendant's Own Exculpatory Statements Properly Denied: Almost 2 years after pleading guilty to drug charges, Graham sought postconviction relief, contending that at the time that he pleaded guilty, he believed that he was admitting possessing only two drugs, not four, and that he was thus innocent of possessing the four drugs mentioned in the information. Graham also asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not advise him that he was pleading guilty to possession of all four drugs, and that his plea was thus not made knowingly and voluntarily. Despite the untimely filing of the petition, the District Court considered the petition because the issues were significant and should be disposed of on the merits. Nevertheless, the petition was dismissed and Graham appealed. The Supreme Court noted that in order to waive the 1-year statute of limitations on petitions for postconviction relief, the petitioner must provide newly discovered evidence that demonstrates actual innocence, which must be a showing that no reasonable juror would have found the defendant guilty rather than a mere showing that reasonable doubt exists. Graham did not show a clear miscarriage of justice because his own exculpatory statements did not qualify as newly discovered evidence and were insufficient to establish Graham's actual innocence. Additionally, Graham's allegations that he received ineffective assistance of counsel were record-based and did not qualify as new evidence of actual innocence. Last, Graham's request to withdraw the guilty plea because it was not made knowingly or voluntarily was considered. The Supreme Court applied the factors in this section and found that the trial court's interrogation was adequate, the motion to withdraw was not timely, and the plea bargain provided Graham a considerable benefit in exchange for dismissal of other charges. Therefore, the plea was knowing and voluntary and did not provide grounds for postconviction relief. The denial of Graham's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Graham, 2002 MT 237, 311 M 500, 57 P3d 54 (2002).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under 46-17-203, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, 46-17-311 procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under 46-21-101, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

No Requirement That Defendant Be Informed of Federal Firearms Prohibitions Resulting From State Conviction of Partner Assault — Direct Versus Collateral Consequences of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Liefert pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to charges of partner assault and was subsequently charged under federal law 18 U.S.C. 922 with unlawfully possessing a firearm, following a hunting investigation. After federal charges were filed, Liefert moved to withdraw the guilty plea, contending that good cause existed because the Justice's Court did not inform him of the federal prohibition on possessing a firearm as a result of the plea under Montana law. The motion was denied in Justice's Court and in District Court, which cited St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153 (1992), and held that Liefert did not need to be informed of the federal prohibition because it was a collateral consequence of Liefert's sentence. Liefert appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. Although the Supreme Court has previously held that there is no appeal to District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea in Justice's Court, in this case, Liefert's appeal was treated as a motion for postconviction relief, and the Supreme Court proceeded to determine whether Liefert had good cause to withdraw the plea. The court determined whether the District Court erred in disallowing withdrawal of the plea by applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997). The only applicable Bowley factor was the adequacy of the plea colloquy. Liefert did not assert that a judge must inform every defendant of the effect of a guilty plea on gun possession, but presented only the issue of whether a defendant must be informed when charged with partner assault and contended that state sentencing statutes require a judge to inform a defendant of the punishment that can result from a violation. Although never explicitly adopted, the Supreme Court has previously applied the prevailing rule in Torrey v. Estelle, 842 F2d 234 (9th Cir. 1988), that because it is impossible for a judge to inform a defendant of every possible consequence of a guilty plea, judges are required to inform defendants of direct consequences, but are not required to inform of collateral consequences. A consequence is considered direct if it has a definite, immediate, and largely automatic effect and is considered collateral if a defendant has control over whether or not the consequence occurs, if it is not under the control of the sentencing judge, or if it is a procedure under the control of a different sovereign or agency. Notwithstanding Liefert's due process, federal preemption, and negative implication arguments, Liefert had discretionary control over whether he would be in violation of federal law upon entry of a guilty plea for partner assault, and the consequence in this case was under the control of the federal government and thus collateral. Further, the guilty plea was not involuntary simply because it may have been entered to avoid the possibility of a greater punishment at trial or because Liefert may have viewed punishment under the guilty plea as lesser than his immediate personal consequences. Therefore, the District Court did not err in denying Liefert's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002), followed in Duffy v. St., 2005 MT 228, 328 M 369, 120 P3d 398 (2005).

Defendant's Failure to Show Doubt as to Voluntariness of Plea — Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Affirmed: Kellames contended that the District Court erred in denying a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Kellames maintained that the plea was involuntary because of his mother's influence over him, and because he suffered from a bipolar disorder that required medication, which his attorney failed to mention to the sentencing court. However, Kellames conceded that in response to questioning at the sentencing hearing, he denied that he was suffering from a disability, stated that he felt no threat or coercion to plead guilty, and admitted that the decision to plead guilty was his alone. Thus, Kellames failed to state a claim of pressure from his mother that rose to the level of coercion sufficient to render his subsequent responses to questioning in open court involuntary, and raised no doubt about whether his guilty plea was voluntarily or intelligently made. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion by the District Court in denying Kellames's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812 (1999).

Extraordinary Circumstances Constituting Good Cause to Permit Withdrawal of Guilty Pleas: In 1982, Mallak entered the United States from Iraq as a refugee. In 1989, Mallak entered guilty pleas to two felony counts of sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs); however, the record of the proceedings was destroyed. Mallak served a 5-year suspended sentence, and 5 years later applied for U.S. citizenship. When federal immigration officials discovered the drug conviction, deportation proceedings were instituted against Mallak, who resisted deportation by filing for asylum and by filing a petition for postconviction relief requesting that he be allowed to withdraw his guilty pleas. Without a hearing, the District Court denied Mallak's petition on grounds that it was time-barred, and Mallak appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. There is no bright-line rule on the timeliness of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and each case must be considered in light of its unique record. Rather, under this section, a guilty plea may be withdrawn at any time for good cause. In St. v. Koepplin, 213 M 55, 689 P2d 921 (1984), the Supreme Court set out the factors to be considered when determining whether good cause exists to withdraw a guilty plea: (1) the adequacy of the District Court's interrogation as to the defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) the promptness of the motion to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) whether the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. The circumstances in Mallak's case were extraordinary, including his documented mental incapacity, his unfamiliarity with the English language at the time of the change of plea, and the absence of a record of the plea proceedings, all of which raised serious doubts about the voluntariness of Mallak's guilty pleas. Further, it was not until 1991 that the Legislature passed 46-12-210 requiring that foreign defendants be told during plea proceedings that a guilty plea could result in deportation. Given the unique combination of factors, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court abused its discretion in denying Mallak's petition for leave to withdraw his guilty pleas, so the case was remanded to allow Mallak to withdraw his prior pleas. Mallak v. St., 2002 MT 35, 308 M 314, 42 P3d 794 (2002).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Parents of Sexual Assault Victim Not Parties to Plea Agreement: Following a guilty plea and conviction of sexual assault, Knox moved to withdraw the guilty plea, arguing that the County Attorney violated the terms of a plea agreement, which had recommended a 30-year suspended sentence and dropping a second sexual assault charge in exchange for the guilty plea, and indicated that the parents of the 5-year-old victim would not recommend incarceration in the victim impact statement of the presentence investigation. During the colloquy required by 46-12-210, the District Court informed Knox that, like the court itself, the parents were not bound by the plea agreement and could change their minds at any time as far as recommending future imprisonment, adding that if the parents did change their minds, that fact would not suffice as grounds for withdrawal of a guilty plea. Nevertheless, Knox voluntarily accepted the possible consequences of the plea and pleaded guilty. The parents then recommended imprisonment, and Knox was sentenced to 40 years with 18 suspended. A District Court may permit the withdrawal of a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, but the determination of good cause is discretionary, and each case is considered on its merits. Here, the District Court subsequently denied the withdrawal motion pursuant to the colloquy, and Knox appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. After applying the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), the Supreme Court found that there was no abuse of discretion in the denial of the motion to withdraw and that Knox's guilty plea thus met the constitutional standard of a voluntary, intelligent, and knowing choice among options. The District Court acted according to statutory requirements when it made clear that the parents could make known their opinion and change their minds regarding Knox's incarceration because they were not parties to the plea agreement, pursuant to the court's duties in 46-18-115. Further, other evidence in a psychological evaluation indicated that Knox had violent tendencies that presented complications to successful treatment, had high-risk factors for violent recidivism, and had resisted treatment for chemical dependency in the past, so the parents' incarceration request was not a determinative basis for the sentence. St. v. Knox, 2001 MT 232, 307 M 1, 36 P3d 383 (2001).

No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Made Four Years After Plea Entered—Bowley Factors Applied: In determining whether the District Court erred in denying Garner's motion to withdraw guilty pleas, the Supreme Court applied the factors in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997): (1) the adequacy of the court's interrogation when the plea was entered as to defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) the promptness of the motion to withdraw; and (3) the fact that the plea resulted from plea bargaining. Garner was adequately questioned regarding the desire to plead guilty, fully informed of the right to continue with a plea of not guilty, informed of the ramifications of a guilty plea, and admitted the facts of the charged offenses. Although Garner's wait of almost 4 years before attempting to withdraw the guilty pleas was not per se a bar to plea withdrawal, the District Court did not err in determining that the delay, together with Garner's ample opportunity to raise the withdrawal issue while raising other claims during that 4 years when represented by counsel, could only lead to the conclusion that Garner's motion to withdraw the guilty pleas did not satisfy the requirement of promptness. Last, there was no plea bargain, so that factor was not relevant. St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

Pro Se Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Not Considered Critical Stage of Proceedings to Which Right to Counsel Attaches: Garner moved pro se to withdraw his guilty plea nearly 4 years after entering the plea and nearly 3 years after filing a petition for postconviction relief, arguing that a motion to withdraw a guilty plea constitutes a critical stage of the proceedings at which the right to counsel attaches, and that that right must be expressly waived, which was not done. Garner cited numerous non-Montana cases in which the right to counsel was found to attach to a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, but the Supreme Court noted that it had not established any bright line as to when in the sequence of proceedings the right to counsel attaches. The court noted the holding in Ranta v. St., 1998 MT 95, 288 M 391, 958 P2d 670 (1998), that a critical stage is defined as any step of the proceedings in which there is potential for substantial prejudice to the defendant. Here, Garner was represented by three different counsel during the course of the proceedings. Given the length of time since trial and the ample opportunities of representation that Garner enjoyed, the pro se motion did not raise the potential for substantial prejudice to Garner; thus, the motion did not constitute a critical stage of the proceedings, and the right to counsel did not attach. St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under this section. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-203, and 46-17-311. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Breach of Plea Agreement by State — Defendant's Right to Choose Remedy: The state conceded that it breached a plea agreement that had been offered to Munoz, so the order of the District Court denying Munoz's motion to withdraw his guilty plea was erroneous. The question then became whether the sentencing court or Munoz should have the right to choose the remedy. Generally, when the state breaches a plea agreement, one of two equitable remedies is available to safeguard the defendant's due process rights. The notion of an equitable remedy for a breach is guided by the general principles of contract law. The first remedy is specific performance by the government, requiring the state to uphold its end of the bargain and, before a new sentencing judge, comply with the terms of the plea agreement by recommending a specific sentence, moving for dismissal of other charges, or simply not opposing the defendant's requested sentence. When specific performance is imposed, a defendant enjoys no contractual right or entitlement to a specific sentence. The second equitable remedy is rescission, requiring that a defendant be allowed to withdraw the guilty plea and then face trial on the original charge as if the plea agreement had never been entered. In cases of rescission, a defendant's constitutional rights that were waived by the guilty plea are reinstated. However, the seminal federal case that established these remedies, Santobello v. N.Y., 404 US 257 (1971), never reached the question of choice of remedies, leaving to the discretion of the state court the decision as to which remedy would be appropriate under the circumstances. Federal circuit courts and various state courts have also split on the question of choice of remedies. Until now, the Montana Supreme Court has also applied two lines of reasoning—in some cases leaving the choice of remedies to the discretion of the sentencing court and in other cases providing instructions that a defendant be allowed to choose the remedy. In light of the underlying principles of contract law, a nonbreaching defendant must be afforded the initial right to choose from available remedies when the state breaches a plea agreement. As the breaching party, the state bears the substantial burden of demonstrating through clear and convincing evidence that a defendant's choice of remedy would result in a miscarriage of justice, and only upon such a showing may a District Court disallow a defendant's choice. St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015 (1999), overruling St. v. Persak, 256 M 404, 847 P2d 280 (1993), and St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and followed in St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

Failure to Present Motion to Withdraw Voluntary Guilty Plea, Based on Hope or Fear, Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Osterloth contended that he was denied effective assistance of counsel when his attorney failed to premise a motion to withdraw a guilty plea on Osterloth's having entered the plea out of hope of avoiding the mandatory minimum sentence for sexual assault by being admitted to a community-based sex offender treatment program and on Osterloth's fear of incarceration. Osterloth was relying on St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682 (1998), for the proposition that an assertion that a guilty plea was influenced by hope or fear is a proper basis for withdrawing a guilty plea. Under the two-prong Strickland test for evaluating effectiveness of counsel, a defendant must establish that counsel's performance was deficient and that the deficient performance prejudiced the defendant. A guilty plea is not involuntary simply because it was entered to avoid a greater punishment, nor is counsel's performance deficient for failure to raise an issue that lacks merit. Thus, because Osterloth's plea was not involuntary, his counsel's performance was not deficient in failing to raise the issue of Osterloth's hope or fear in the motion to withdraw. Having failed to establish the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court did not address the second prong in finding that Osterloth was not denied the right to effective assistance of counsel. St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Maximum Possible Penalty — Reversible Error in Failing to Allow Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: After offering an Alford plea but prior to a change of plea hearing, Melone signed an acknowledgment of waiver of rights, stating that he understood the maximum possible penalty for felony assault and that his sentence could be enhanced for using a deadly weapon and because of his prior criminal record. At the change of plea hearing, the court informed Melone that the weapon enhancement penalty would not apply and that the maximum penalty for felony assault was "ten years in the Montana State Prison or a $50,000 fine". The court then allowed Melone to withdraw his guilty plea and enter the Alford plea. The court later sentenced Melone to 10 years in prison, plus 10 years to be served consecutively as a persistent offender. Melone moved for a hearing on the persistent offender enhancement and requested that he be allowed to withdraw his plea. The court rejected the motion to withdraw the plea, but vacated the sentence and granted a new sentencing hearing to allow Melone to present evidence regarding applicability of the persistent offender enhancement. Following the hearing, the court affirmed its original sentence. Melone appealed, contending that he was never informed that he could receive up to 100 years because of his potential status as a persistent offender and that, as a consequence, his plea was not knowing and voluntary. The Supreme Court agreed. Under 46-12-210 and this section, a defendant must be informed of the maximum penalty, including the effect of any penalty enhancement provision. The fact that the prosecutor informed Melone of a possible persistent offender penalty immediately prior to questioning did not satisfy the statutory requirement that the court inform the defendant of the maximum penalty. Melone's statements in the written acknowledgment were insufficient to satisfy the doubts of the Supreme Court that Melone was aware that his sentence could be enhanced by up to 100 years as a result of his plea. Rather, it appeared that Melone was under the mistaken belief that he risked sentence enhancement only if he proceeded to trial. Resolving their doubt that the plea was voluntary in favor of Melone, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case to District Court to allow Melone to withdraw the plea. St. v. Melone, 2000 MT 118, 299 M 442, 2 P3d 233, 57 St. Rep. 493 (2000).

Nonspecific Colloquy Regarding Lesser Included Offenses as Insufficient Notice of Defendant's Options — Reversible Error: When interrogating Sanders regarding his understanding of the consequences of a guilty plea, the District Court informed Sanders that there might be lesser included offenses but did not specifically inform him that there were in fact lesser included offenses, so Sanders' subsequent guilty plea was not made intelligently. To make an intelligent choice as to whether to plead guilty, a defendant is entitled to know the precise nature of the alternatives. If a defendant does not know about lesser included offenses, it is not possible to evaluate whether a jury could be convinced that the defendant was guilty of those offenses. The court's interrogation, which comprised a nonspecific colloquy regarding lesser included offenses, was insufficient and, coupled with the prosecutor's breach of a plea agreement, constituted reversible error. The Supreme Court remanded with instructions either to allow Sanders' withdrawal of the guilty plea or to sentence Sanders in accordance with the plea agreement. St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999), following St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997). See also Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7, 47 St. Rep. 887 (1990).

Change of Plea Agreement Properly Denied — Application of Contract Law Standards — Agreement Not to Prosecute Father — Benefit Derived by Defendant: Keys agreed to accept a motorcycle as collateral for a loan, but the motorcycle, which Keys subsequently sold, turned out to belong to the father of the individual to whom Keys made the loan. Both Keys and his father were charged with theft, but through his attorney, Keys negotiated an Alford plea with the prosecutor whereby the charges against Keys' father would be dropped and the prosecutor would recommend to the court that Keys' sentence be deferred for 4 years. At the hearing on the plea agreement, Keys, who could not read, had difficulty understanding that the District Court was not bound by and did not have to accept the agreement. However, after a lengthy colloquy with the District Court Judge, Keys eventually did state that he understood the agreement. The District Court then ordered that Keys' sentence be deferred for 6 years, and Keys requested that his plea be withdrawn, based upon his lack of understanding and a lack of consideration for his guilty plea. The District Court refused to allow the withdrawal, and the Supreme Court affirmed that refusal. The Supreme Court held that Keys did benefit from the agreement, that the benefits included the dismissal of charges against his father, and that in dismissing those charges, the state suffered the deprivation of a right (to pursue the conviction of Keys' father) that the law did not require. The Supreme Court also held that even though there was some confusion in Keys' mind over the role of the District Court in the agreement, the record showed by Keys' responses to questions by the District Court that Keys understood, at least at one point in time, that the court was not bound by the agreement. St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999), followed in St. v. D'Amico, 2000 MT 63, 299 M 57, 997 P2d 773, 57 St. Rep. 297 (2000), St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004), and Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Role of Repressed Memory Therapy in Voluntariness of Alford Plea — Withdrawal of Plea: Ereth was charged with three counts of sexual intercourse without consent and two counts of sexual assault. Ereth claimed that she could not recall committing the crimes but was willing to undergo psychotherapy to determine whether she was repressing memories of the offenses. The public defender stated that Ereth was not capable of admitting guilt, despite the facts of the case, and that the only defense that could be brought forward was an Alford plea, which was entered. Following unsuccessful memory recall therapy and testimony of another therapist regarding the questionable science of repressed memory therapy, Ereth sought to withdraw her guilty pleas, alleging that she had been coerced into the pleas by the public defender and stating that had she known of the controversy surrounding the validity of the therapy, she would not have entered the pleas. Her motion to withdraw the pleas was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, given the role that repressed memory therapy played in Ereth's decisionmaking process and the air of uncertainty regarding the validity of the therapy, there was doubt as to whether the Alford pleas had been made voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently and held that the trial court erred in refusing to allow withdrawal of the pleas. The case was reversed and remanded. St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998).

What Constitutes "Good Cause" Allowing Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Doubt Resolved in Favor of Defendant: A District Court may permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea at any time, before or after judgment, for good cause shown. Although the determination of good cause is discretionary, the guiding principle is that a change of plea will be permitted if it fairly appears that: (1) defendant was ignorant of the defendant's rights and the consequences of the act; (2) defendant was influenced unduly and improperly either by hope or by fear in making the plea; or (3) the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension. If there is any doubt that a plea was involuntary, the doubt should be resolved in favor of defendant. St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682, 55 St. Rep. 396 (1998), clarifying St. v. McAllister, 96 M 348, 30 P2d 821 (1934), St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980), St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714 (1984), Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7 (1990), St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991), and St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284 (1992), and followed in St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999). The good cause standard was replaced by the federal voluntariness standard in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005).

"Motion to Vacate Conviction" Construed as Motion for Postconviction Relief and Not Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — Attorney Conflict of Interests — Petition Previously Denied: Howard filed a motion for postconviction relief in 1993, asserting that his attorney in his 1981 trial for felony theft had a conflict of interests because the attorney also represented a codefendant. The Supreme Court denied his petition as time-barred under 46-21-102. Howard then filed with the District Court a "Motion to Vacate Conviction", which the District Court construed as another petition for postconviction relief and also denied as time-barred. The Supreme Court held that it was proper for the District Court to construe the "Motion to Vacate Conviction" as another motion for postconviction relief. Despite Howard's argument that his motion did not meet the formal prerequisites for a motion for postconviction relief and that motions to withdraw a guilty plea are allowed after judgment by virtue of this section, the Supreme Court held: (1) that it had not always strictly enforced the requirements for a motion for postconviction relief, especially for persons appearing pro se; (2) that the content of Howard's motion was of the type usually made in motions for postconviction relief; and (3) that although other means of review of a sentence other than postconviction relief may sometimes be necessary because of exigent circumstances, the circumstances of Howard's situation, in which he waited over 10 years to challenge his conviction the first time, did not demonstrate those exigent circumstances. The Supreme Court held that this petition, like Howard's first petition for postconviction relief, was time-barred by 46-21-101. St. v. Howard, 282 M 522, 938 P2d 710, 54 St. Rep. 464 (1997).

Failure to Adequately Inform Defendant of Rights Prior to Eliciting Factual Basis for Change of Plea and Breach of Plea Agreement by Prosecutor — Reversible Error: The District Court summarily denied Bowley's timely oral motion to withdraw a guilty plea three times. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the trial court erred in failing to inform Bowley of his constitutional rights, in neglecting to inquire as to the competency of counsel, and in not investigating whether Bowley was under the influence of alcohol or drugs before eliciting from Bowley the factual basis of his guilty plea at a change of plea hearing. Further, the record showed that the prosecutor, although following the recommendation of the probation officer, breached the plea agreement by suggesting a sentence different from that contained in the pretrial agreement. The motion to withdraw the guilty plea was timely. Having applied the three factors in St. v. Enoch, 269 M 8, 887 P2d 175 (1994), the Supreme Court found that good cause existed to permit withdrawal of the guilty plea and reversed and remanded with instructions to allow Bowley to withdraw the plea if desired or, alternatively, to sentence Bowley in accordance with the pretrial agreement. St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999), and St. v. Sanders, 1999 MT 136, 294 M 539, 982 P2d 1015, 56 St. Rep. 551 (1999).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Abuse of Discretion: After Moddison filed pro se motions with the Supreme Court that amounted to a request to withdraw his guilty plea, the case was remanded to District Court for a hearing on the request. Following the hearing, the request was denied. Moddison appealed, contending that the District Court abused its discretion in denying the motion to withdraw the guilty plea: (1) by conducting an inadequate interrogation of Moddison regarding his understanding of the consequences of pleading guilty; (2) by not dealing promptly with Moddison's efforts to withdraw the plea; (3) because the plea was the result of an Alford plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge; and (4) because Moddison's guilty plea was based on the mistaken advice of his attorneys. The Supreme Court found that Moddison did not establish good cause for withdrawal of the plea and affirmed, holding that: (1) the fact that Moddison's attorney, rather than the court, conducted the plea interrogation was not reversible error when the interrogation achieved its fundamental purpose and consisted of essentially the same questions that the Supreme Court held to be adequate in St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639 (1994); (2) an 8-month delay between entry of the plea and the motion to withdraw was within the allowable timeframe; (3) Moddison's plea was based in large part on the overwhelming evidence against him and was ultimately not part of a "package deal" with the other defendants or conditioned on their pleas; and (4) despite the fact that some advice Moddison received from his attorneys was not accurate and merely explained what they thought potential remedies were for one sentence out of many that Moddison could have received, Moddison nevertheless clearly understood that the sentencing court had unfettered discretion to impose any sentence within the statutory range, could restrict his eligibility for parole, and could order him to undergo sexual offender treatment. St. v. Moddison, 278 M 384, 926 P2d 253, 53 St. Rep. 961 (1996).

Refusal to Consider Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Held Abuse of Discretion: Weaver entered a guilty plea to charges of misdemeanor assault, issuing bad checks, and domestic abuse. Weaver subsequently filed a pro se motion to change his plea and a "motion to relieve counsel". At a sentencing hearing, the District Court Judge stated that she had reviewed "most of the motions that have been filed in these matters" but did not "see where they will have anything to do with the sentencing in this matter". The state argued as if the motion to withdraw the guilty plea had been denied, but the Supreme Court interpreted the District Court's comment to mean that the District Court would not consider the motion. The Supreme Court noted that the withdrawal of a guilty plea rests in the sound discretion of the District Court but that this rule depends upon the District Court exercising that discretion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court failed to exercise its discretion in this case and that a failure of the District Court to exercise its discretion was an abuse of discretion. St. v. Weaver, 276 M 505, 917 P2d 437, 53 St. Rep. 495 (1996).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — No Error: The defendant was charged with five counts of criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs) and pleaded guilty to all five counts. The defendant was sentenced and then made a motion to withdraw the guilty pleas. The motion was denied. The Supreme Court stated that the standard in reviewing a denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea is whether the District Court abused its discretion. Applying three factors, the Supreme Court found that the District Court had not abused its discretion by denying the motion. St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995).

Lower Court Error in Not Allowing Withdrawal of Alford Guilty Plea: Enoch argued that the lower court erred in not allowing him to withdraw his Alford plea of guilty. The Supreme Court held that the lower court should have allowed the plea withdrawal based on the facts that: (1) the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered was inadequate; (2) Enoch's request to withdraw the plea within 2 months of entering the plea was timely; and (3) the court did not give enough weight to the fact that the plea was not the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for the dismissal of another charge. St. v. Enoch, 269 M 8, 887 P2d 175, 51 St. Rep. 1306 (1994), following St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203 (1991), as to factors to be weighed in determining whether to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea, followed in St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995), St. v. Gruendemann, 282 M 128, 935 P2d 1110, 54 St. Rep. 275 (1997), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997), and St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998). Bowley was followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999).

Adequate Interrogation as to Consequences of Plea — No Mistake or Misunderstanding — Proper Guilty Plea as Waiver of Factual Defenses: Defendant contended that denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea was improper because the court's interrogation at an omnibus hearing was insufficient, because he was induced to enter the guilty plea, and because statements made by the victim after the plea was entered amounted to a recantation that required the court to allow withdrawal of the plea. However, denial of the motion was affirmed on appeal when the Supreme Court's examination of the record showed that: (1) the trial court's interrogation was adequate pursuant to St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65 (1994), despite the occurrence of some harmless error in the court's failure to inform defendant of the maximum and mandatory sentences for the crime; (2) evidence demonstrated that the guilty plea was timely and voluntary and entered without mistake or misunderstanding; and (3) the victim's statements were not exculpatory as to the crime to which defendant pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court cited St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979), in holding that by properly pleading guilty, defendant waived all factual defenses that occurred prior to the plea. St. v. Skroch, 267 M 349, 883 P2d 1256, 51 St. Rep. 1092 (1994), distinguishing State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978).

Lack of Knowledge of Consecutive Sentence Not Proved — No Basis for Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: Allen pleaded guilty to one count of homicide during a prison riot. After being sentenced to a 25-year consecutive term, he moved to withdraw his plea on the basis that he did not know that the law required a consecutive term in his case. The Supreme Court held that the evidence indicated that he was aware of consequences of his plea. The Supreme Court advises District Courts to avoid this issue in the future by specifically referring to the consecutive sentence requirement in 46-18-401 when interrogating a defendant with respect to entering a guilty plea. St. v. Allen, 265 M 293, 876 P2d 639, 51 St. Rep. 519 (1994).

Amending Information Not Prosecutorial Vindictiveness: Mahoney moved to withdraw his guilty plea on the basis that the prosecution's amendment of the information (under the former statute) to charge him with attempted rape and attempted homicide rather than aggravated assault constituted prosecutorial vindictiveness. The Supreme Court noted that the prosecution had moved to amend the information well before the trial date and that the defendant had not objected at that time and had subsequently pleaded guilty. The Supreme Court held that amending the information when the facts of the case supported more than one crime was a matter of prosecutorial discretion and further that Mahoney was limited to objecting to the voluntariness of his plea. St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65, 51 St. Rep. 160 (1994).

Guilty Plea Voluntary and Motion to Withdraw Plea Untimely but Supreme Court Chooses to Hear Case Due to Question of First Impression: Mahoney moved to have his guilty plea for attempted homicide and attempted rape withdrawn. The Supreme Court held that the motion was not timely because it came more than a year after the conviction and that the defendant had been properly questioned regarding his knowledge of the consequences of a guilty plea. However, the Supreme Court decided to hear the case because it presented a question of first impression with respect to whether or not Mahoney could raise the defense that he had abandoned his attempt to commit homicide and rape. St. v. Mahoney, 264 M 89, 870 P2d 65, 51 St. Rep. 160 (1994).

Guilty Plea Involving Dangerous Drugs — Mistake in Affidavit Insufficient Basis for Withdrawal of Plea: Barker agreed to plead guilty to an offense involving methamphetamine, a Schedule II drug. The affidavit accompanying the information erroneously identified the drug as a Schedule I drug. Baker sought to withdraw the plea, claiming that he was under a misunderstanding as to the proper schedule of the drug at the time he entered the plea. The Supreme Court held that because the statute under which Barker was charged and the information itself charged Barker only with felony possession of a dangerous drug and because the misidentification of the schedule appeared only in the affidavit, the proper schedule of the drug was not a dispositive factor in the plea agreement and that the mistake did not affect the voluntary nature of the plea. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow a change in plea. St. v. Barker, 257 M 31, 847 P2d 300, 50 St. Rep. 147 (1993).

Proper Denial of Motion to Withdraw:

When defendant did not challenge the sufficiency of the evidence or the adequacy of the court's interrogation when moving for withdrawal of a guilty plea, defendant cannot raise the claims for the first time on appeal. The fact that the bench trial was expected to take only 2 or 3 hours and that the court had agreed to allow defendant to leave the state to visit his sick mother regardless of the outcome of the trial negated defendant's claim that stress induced a guilty plea. Defendant's motion to withdraw his plea was not prompt when made after defendant had spent some time in Oregon and 1 month in alcohol treatment between entry of the plea and sentencing, and there was no indication that defendant was unable to contact his attorney during those periods. St. v. Coggins, 257 M 440, 849 P2d 1033, 50 St. Rep. 347 (1993), followed in St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000).

The District Court properly denied defendant's motion to withdraw his guilty plea when there was nothing in the record to: (1) establish that the plea was based on a fundamental mistake or misunderstanding as to its consequences; (2) indicate defendant was ignorant of his rights and the consequences of his act; (3) show defendant was unduly influenced by hope or by fear; or (4) indicate the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension. St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992), followed in St. v. Barker, 257 M 31, 847 P2d 300, 50 St. Rep. 147 (1993).

Defendant's misunderstanding of relatively minor points regarding the terms of probation under a deferred sentence did not constitute evidence of a fundamental mistake or strong inducement sufficient to reverse the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308, 48 St. Rep. 389 (1991), followed in St. v. Ries, 257 M 324, 489 P2d 184, 50 St. Rep. 290 (1993), and overruled in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), to the extent that the Miller standard is less protective of individual rights than the federal voluntariness standard.

Denial of motion to withdraw a guilty plea was proper where: (1) the plea was entered against the defense counsel's advice, but defendant indicated he was satisfied with his attorney; (2) defendant voluntarily entered the plea and was aware of his waiver of rights in doing so; (3) there was no evidence that the plea was prompted by threats; and (4) there was not the slightest doubt in the record that defendant committed the crimes with which he was charged. St. v. Arledge, 228 M 225, 741 P2d 781, 44 St. Rep. 1475 (1987).

The denial of a motion to withdraw a plea of guilty was upheld when the chief contention was that the defendant was misled by the erroneous advice of counsel as to his guilt under the law and when from the record there was evidence that would have justified a finding of guilty, regardless of the correctness of the counsel's interpretation of the law. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

When the defendant pleaded guilty to two charges of murder, was sentenced to life imprisonment on each, and 3 years later filed motions for leave to withdraw his pleas of guilty and substitute pleas of not guilty by reason of insanity caused by alcoholism, alleging in his affidavit that he pleaded on the advice of his attorney and was unaware of the effect of a former section requiring consecutive terms if a person had been convicted of two or more offenses before sentence had been pronounced for either, it was held that the evidence was sufficient to deny the motions, that the court did not abuse its discretion in finding him sane when he pleaded, that he was faithfully represented, and that he was aware that he couldn't escape a jury trial and a possible death sentence if he had done otherwise. St. v. Hukoveh, 115 M 125, 139 P2d 538 (1943).

Request to Withdraw Guilty Plea Based on Recanted Testimony — Trial Court Determination of Veracity: Following Miller's conviction for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and felony sexual assault of his stepchildren, he moved to withdraw his guilty plea based on letters that his sons wrote to the court recanting portions of their previous statements, letters, and interviews describing the abuse. Miller contended that it was error to refuse his motion to withdraw his plea on the basis of undisputed new evidence that the sons exaggerated the charges. The Supreme Court applied the same rationale as is used in dealing with a motion for a new trial based on recanting of trial testimony, namely that: (1) recanting testimony should be viewed with extreme suspicion; (2) the weight to be given recanted testimony is for the District Court to determine; and (3) withdrawal of a guilty plea is required only when the court is satisfied that the recantation is true. Having specifically concluded that the recantation was false, denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Miller, 253 M 395, 833 P2d 1040, 49 St. Rep. 481 (1992).

Three-Year Delay in Filing Petition to Withdraw Plea — Untimeliness: Defendant waited almost 3 years before filing a petition for postconviction relief and offered no explanation for the delay. This suggests that the petition was not the result of a bona fide claim that defendant misunderstood the plea agreement, but rather merely a desire to alter the agreement. Because the interrogation as to defendant's understanding of her plea was adequate and the test of promptness of the attempt to withdraw the plea was not met, it was not error for the District Court to dismiss the petition. St. v. Bull Coming, 253 M 71, 831 P2d 578, 49 St. Rep. 376 (1992).

Denial of Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Proper — No Showing of Ineffective Counsel: The Supreme Court held that there is no abuse of discretion by a lower court in denying a motion to withdraw a guilty plea if the motion is based on lack of effective counsel and the lower court finds counsel was adequate. St. v. Aills, 250 M 533, 822 P2d 87, 48 St. Rep. 960 (1991).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Based on Ineffective Counsel: As set out in Hill v. Lockhart, 474 US 52, 88 L Ed 2d 203, 106 S Ct 366 (1985), when a guilty plea rather than the result of a trial is at issue in determining effectiveness of counsel, the defendant must demonstrate that but for counsel's deficient performance, defendant would not have pleaded guilty and would have insisted on going to trial. Failure to present such evidence, coupled with a lack of evidence showing that counsel's performance fell below the range of competence reasonably demanded of attorneys in criminal cases, was adequate to substantiate denial of defendant's petition for postconviction relief based on ineffective representation. St. v. Senn, 244 M 56, 795 P2d 973, 47 St. Rep. 1389 (1990), followed in St. v. Jungers, 245 M 519, 802 P2d 615, 47 St. Rep. 2229 (1990), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992), St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787, 50 St. Rep. 1511 (1993), St. v. Duff, 262 M 288, 865 P2d 238, 50 St. Rep. 1561 (1993), and In re Petition of Hinman, 271 M 167, 895 P2d 609, 52 St. Rep. 351 (1995).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Inappropriate Remedy: The defendant pleaded guilty to a sexual offense after being told he would be eligible for parole in 1 year. The prosecutor and the judge were unaware that the prison's sexual offender program was a 2-year program. Due to the length of the program, the defendant was denied parole. The Supreme Court held that granting the writ of habeas corpus was proper because the guilty plea had been based upon a fundamental misunderstanding as to its consequences. The court also held that the lower court was correct in granting the defendant parole rather than allowing him to withdraw his plea, which would lead to further proceedings. Benjamin v. McCormick, 243 M 252, 792 P2d 7, 47 St. Rep. 887 (1990). See also St. v. Brown, 262 M 499, 865 P2d 282, 50 St. Rep. 1658 (1993).

Untimely Request for Withdrawal of Bargained Guilty Plea Based on Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The Supreme Court applied the rule for allowing withdrawal of a guilty plea as set forth in St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984), and held that defendant's motion was properly refused by the trial court. The trial judge's interrogation at the time he took defendant's plea was adequate. Defendant's request was not timely. It was made more than a year after entering the plea. Defendant's plea was clearly the result of a plea bargain. Furthermore, defendant's reasons for wanting to withdraw his guilty plea centered around his ineffective assistance of counsel claim, which the Supreme Court rejected. St. v. LaTray, 220 M 358, 715 P2d 52, 43 St. Rep. 429 (1986), followed in St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992).

Adequate Interrogation Based on Written Acknowledgment and Oral Questions: The defendant entered a guilty plea pursuant to a plea bargain. At his sentencing hearing, he moved to withdraw the plea. The District Court denied his motion, and on appeal he contended abuse of discretion by the District Court in not allowing him to withdraw his guilty plea. In St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984), the Supreme Court outlined three factors in reviewing a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. The second and third factors were not in dispute in this case. As to the adequacy of interrogation factor, the Supreme Court found that at his change of plea hearing, defendant submitted a written "acknowledgement of waiver of rights by plea of guilty". That document also contained the defendant's handwritten statement of the facts which were the basis for his guilty plea. Before accepting the guilty plea, the District Court questioned him as to the authenticity and contents of the acknowledgment. The Supreme Court held, in St. v. Laverdure, 212 M 31, 685 P2d 375, 41 St. Rep. 1570 (1984), that a written acknowledgment combined with oral questioning constituted adequate interrogation. Therefore, concluding that the District Court adequately interrogated defendant as to the consequences of his plea and finding no abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court order. St. v. Walker, 220 M 70, 712 P2d 1348, 43 St. Rep. 182 (1986), followed in St. v. Duff, 262 M 288, 865 P2d 238, 50 St. Rep. 1561 (1993). Duff was followed in St. v. Wilson, 1999 MT 52, 293 M 429, 976 P2d 962, 56 St. Rep. 220 (1999).

Motion to Withdraw Competent, Voluntary Guilty Plea Denied: The defendant entered into a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and aggravated assault, and then sought to withdraw his guilty plea. The District Court held a hearing on defendant's motion and found that at the time of his guilty plea he was not acting under the influence of drugs or alcohol, admitted that his counsel were competent and kept him well-advised, and admitted in open court the facts upon which his guilt was based. The court also found, through questioning of the defendant and his counsel, that he was competent, acting voluntarily, and understood the charges and possible punishment. The District Court acted correctly in denying defendant's motion to withdraw his guilty plea. St. v. Peterson, 211 M 231, 683 P2d 490, 41 St. Rep. 1328 (1984).

Factors:

The defendant entered into a plea agreement, pleaded guilty to mitigated deliberate homicide and aggravated assault, and then sought to withdraw his guilty plea. The District Court held a hearing on defendant's motion and found that at the time of his guilty plea he was not acting under the influence of drugs or alcohol, admitted that his counsel were competent and kept him well-advised, and admitted in open court the facts upon which his guilt was based. The court also found, through questioning of the defendant and his counsel, that he was competent, acting voluntarily, and that he understood the charges and possible punishment. The District Court acted correctly in denying defendant's motion to withdraw guilty plea. St. v. Peterson, 211 M 231, 683 P2d 490, 41 St. Rep. 1328 (1984).

There are three important factors to be considered when a defendant attempts to withdraw a bargained plea: (1) adequacy of the court's interrogation when the plea was entered as to defendant's understanding of the plea; (2) that the plea resulted from plea bargaining; and (3) the promptness of the motion to withdraw. A plea change will be permitted only if it fairly appears that defendant was ignorant of his rights and the consequences of his act or was unduly and improperly influenced by hope or fear in making the plea or that the plea was entered under some mistake or misapprehension. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984). These factors were applied in St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992). However, see St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), in which the factors were replaced by the federal voluntariness standard. See also St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991), St. v. Johnson, 274 M 124, 907 P2d 150, 52 St. Rep. 1186 (1995), and St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592, 54 St. Rep. 353 (1997). Bowley was followed in St. v. Schoonover, 1999 MT 7, 293 M 54, 973 P2d 230, 56 St. Rep. 30 (1999), and St. v. Garner, 2001 MT 222, 306 M 462, 36 P3d 346 (2001).

An appeal of a court's refusal to permit a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea involved a balancing of three conflicting factors: (1) the adequacy of the interrogation by the District Court of the defendant at the entry of the guilty plea as to the defendant's understanding of the consequences of his plea; (2) the promptness with which the defendant attempted to withdraw the prior plea; and (3) the fact that the defendant's plea was apparently the result of a plea bargain in which the guilty plea was given in exchange for dismissal of another charge. St. v. Huttinger, 182 M 50, 595 P2d 363 (1979), followed in St. v. Long, 227 M 199, 738 P2d 487, 44 St. Rep. 1008 (1987), St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991), and St. v. Schaff, 1998 MT 104, 288 M 421, 958 P2d 682, 55 St. Rep. 396 (1998), and overruled in St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), which replaced the Huttinger factors and adopted the federal voluntariness test as the ultimate test for withdrawal of a plea. These factors were applied in St. v. Miller, 248 M 194, 810 P2d 308 (1991), St. v. Mason, 253 M 419, 833 P2d 1058, 49 St. Rep. 506 (1992), St. v. Milinovich, 269 M 68, 887 P2d 214, 51 St. Rep. 1433 (1994), and St. v. Osterloth, 2000 MT 129, 299 M 517, 1 P3d 946, 57 St. Rep. 533 (2000). See also St. v. Coggins, 257

M 440, 849 P2d 1033, 50 St. Rep. 347 (1993), St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999), and St. v. Kellames, 2002 MT 41, 308 M 347, 43 P3d 293 (2002).

Prison's Custody Classification as Alleged Violation of Plea Bargaining Agreement — Withdrawal of Plea Denied: Under a plea bargain agreement, defendant was sentenced to 10 years as a nondangerous offender (see 1995 repeal of 46-18-404) without parole. Upon entering prison, he was held in close custody for 24 months under prison rules calling for dangerous offenders and those sentenced without parole to serve 24 months in close custody prior to being considered for transfer to lower, more amenable custody levels. The prosecution, defense counsel, defendant, and judge were all unaware of those rules. Defendant was not entitled to withdraw his plea on the ground he was kept in close custody for 24 months in violation of his plea agreement. There was no violation of the agreement, nor was he entitled to the additional good time credits he would have received had he not been held so long in close custody. Prison officials take many factors into account in making custody reclassifications, and there was no guarantee he would have been held in close custody only for the time he claimed he should have been upon entry to the prison. St. v. Mesler, 210 M 92, 682 P2d 714, 41 St. Rep. 939 (1984).

Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding — State Denial of Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Upheld — Defendant's Right to Be Informed of Maximum Sentence: Where the defendant pleaded guilty in 1975 to one count of rape in exchange for the dismissal of other charges by the state and the Montana Supreme Court refused to grant a request in 1979 that the guilty plea be withdrawn, the defendant's request for federal habeas corpus relief would not be granted because the defendant was aware that his plea obviated a trial and because defendant's counsel was properly supplied with the names of the defendant's victims. The Montana Supreme Court also properly found that the defendant had actual knowledge of the maximum sentence that could be imposed against him and that there was no legal requirement in effect at the time of defendant's sentencing that he be informed on the record of the potential maximum sentence. In accordance with St. v. Griffin, 167 M 11, 535 P2d 498 (1975), each case must be determined on its own facts, and since there was, under the rationale of Marshall v. Lonberger, 459 US 422, 74 L Ed 2d 646, 103 S Ct 843 (1983), at least "fair support" in the record for the findings of the Montana Supreme Court, the Writ of Habeas Corpus relief was denied. Haynie v. Crist, 40 St. Rep. 923 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Competence of Defendant to Plead Not in Issue: The competence of the defendant to plead guilty was not at issue even though the defendant withdrew his notice of intent to rely on mental defect as a defense, requested to confer with the County Attorney without his counsel, and pleaded guilty against the advice of his counsel. Because the defendant outlined the facts of the crimes at the time of entry of his plea and 5 months later gave the same testimony at another trial, he was in full possession of his mental faculties. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Failure of Court to Explain Differences Among Counts: After pleading guilty to multiple counts arising from a homicide, the defendant made a voluntary statement to the court clearly showing he was guilty on two counts of deliberate homicide. Failure of the District Court to explain the differences between deliberate homicide, mitigated homicide, and aggravated assault did not provide grounds for withdrawal of the guilty plea. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982).

Voluntariness of Withdrawal of Guilty Plea Against Advice of Counsel: The defendant persisted in pleading guilty in spite of his counsel's advice to plead not guilty. The defendant could not later request a withdrawal of the plea, claiming he had not made a voluntary and intelligent choice. St. v. Wilson, 198 M 305, 645 P2d 958, 39 St. Rep. 1000 (1982).

Voluntary, Understanding, Explained Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal: Defendant and three friends had been drinking and taking LSD. Defendant planned to get valuable coins from one friend and not pay for them. The friend found out about defendant's plan. Defendant stabbed him to death and sank the body through a hole in the ice on the Tongue River. Defendant was arrested and arraigned. He pleaded not guilty to deliberate homicide. He underwent psychiatric evaluation and was found competent to stand trial. Defendant then requested that he be allowed to change his plea to guilty. The District Court questioned him at length on the voluntariness of his decision and his understanding of the consequences accompanying the changed plea. On appeal, defendant contended it was error not to later allow him to withdraw the guilty plea. Defendant was advised of the elements of deliberate homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide. He was also advised of the required mental state for the offense charged. The Supreme Court held that the combination of the District Judge's examination and the explanation by defendant's attorney was sufficient to show that defendant had "real notice" of all that was required to make a voluntary and understanding plea of guilty to deliberate homicide. It was not error to later deny the request to withdraw the plea. St. v. White, 194 M 421, 632 P2d 1118, 38 St. Rep. 1417 (1981).

Withdrawal of Guilty Plea — Discretion of Court:

It is the sole province of the trial court to determine whether a motion to withdraw a guilty plea should be granted. The abuse of discretion required to reverse the lower court is not present in this case in light of petitioner's continual insistence on a guilty plea, the evidence against him, and the careful and explicit explanation given the petitioner by the court. In re Hardy, 188 M 506, 614 P2d 528 (1980).

The granting or refusal of permission to withdraw a plea of guilty and substitute a plea of not guilty rests in the discretion of the trial court and is subject to review only when an abuse of discretion is shown. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea — 5 ½ Years After Plea: The District Court did not err in refusing to grant defendant's motion to withdraw a plea of guilty to one charge of rape, which was arrived at after extensive plea bargaining, accompanied by a dismissal of 10 remaining counts. Though the court's interrogation of defendant at time he entered the plea of guilty was inadequate, the defendant waited 5 ½ years before he expressed dissatisfaction with his plea, and he may not, after this length of time, escape the obligations of a plea bargain and accept its benefits. St. v. Haynie, 186 M 374, 607 P2d 1128 (1980).

Accepting Guilty Plea When Innocence Claimed: A defendant's claim that it was error to accept his guilty plea because he professed innocence on some charges and could not recall whether he committed another crime charged was rejected. The Supreme Court held that there is no constitutional prohibition against accepting the guilty plea of a defendant who denied his actual guilt. Since there is no set standard to be applied by a court in handling motions to withdraw a guilty plea, the trial court's decision is subject to review only upon a showing of abuse of discretion. When the trial court record included a substantial factual basis for the plea and further showed the defendant's almost obstinate insistence that he be allowed to plead guilty to all five counts, there was no abuse of discretion. The State's affidavit of probable cause to support its motion for leave to file an information and the arraignment transcript established an adequate basis for the defendant's plea. In re Brown, 185 M 200, 605 P2d 185 (1980), followed in St. v. Cameron, 253 M 95, 830 P2d 1284, 49 St. Rep. 150 (1992).

Withdrawal of Plea Which Should Not Have Been Accepted — Incapacitated Defendant Unaware of Elements of Offense: The defendant was not made aware of the differing elements of assault as set forth in 45-5-201 and 45-5-202, and the District Court had before it evidence indicating that defendant was under the influence of a combination of drugs and alcohol and was possibly suffering from mental distress or instability at the time of the alleged assault. Under these circumstances the judge should not have accepted defendant's guilty plea, and defendant should be allowed to withdraw the plea. St. v. Nelson, 184 M 491, 603 P2d 1050, 36 St. Rep. 2228 (1979).

Mental Incompetence at Time of Crime: Since there was no contention that the guilty plea was involuntarily or unintelligently entered and since the Supreme Court found no new evidence showing defendant to be mentally incompetent at the time of the alleged crime, as defendant asserted, the defendant's motion to withdraw his guilty plea was properly denied. St. v. Hilton, 183 M 13, 597 P2d 1171 (1979). See also St. v. Walker, 220 M 70, 712 P2d 1348, 43 St. Rep. 182 (1986), and In re Petition of Hinman, 271 M 167, 895 P2d 609, 52 St. Rep. 351 (1995).

Improper Refusal to Permit Withdrawal of Plea:

Because there was evidence that the petitioner had always maintained his innocence, pleaded guilty only after being induced to do so by his attorney of record, and feared he had no chance of proving his innocence in a jury trial, the District Court abused its discretion in not allowing a withdrawal of the guilty plea and ordering a trial on the merits. State ex rel. Gladue v. District Court, 175 M 509, 575 P2d 65 (1978), followed in St. v. Ereth, 1998 MT 197, 290 M 294, 964 P2d 26, 55 St. Rep. 831 (1998).

The court held, on the facts of the particular case, that when the defendant at the time of entering his plea of guilty thought that he had an understanding as to what his sentence would be and no direct commitment was made to him by any of the officers, but the officers had made statements to others who were in contact with the defendant and upon whose advice he relied, the ends of justice would be best served by permitting the defendant to change his plea. St. v. Morgan, 131 M 58, 307 P2d 244 (1957), distinguished in St. v. Mack, 134 M 301, 330 P2d 968 (1958).

When the evidence discloses that there was a grave doubt that the defendant had the mental capacity to appreciate and understand what he was doing and the consequences thereof and when, without benefit of counsel, he pleaded guilty to the charge of murder, the defendant should have been allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty and enter a plea of not guilty. St. v. Dryman, 125 M 500, 241 P2d 821 (1952), distinguished in St. v. Bischert, 131 M 152, 308 P2d 969 (1957).

The defendant, a Mexican without education and unfamiliar with court procedure, stood charged with murder in the first degree. When he asked for a jury trial, his first attorney asked to be relieved of his assignment; the second advised the defendant to plead guilty and take a life sentence because, if he were tried by jury, the sentence would be one of death. The defendant's plea was guilty, and the trial court imposed the death sentence. The court held that the trial court abused its discretion in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for permission to change his plea to one of not guilty. St. v. Casaras, 104 M 404, 66 P2d 774 (1937).

Doubt Resolved in Favor of Trial on Merits — Supervisory Control: The District Court did not err in reversing an order of the Justice's Court denying a motion for the withdrawal of a guilty plea made inadvisedly without an understanding of the consequences, since doubts should be resolved in favor of a trial on the merits. There was no impropriety sufficient to invoke the supervisory control of the Supreme Court, even though it would have been a proper form of review. St. v. Doty, 173 M 233, 566 P2d 1388 (1977), distinguished in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Denial of Motion to Withdraw: When, after originally pleading not guilty, the defendant, on advice of counsel, pleaded guilty to a charge of burglary as part of a plea bargaining arrangement, after which time evidence of the burglary was returned to its owner, he could not change his plea back to not guilty upon recapture after his escape from jail. St. v. Sattler, 170 M 35, 549 P2d 1080 (1976).

Renewed Charge After Withdrawal of Guilty Plea: A defendant who pleaded guilty to a lesser offense after the jury was seated, but prior to the calling of any witnesses, and then 2 months later withdrew his guilty plea was properly recharged with the original greater offense without violation of his protection against double jeopardy. St. v. Cunningham, 166 M 530, 535 P2d 186 (1975).

Motion to Withdraw — Time for Filing:

The District Court did not abuse its discretion in entering an order denying the defendant's motion to withdraw his plea of guilty when the record disclosed that the defendant entered his plea of "guilty" on December 30, 1960; sentence was pronounced on January 23, 1961; and the motion was not filed in the District Court until July 24, 1961, 6 months after imposition of the sentence and 6 months and 24 days after entry of the plea. St. v. Peters, 140 M 162, 369 P2d 418 (1962).

In order to receive favorable consideration, an application to withdraw a plea of guilty should be made within a reasonable time. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

Doubt That Guilty Plea Voluntary: On the hearing of an application of the defendant for permission to change his plea of guilty to not guilty, any doubt that the first plea was not voluntary should be resolved in his favor and in favor of a trial on the merits. The plea should be entirely voluntary by one competent to know the consequences and should not be induced by fear, persuasion, promise, or ignorance. St. v. Casaras, 104 M 404, 66 P2d 774 (1937).

PLEA BARGAIN

(See 1985 amendment note.)

Plea Not Considered Involuntary Based on Defendant's Belief in Designation as Low-Level Sexual Offender: Brinson entered a plea agreement stating that he would be sentenced to 20 years suspended if he completed a sexual offender evaluation with an evaluator certified by the Montana Sex Offender Treatment Association (MSOTA) and if the evaluator concluded that Brinson was a low risk to reoffend. However, if Brinson was not found to be a low risk, the parties would be free to argue for an appropriate sentence. Brinson received two evaluations. A non-MSOTA evaluator found Brinson to be a level 1 low-risk offender, but an MSOTA evaluator concluded that Brinson was a level 2 moderate-risk offender. The sentencing court held that because Brinson was not found to be a low risk by an MSOTA evaluator, the suspended sentence provisions of the plea agreement did not apply. The court subsequently adopted the recommendation in the presentence investigation report and sentenced Brinson to 20 years in prison with 10 years suspended. Brinson appealed on grounds that he was misled by the plea bargain, however slightly, so withdrawal of the guilty plea was warranted. The Supreme Court disagreed. The court disapproved the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea. Even though Brinson's expectations were bolstered by the low-level evaluation 3 months after his plea, those subsequent expectations were irrelevant to whether the plea was voluntary when entered. Even though Brinson may have had a good faith belief that he would ultimately be designated a low-risk offender, he presented no objective proof that he was assured of receiving that designation. In fact, the plea agreement was clear that a low-risk designation might not be forthcoming, so Brinson's argument that the plea was involuntary because it was induced by a misrepresentation or an unfulfillable promise was unpersuasive. The sentencing court did not err in denying Brinson's motion to withdraw the plea. St. v. Brinson, 2009 MT 200, 351 M 136, 210 P3d 164 (2009), overruling St. v. Lone Elk, 2005 MT 56, 326 M 214, 108 P3d 500 (2005), and St. v. Deserly, 2008 MT 242, 344 M 468, 188 P3d 1057 (2008), regarding applicability of the "however slightly" language in the analysis of the voluntariness of a plea.

Plea Agreement as Contract: The state charged Smietanka with the felony offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Smietanka and the state subsequently entered into a plea agreement pursuant to which the state agreed to amend the information to charge misdemeanor offenses of assault and negligent endangerment and eliminate the sexual intercourse without consent offense. The state further agreed to recommend that the District Court sentence Smietanka to a 6-month suspended sentence on each count, with the sentences to run concurrently, and with credit for 200 days for time served in jail. In return, Smietanka agreed to plead guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses and to pay a fine, public defender fees, and costs as determined by the court. Smietanka appeared in District Court and pleaded guilty to the two misdemeanor offenses. The court accepted the guilty pleas and proceeded directly to sentencing. The state then recommended a 6-month suspended sentence on the assault offense and a concurrent 12-month suspended sentence on the negligent endangerment offense, with 200 days credit for time served. The state also requested the court impose restitution payable to the Montana Department of Justice's crime victims compensation program. A plea agreement is a contract between the state and a defendant. Prosecutors are required to meet strict and meticulous standards in both promise and performance when fulfilling the state's obligations pursuant to a plea agreement. A prosecutor's violation of a plea agreement is unacceptable, even when made inadvertently in a good faith pursuit of a just outcome. The case was reversed and remanded to the District Court for resentencing. St. v. Smietanka, 2008 MT 357, 346 M 353, 195 P3d 797, (2008).

Sentence Based on Recommendation of Sexual Offender Evaluator — State Breach of Plea Agreement by Presenting Conflicting Testimony of Different Evaluator: In a plea agreement, the state agreed to recommend one sentence if Rahn was designated by a sexual offender evaluator as a level 2 or lower offender and a harsher sentence if Rahn was designated as a level 3 offender. An evaluator who personally evaluated Rahn opined that Rahn should be designated as a level 2 offender. At the sentencing hearing, the state presented testimony by a different evaluator, who had not evaluated Rahn, attacking the level 2 designation and arguing that Rahn should be designated as a level 3 offender. Rahn objected on grounds that the state witness's testimony breached the plea agreement, but the sentencing court overruled the objection and subsequently designated Rahn as a level 3 offender and imposed the harsher sentence. Rahn appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Rahn complied with the plea agreement, but the state's conduct in presenting alternate testimony and recommending a level 3 designation was not what was agreed upon in the plea bargain; therefore, the state breached the plea agreement. The state was obligated to make the recommendation as agreed upon in the plea bargain, and the Supreme Court remanded for resentencing with a different judge pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008).

State Breach of Plea Agreement — Remand for Resentencing in Conformity With Sentencing Stipulation: Pursuant to a plea bargain, a youth was placed on probation until age 18 with a sentencing stipulation that if the youth did not follow treatment plans or meet other requirements, the matter would be transferred to District Court and adult supervision. The youth subsequently violated probation and was sent to the Pine Hills correctional facility. The youth reoffended at Pine Hills, and the state moved to transfer the case to District Youth Court. Despite the sentencing stipulation, the state moved for a custodial sentence, and the Youth Court concurred with the state's recommendation and sentenced the youth to the Department of Corrections until age 25, with the last 3 years suspended. The youth appealed. The Supreme Court reversed. Both parties were bound by the terms of the plea agreement, and although the case was transferred to District Court as per the agreement, the state failed to follow the terms of the agreement when it sought a custodial sentence rather than adult supervision for the youth. Upon resentencing following the subsequent revocation for violation of sentencing conditions, the youth was entitled to receive the sentence that was presented to and approved by the Youth Court, and the Youth Court abused its discretion by failing to hold the state to the terms of the sentencing stipulation and by ordering the custodial sentence. On remand, the Youth Court was ordered to resentence the youth in accordance with the terms of the sentencing stipulation. In re H.C.R., 2007 MT 64, 336 M 369, 155 P3d 1221 (2007), following St. v. Rardon, 1999 MT 220, 296 M 19, 986 P2d 424 (1999), and St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002).

State Allowed to Present Evidence Regarding Veracity of Information Defendant Raises in Arguing for Sentence Without Breaching Plea Agreement: At a sentencing hearing, Bartosh testified regarding information in the presentence investigation report, asserting that he had complied with his treatment plan and that certain transcripts of telephone conversations attached to the report should be stricken because they undermined the plea agreement. The District Court declined to strike the transcripts and allowed the probation officer who prepared the report to testify in response to Bartosh's testimony. On appeal, Bartosh contended that it was error to allow the probation officer to testify because the testimony undermined the plea agreement. The Supreme Court held that the telephone transcripts were relevant and properly allowed as indicative of Bartosh's acts. The court also affirmed the sentencing court's decision to allow the probation officer's testimony. Once Bartosh testified as to his conduct concerning compliance with the treatment plan, the state was justified in presenting the probation officer who had conflicting information. If a defendant chooses to present information in support of a sentence, the state may counter with testimony to the effect that the information is misleading or untrue without breaching a plea agreement. St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007).

No Prejudice From Counsel's Failure to Notify Defendant of Minimum Sentence — Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Not Justifying Postconviction Relief — Petition Properly Denied as Matter of Law: In a petition for postconviction relief, Cobell asserted that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because his attorney did not inform him of the minimum 5-year imprisonment penalty for possession of a deadly weapon by a prisoner when Cobell entered a plea agreement wherein the state would recommend the minimum sentence in exchange for Cobell's guilty plea. The District Court summarily dismissed the petition, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The information charging Cobell informed him of the penalty, and Cobell accepted the plea agreement understanding that the sentencing court was free to reject the agreement and impose any appropriate sentence. Given the uncertainty in the agreement and the fact that Cobell received the benefit of the plea bargain, Cobell failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's alleged error. Absent a showing of prejudice, the District Court did not err in dismissing Cobell's petition for postconviction relief as a matter of law. St. v. Cobell, 2004 MT 46, 320 M 122, 86 P3d 20 (2004), followed in Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Improper Prosecutorial Solicitation of Testimony Intended to Undermine Plea Agreement — Choice of Remedies on Remand: The prosecutor in Rardon's sexual assault trial gave lip service to the letter of a plea agreement by recommending the sentence suggested in the presentence investigation, but then went on to solicit inflammatory testimony from the victims that would almost undoubtedly cause the court to question the appropriateness of the recommended sentence, which effectively undercut the plea agreement. Although it is appropriate for a prosecutor to questions victims and solicit their testimony at a sentencing hearing and for victims to express their fears and feelings, it is not acceptable for a prosecutor to aggressively solicit testimony that is clearly intended to undermine a plea agreement and to convince the sentencing court that a bargained sentence agreement should not be accepted. A plea agreement is subject to contract law standards, and prosecutors must meet strict and meticulous standards of both promise and performance. A guilty plea resting on an unfulfilled promise in a plea bargain is involuntary, and prosecutorial violations, even if made inadvertently or in good faith to obtain a just and mutually desired end, are unacceptable. When the prosecution breaches a plea agreement, the sentencing judge may determine the appropriate remedy, which may include withdrawal of the guilty plea or specific performance of the plea agreement in a new sentencing hearing with a different prosecutor and judge. St. v. Rardon, 2002 MT 345, 313 M 321, 61 P3d 132 (2002). On remand, the prosecutor's presentation of the state's case did not undermine the plea bargained sentence recommendation or violate the contract law standards of the plea agreement. The sentencing judge was entitled to consider evidence of Rardon's abusive history and violent tendencies, as well as Rardon's daughter's opinion that Rardon should receive a lengthy sentence. None of the prosecutorial improprieties identified in previous hearings were present in the third sentencing hearing, nor did Rardon demonstrate any other kind of prosecutorial impropriety, so Rardon's third sentence was affirmed. St. v. Rardon, 2005 MT 129, 327 M 228, 115 P3d 182 (2005). The 2005 Rardon decision was followed in St. v. Bartosh, 2007 MT 59, 336 M 212, 154 P3d 58 (2007), and St. v. Rahn, 2008 MT 201, 344 M 110, 187 P3d 622 (2008). See also St. v. Lamere, 272 M 355, 900 P2d 926 (1995), St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), and St. v. Munoz, 2001 MT 85, 305 M 139, 23 P3d 922 (2001).

Possible Failure to Inform Defendant of Options and Rights Concerning Advisability of Plea — Remand for Evidentiary Hearing on Issue of Potential Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Lawrence agreed to plead guilty pursuant to a plea agreement under which the state would recommend a 3-year suspended sentence for felony common scheme issuing a bad check. After informing Lawrence that the agreement was not binding, the sentencing court rejected the plea agreement and sentenced Lawrence to 5 years with 2 years suspended. Lawrence filed a pro se petition for postconviction relief, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel. The District Court, without holding an evidentiary hearing, denied the petition and found that Lawrence suffered no harm from anything that counsel did or did not do, because the judge who took the change of plea specifically advised Lawrence that a more severe sentence could be imposed. Lawrence appealed, arguing that counsel's failure to fully inform Lawrence that the judge intended to reject the plea agreement and sentence above the agreement amounted to deficient performance. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant is entitled to withdraw a guilty plea for good cause, including ineffective assistance of counsel. The court cited Hans v. St., 283 M 379, 942 P2d 674 (1997), for the proposition that failure to fully inform a defendant of the consequences of the options and rights concerning the advisability of a plea may constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. If counsel knew that the judge intended to reject the plea agreement and did not inform Lawrence of that fact, Lawrence might have a valid claim of ineffective assistance. However, because no hearing was held on the matter, the Supreme Court had no record to consult other than the allegations in Lawrence's petition. The case was remanded for an evidentiary hearing to resolve these factual issues. St. v. Lawrence, 2001 MT 299, 307 M 487, 38 P3d 809 (2001).

Claim That Guilty Plea to Deliberate Homicide Influenced by Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Conviction Affirmed: Thee was convicted of deliberate homicide and sentenced to 100 years in prison. In a petition for postconviction relief, Thee contended that he was denied effective assistance of counsel prior to and during a change of plea hearing when defense counsel: (1) induced Thee to plead guilty by threatening Thee that he was going to die unless he pleaded guilty; (2) failed to address the alleged violent treatment that Thee received from inmates and guards during Thee's incarceration in the county jail; (3) failed to seek suppression of statements that Thee made during police interrogation that allegedly violated Thee's Miranda rights; (4) failed to have Thee's mental or emotional stress at the time of the homicide evaluated by a qualified mental health examiner to prove circumstances that could be used to mitigate the deliberate homicide charge; and (5) failed to inform Thee of a possibility of seeking conviction on a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court examined each claim in light of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel. First, defense counsel has a duty to inform a client of the elements of an offense, the possible punishment, and the advisability of a plea agreement. Discussion of a death penalty between an attorney and client in a capital case may well invoke extreme anxiety, but nevertheless relates directly, albeit painfully, to the genuine circumstances of the client. Counsel's reported statements to Thee regarding the possibility of a death sentence were within the wide range of reasonable and sound professional assistance of a competent attorney counseling a client facing capital punishment. Second, counsel investigated Thee's allegations of violence in the county jail, prepared a report of the findings, discussed the findings with Thee, and brought the matter to the attention of the appropriate authorities. Counsel's actions stemmed from informed professional deliberation rather than neglect or ignorance, and precluded a finding of deficient performance for failure to investigate Thee's allegations of physical assault. Third, counsel investigated all statements made by Thee to police investigators, conferred with Thee, and researched the legal bases for possible suppression of certain statements. Counsel's strategic choices made after thorough investigation of the law and facts relevant to plausible options were virtually unchallengable, and the fact that counsel reached a legal conclusion on an evidentiary challenge contrary to Thee's hopes provided no ground for finding deficient attorney performance. Fourth, despite Thee's claim to the contrary, counsel did seek and obtain a court-ordered mental health evaluation for Thee, and took the unequivocal findings from the evaluation into account when advising Thee to accept the plea agreement. Finally, counsel had no duty to inform Thee about the possibility of a lesser included offense, because neither mitigated deliberate homicide nor negligent homicide is an included offense of deliberate homicide, so the possibility of conviction on a lesser included offense did not legally exist. The trial court's denial of Thee's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. St. v. Thee, 2001 MT 294, 307 M 450, 37 P3d 741 (2001).

Failure of State to Honor Plea Bargain — Remand: Owens was charged in two informations, alleging theft and forgery, both felonies. A plea bargain stated that the County Attorney would recommend a 15-year sentence for both charges and not seek a persistent offender designation. The state did not contest Owens' understanding of the agreement that Owens would receive a total of 15 years for the two charges, with the sentences running concurrently. At the state's suggestion and over objection, Owens was subsequently sentenced to 15 years with 5 suspended for forgery and 10 years with 5 suspended for theft, a total of 25 years with 10 suspended, with the sentences to run consecutively. Owens' decision to plead guilty based on the promise of concurrent sentencing, coupled with the differences in the restraints of freedom that often accompany suspended sentences, amounted to a prosecutorial violation of the plea bargain agreement warranting remand and resentencing consistent with the plea agreement. St. v. Owens, 254 M 224, 836 P2d 595, 49 St. Rep. 744 (1992). See also Santobello v. New York, 404 US 257, 30 L Ed 2d 427, 92 S Ct 495 (1971), and Correale v. U.S., 479 F2d 944 (1st Cir. 1973).

No Court Assistance in Escaping Plea Bargain Obligations: As a condition of defendant's plea bargain, it was required that he remain a law-abiding citizen, but it was not specifically advised that he could not possess a firearm. When found to be in possession of a firearm, defendant's suspended sentence was revoked, which defendant appealed. It is impossible for a District Court to inform a defendant of every illegal action that could affect defendant upon entering a guilty plea, nor will the Supreme Court assist an accused criminal in escaping the obligations of a plea bargain after accepting its benefits. St. v. Reynolds, 253 M 386, 833 P2d 153, 49 St. Rep. 463 (1992), followed in St. v. Barker, 257 M 31, 847 P2d 300, 50 St. Rep. 147 (1993), and St. v. Milinovich, 269 M 68, 887 P2d 214, 51 St. Rep. 1433 (1994). See also St. v. Koepplin, 213 M 55, 689 P2d 921 (1984), and St. v. Radi, 250 M 155, 818 P2d 1203, 48 St. Rep. 903 (1991).

Court Not Bound by Plea Agreement: The express purpose of the 1985 amendment to 46-12-204 was to overturn St. v. Cavanaugh, 207 M 237, 673 P2d 482 (1983), and to make it clear that a plea bargain is an agreement between the prosecutor and the accused only. The District Court is not bound by the agreement. If the court chooses not to follow the prosecutor's recommendation pursuant to the plea bargain, it is not required to allow the defendant to withdraw his plea of guilty. St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989).

Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea Denied — Plea Bargain Statute Constitutional: Defendant alleged that because the trial judge would not allow him to withdraw his guilty plea after rejecting the sentence recommended as part of a plea bargain, defendant was deprived of his constitutional rights, and therefore 46-12-204 was unconstitutional. In affirming the constitutionality of 46-12-204, the Supreme Court noted that when a defendant makes a voluntary and intelligent plea, he knowingly waives certain constitutional rights, regardless of whether or not the judge accepts the recommended sentence. If there has been a proper colloquy regarding the defendant's rights and the liabilities of a guilty plea, he has been informed of his constitutional rights, he is aware that he is giving up those rights, and the plea bargain agreement is clear as to its limitations, then the judge does not have to accept a guilty plea withdrawal attempt. St. v. Martz, 233 M 136, 760 P2d 65, 45 St. Rep. 1370 (1988), followed in St. v. Yother, 253 M 128, 831 P2d 1347, 49 St. Rep. 387 (1992).

Rejection of Part of Bargain — Right to Withdraw Plea and Plead Not Guilty: Petitioner for postconviction relief had engaged in plea bargaining and pled guilty to aggravated kidnapping and aggravated assault. No one told him that the judge might impose a restriction that petitioner be ineligible for parole or the supervised release program, which the judge did on sentencing. The petitioner was not fully informed of the consequences of his plea, and he should have been permitted to withdraw it upon petitioning for postconviction relief. A judge accepting a plea and rejecting any other part of a plea bargain must afford defendant the opportunity to withdraw his plea and plead not guilty. In this case, the decision was applied prospectively only, beginning with petitioner. Since more than 6 years had elapsed since sentencing and crucial witnesses might not be available, the State would be allowed on remand to elect either to have petitioner withdraw his plea with the State having the right to revive its dismissed charges or to have petitioner sentenced in accordance with the plea bargain. St. v. Cavanaugh, 207 M 237, 673 P2d 482, 40 St. Rep. 2007 (1983), followed in St. v. Hendricks, 213 M 507, 691 P2d 1333, 41 St. Rep. 315 (1984), and impliedly overruled in St. v. Buckman, 236 M 37, 768 P2d 1361, 46 St. Rep. 163 (1989).

Plea Agreement — Not Recorded in Conformance With Court Rules — Defendant to Replead: Defendant pleaded guilty on the assumption that an agreement had been reached that in return for the guilty plea the prosecution would make no recommendation to the court on sentencing. On the plea of guilty, the prosecutor recommended 10 years and the defendant was so sentenced. On the motion to withdraw the guilty plea, it was error for the judge to determine that there was no agreement solely because court rules require that such an agreement must be made on the record by a court reporter and in this case no such record was made. St. v. Dinndorf, 202 M 308, 658 P2d 372, 40 St. Rep. 106 (1983).

Plea Bargain Refused by Judge — Sentence Imposed Larger Than Plea Bargain: A judge participated in a plea bargain involving a proposed agreement for a 5-year sentence but ultimately refused to accept the proposal. After the trial the judge sentenced the defendant to 13 years. When a plea bargain is not completed, the participating judge must state for the record the reasons supporting a sentence greater than that offered by the defendant prior to trial. St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

Plea Bargain Agreement Asserted After Sentence Imposed: A criminal defendant was sentenced to 20 years in prison. Two months later, his defense counsel alleged a plea bargain agreement in which the County Attorney promised to recommend a suspended sentence. The purported agreement was contained in a letter from defense counsel to the County Attorney. The case was appealed and remanded for an evidentiary hearing on the terms of the plea bargaining agreement and to determine whether the prosecutor violated the agreement in St. v. Allen, 197 M 64, 645 P2d 380, 38 St. Rep. 2192 (1981). Because the defendant failed to assert the plea bargain agreement until 2 months after sentencing and because there was evidence of plea bargain negotiations subsequent to the letter, the original sentence was upheld. A plea bargain will be enforced only if it is based upon expectations reasonably formed in reliance upon a promise of the County Attorney. St. v. Allen, 685 P2d 333, 39 St. Rep. 899 (1982) (first decision erroneously reproduced at 199 M 204 (1982)).

Misuse of Plea Bargaining Process and Habitual Criminal Statute: Without declaring the plea bargaining process constitutionally infirm or the habitual criminal statute unconstitutional on its face, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was denied due process under federal and state provisions when he realistically was sentenced to 10 years for attempted burglary and 40 years for refusing to plead guilty and insisting upon a jury trial. St. v. Sather, 172 M 428, 564 P2d 1306 (1977).

Enforceability of Plea Bargaining Agreement: A plea bargain was held to be unenforceable under the particular fact situation. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Guilty Plea Under Agreement With Prosecutor: While the Supreme Court will not encourage the making of bargains with persons charged with crime, when a defendant has changed his plea of not guilty to a plea of guilty on an agreement with the prosecuting attorney as to the recommendation for sentences, which was carried out, the Supreme Court will not, after the defendant obtained the benefits of the agreement, aid him in escaping its obligations by ordering a withdrawal of the guilty plea. St. v. Nance, 120 M 152, 184 P2d 554 (1947), distinguished in St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948), and followed in St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

PLEA OTHER THAN "GUILTY" OR "NOT GUILTY"

Written "Special Plea in Bar" Not Authorized: The Justice of the Peace was acting within his jurisdiction and in accordance with the law in overruling the defendant's written special plea in bar and ordering the defendant to answer to the complaint. State ex rel. Borberg v. District Court, 125 M 481, 240 P2d 854 (1952).

46-16-106. Time to prepare for trial.

Commission Comments

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7008.

This section leaves to the discretion of the judge the determination of what is "a reasonable time to prepare for trial."

Case Notes

No Error in Allowing Statement Not Disclosed by State Prior to Trial and in Refusing Request for Continuance: On the first day of Strauss's negligent homicide trial, the prosecution disclosed to the District Court that an acquaintance of Strauss, a state witness, had indicated that Strauss had made a statement that was relevant to the shooting. Strauss's counsel argued in chambers that if the witness was allowed to testify about the statement, Strauss would move for mistrial. The District Court held that because the acquaintance was a listed witness and had been available to be interviewed by Strauss, no discovery violation occurred. The court also noted that the witness was not scheduled to testify until the following day, so Strauss could interview the witness that evening or be granted a brief continuance following cross-examination of the witness; however, Strauss chose instead to request a mistrial or 2-week continuance the next morning. The request was denied, and on appeal, Strauss contended that a fair trial was denied because there had been insufficient time to prepare to impeach the witness. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because Strauss turned down additional time to prepare further impeachment and offered no evidence to indicate that the defense was prejudiced, the District Court did not err in allowing the witness to testify or in disallowing Strauss's request for a 2-week continuance. St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003).

Cost of Jury Selection and Prosecution Improperly Charged to Indigent Defendant: It was determined that Winterrowd was indigent, so counsel was appointed for him from the public defender's office. After being informed that Winterrowd had received a social security settlement and would no longer be considered indigent, the public defender moved to withdraw. Trial was continued to allow Winterrowd to obtain counsel. About 1 week before the scheduled hearing, Winterrowd moved for another continuance because the settlement had not arrived and he had not yet retained counsel. The state objected, arguing that Winterrowd had not demonstrated due diligence and that his claim that he would receive a settlement was unsupported by documentation. The trial court did not rule on the continuance motion. At the start of trial, Winterrowd again moved for a continuance, but the motion was denied. The trial proceeded through voir dire, with Winterrowd acting pro se. Following a break, the court granted the motion to continue and excused the jurors but ordered Winterrowd to pay the costs incurred in summoning the jurors and in prosecuting him. After granting the public defender's motion to withdraw, it was error for the court to charge Winterrowd with the costs when he was unable to obtain counsel. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Denial of Motion for Continuance — Trial Court Discretion: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the court did not err in denying defendant's motion for a continuance, in which defendant argued he was deprived of his right to effective counsel, due process, and time to prepare his case. Motions for continuance are directed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the trial court will not be reversed absent a showing of prejudice to the movant, citing St. v. Paulson, 167 M 310, 538 P2d 339 (1975). As more than 2 months elapsed between the entry of defendant's plea and his motion for continuance, and because he failed to show any prejudice, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Sufficient Time Allowed:

The trial judge did not abuse his discretion in denying the defendant's application for a continuance over the term when the trial was set for May 7, 1956, after the defendant had entered a plea of guilty on April 24, 1956. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

Under a former section, the defendant was entitled to at least 2 days to prepare for trial. Therefore, when he had 7 months from the day of the entry of his plea to the day of trial for preparation, he had no cause for complaint in this regard. St. v. Showen, 60 M 474, 199 P 917 (1921).

Effect of Unnecessary Amendment of Information and Rearraignment Under Notice: When the original information on attempt to commit arson was sufficient and the defendant pleaded not guilty but the County Attorney, after giving the defendant 10 days' notice of a proposed amendment, was permitted on the day of trial to amend to show the manner and means of the attempt, whereupon the defendant was unnecessarily rearraigned, the fact that he was not given 2 days in which to prepare for trial after the rearraignment under the former statute could not have affected him prejudicially since he had notice and the amendment was unnecessary. St. v. Gaffney, 106 M 310, 77 P2d 398 (1938).

46-16-110. Right to jury trial — waiver.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the defendant's right to a jury in both felony and misdemeanor criminal cases. The statute is compatible with the right to a jury trial established in the Montana Constitution. See Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The statute is intended to supersede the generally stated law that requires a 12-person jury in felony criminal cases. See 1987 MCA 3-15-106. The rule that retains the right to a 12-person jury but that allows agreements to any number less than 12 has been adopted.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1901, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-16-103 and 46-16-104 are also derived from section 95-1901. The commission comments to section 95-1901 are printed in their entirety under 46-16-102 (renumbered 46-16-110).

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section[s] 94-7002, 94-7235, 94-7236 and 94-6804. [1889] Montana Constitution, Article III, section 10 [revised by Art. II, sec. 7, 1972 Mont. Const.].

[Section 46-16-103(1)] is an implementation of Article III, section 23 of the [1889] Montana Constitution [revised by Art. II, sec. 26, 1972 Mont. Const.] which does not allow the defendant to waive his right to trial by jury in felony cases (State v. Scalise, 131 Mont. 238, 309 P.2d 1010), and attempts to avoid the felony-misdemeanor confusion.

[Section 46-16-103(2)] is required to implement Article III, section 10 of the [1889] Montana Constitution [revised by Art. II, sec. 7, 1972 Mont. Const.] and is substantially the same as the present law.

[Section 46-16-110] is an attempt to change the present Montana law. Article III, section 23, of the [1889] Montana Constitution has been interpreted as requiring that a defendant in a felony case be tried by a jury of twelve men. A trial of such a case before a jury of less than twelve men was declared to be a nullity in Territory v. Ah Wah[,] (1881)[,] 4 Mont. 149, 1 P. 732. Also in interpreting Article III, Section 23, the Montana Supreme Court has stated that the defendant cannot waive a jury trial in felony cases. State v. Scalise, 131 Mont. 268, 309 P.2d 1010.

[Section 46-16-110] permits either a stipulation before trial that the case be tried by a jury composed of less then twelve, or a stipulation during trial but before verdict is reached that the case be submitted to less than twelve jurors. This can be a useful provision in the event it becomes necessary during the trial to excuse a juror (due to illness or any other cause) and no alternate juror is available. The U.S. Supreme Court stated that the constitutional right to a jury of twelve persons may be waived, by consenting to a trial by a less number. Patton v. U.S., 281 U.S. 276, 309 (1929).

A number of cases have taken the position that there is a valid distinction between the right to waive trial by jury and the right to waive a full jury, but in Patton v. U.S. the position is taken that there is no difference, that a constitutional jury means twelve men, as though that number had been specifically named. The Supreme Court in Patton allowed a waiver of a full jury on the grounds that under U.S. Constitution, Article III, section 2, a jury trial may be waived in any felony case.

Compiler's Comments

1995 Amendment: Chapter 7 at beginning of (1) substituted "The parties" for "Defendants"; in (3) substituted "parties" for "defendant"; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: In (1), before "cases", substituted "felony" for "criminal" and at end substituted "of 12 persons" for "not to exceed 12 in number"; in (2), at end, substituted "that to which they are entitled" for "12"; in (3) substituted "defendant" for "parties"; and made minor change in style.

Case Notes

Reversal of Conviction for Accepting Oral, Rather Than Written, Waiver of Right to Jury Trial: The constitutional right to a jury trial was violated, requiring reversal, when defendant did not file the statutorily required written consent to waive a jury trial and his attorney stated to the court at the beginning of the trial that defendant waived his right to a jury trial. The court would not examine the totality of the circumstances to determine whether the waiver was knowing and voluntary. St. v. Dahlin, 1998 MT 113, 289 M 182, 961 P2d 1247, 55 St. Rep. 446 (1998), overruling St. v. McCartney 179 M 49, 585 P2d 1321 (1978).

Constitutionality of Defendant's Waiver of Jury Trial in Criminal Case Over Objection of State: Hill waived his right to a jury trial on charges of felony assault (now assault with a weapon), resisting arrest, and obstructing a peace officer. The state objected and demanded a jury trial on all factual issues, contending that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., requires that before a jury trial can be waived, both parties must consent and that therefore a jury trial cannot be waived over the objection of the state. Pursuant to the 1972 change in Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., a jury trial is no longer required as a matter of constitutional law in all felony criminal cases, and nothing in the intent of the framers of the constitution indicated that approval of the state was required to allow waiver of the right. In fact, the constitutional revision was implemented expressly for the benefit of the accused. The Legislature has provided a statutory procedure for waiver of the right to jury trial through the 1991 amendment to this section, which provides that a trial by jury in a criminal case may be waived, without approval of the state, upon written consent of the defendant. The procedure is consistent with the constitutional intent and is therefore not violative of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. (See 1995 amendment.) State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027, 50 St. Rep. 1447 (1993), distinguishing Patton v. U.S., 281 US 276, 74 L Ed 854, 50 S Ct 253 (1930), and Singer v. U.S., 380 US 24, 13 L Ed 2d 630, 85 S Ct 783 (1965), and overruled in State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007).

Waiver of Jury Trial in Justice Court — Right to Jury Trial on Appeal: Defendant waived the right to jury trial in Justice Court and was convicted in a bench trial. Waiver of Jury Trial: The entering of a plea of guilty by a defendant waives his right to a jury trial. St. v. Peters, 140 M 162, 369 P2d 418 (1962).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves 1987 MCA 46-16-301, concerning formation of the jury. It requires that unless otherwise provided in these statutes, the criminal trial jury must be selected in the same manner as juries in civil cases.

Source: New. [See commission comments to 46-16-114 for partial source, but this section is mostly new.]

The intent of this section is to provide that the trial jury be selected in the same manner as juries in civil cases and that in the area of trial jury formation the sections in civil actions be applicable. This will avoid confusion and achieve consistency in the formation of juries. The number of peremptory challenges shall be determined by the number of parties involved. It must be noted that when several defendants are joined they can sever their challenges. See [46-16-115].

1991 Amendment: In (1), in two places, substituted "cases" for "actions" and at end deleted "except that the total number of jurors drawn shall be at least the number of jurors needed plus the total number of peremptory challenges"; and made minor change in style.

1989 Amendment: In (1), after "shall be at least", substituted "the number of jurors needed" for "12".

1981 Amendment: Substituted "excuses" for "exemptions" in (2).

Case Notes

Juror's Fitness to Serve at Discretion of Trial Court: The Supreme Court will not reverse a District Court's decision regarding a juror's fitness to serve absent an abuse of discretion and a showing of prejudice. The trial court has significant latitude when ruling on allegations of juror misconduct because that court is best able to observe jurors and to decide the potential for prejudice, and its determination will be given considerable weight and deference. St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999), followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Absence of Prospective Juror: The failure of a properly notified juror to be present when the jury was impaneled did not invalidate the trial as the defendant had the right only to reject jurors and not to select any particular juror. St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963).

Showing Necessary for New Trial: After the verdict, the accused must make it appear affirmatively that he is entitled to a new trial because he has been deprived of his constitutional right to an impartial jury, and the probability that one juror was incompetent is not sufficient to set aside the verdict. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Extent of Conformity Required: Under former law, it was held that a jury panel in a criminal case must be drawn in substantial conformity with the requirements of the statutes relating to trial juries in civil actions and that those requirements in their essential particulars are mandatory. St. v. Landry, 29 M 218, 74 P 418 (1903).

Commission Comments

Source: Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, section 114-3.

This section outlines the procedure for challenges to the panel of jurors. The objection is directed toward the panel and will generally require an affidavit in order to support the facts which show the improper selection.

The section is substantially the same as the present Montana law as to the challenge of the panel.

A challenge to the panel can be founded only on a material departure from the law in respect to the drawings and return of the jury.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning of second sentence, inserted exception clause and deleted former last sentence that read: "For good cause shown, the court may entertain the motion at any time thereafter"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Failure to Summon Jurors in Statutory Manner — Lamere Per Se Rule Retroactively Applied — Rule of Law Inapplicable Considering Substantial Change in Law: In St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359 (1998), Robbins moved to quash the jury panel because prospective jurors had been summoned by telephone instead of by mail or personal service, as required in 3-15-505. The motion was denied because Robbins failed to introduce any evidence that he was prejudiced, rendering the error harmless. The Supreme Court subsequently decided St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), holding that improper jury summons constituted denial of the fundamental right to a fair trial and thus was per se prejudicial. Robbins then petitioned for postconviction relief on grounds that Lamere should be retroactively applied. The District Court denied the petition, concluding that under the law of the case doctrine, Lamere was not retroactively applicable. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. The law of the case doctrine provides that when a decision is rendered by the Supreme Court, the decision is binding and cannot be relitigated in the trial court or on a subsequent appeal. However, a court may reconsider the issue in postconviction proceedings when there has been a substantial change in applicable law. Lamere specifically overruled the opinion in Robbins' 1998 direct appeal to the extent that a violation of 3-15-505 could be harmless error, which constituted a substantial change in the law, so the law of the case doctrine did not preclude the application of Lamere to Robbins' 2002 postconviction proceedings. Robbins was entitled to retroactive application of Lamere because the state's action in procuring the jury denied Robbins of a right that goes to the very integrity of the justice system, and is implicit in the concept of ordered liberty for purposes of coming within the exception to the retroactivity analysis in Teague v. Lane, 489 US 288 (1989). Robbins v. St., 2002 MT 116, 310 M 10, 50 P3d 134 (2002).

Improper Telephonic Notification of Jury Selection — Harmless Error: Rather than the statutory method of summoning jurors, the District Court Clerk sought to notify available jurors by telephone. If the juror was unavailable by telephone, the Clerk moved to the next name on the list. Robbins objected to the procedure, asserting that the 5-day mandate of this section was not applicable to his motion to strike the venire and that the trial court erred by concluding that the challenge to the summoning process was untimely. The District Court found that the Clerk had substantially complied with the relevant statutes, but the Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the Clerk failed to comply with 3-15-505. However, because Robbins failed to adduce any actual prejudice in the summoning procedure, the error was held to be harmless. St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), followed, with regard to improper use of telephonic summoning of jurors, but overruled, with regard to applicability of the harmless error standard in 46-20-701 and the requirement of an actual showing of prejudice to sustain a challenge to the jury panel under the substantial compliance standard, in St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204, 57 St. Rep. 214 (2000).

Jury Composition — No Evidence of Systematic Effort to Exclude Indians: Defendant claimed to be 5/32 Flathead Indian and then objected to the exclusion of Native Americans from the jury list. The court found no evidence that there was a systematic effort to exclude people of Native American descent from the jury list. St. v. Campbell, 219 M 194, 711 P2d 1357, 42 St. Rep. 1948 (1985).

Retention of Panel Upheld:

The jury was selected in substantial compliance with the law, and the defendant's claim that he was denied a fair and impartial jury must fail. Having more numbers in the jury box than names on the jury list does not destroy the validity of the panel drawn; notifying jurors by telephone is permissible; and having fewer jurors appear than were drawn does not invalidate a trial as a defendant has no right to select a particular juror. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

When two jurors did not appear and were not excused when the jury was impaneled but the defendant could not show affirmatively that the panel had not been served, there was not prejudicial error. St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963).

When the defendant's offer to submit a challenge to the panel on the testimony taken at a prior term of court was withdrawn and no evidence whatever was offered, the defendant's request to discharge the jury was properly denied. St. v. Jones, 32 M 442, 80 P 1095 (1905).

Jury Selection — Constitutionality: A variation between the percentage of Air Force personnel in the county and the percentage of their representation on the jury panel, as taken from the assessment roll, does not reflect a constitutional infirmity in the selection method. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977).

First Objection on Appeal: Absent a showing of good cause by affidavit to substantiate their motion, the defendants cannot challenge the jury panel for the first time on appeal on the ground that the court failed to select and draw the jury panel in accordance with applicable law. (Annotator's note: The Supreme Court proceeded to discuss the objection for future guidelines and concluded by way of dictum that the statutory scheme for selecting and drawing a jury was completely circumvented.) St. v. Fitzpatrick, 174 M 174, 569 P2d 383 (1977).

No Presumption That Jury Commissioners Performed Their Duty:

If a challenge to the panel alleges facts which, if true, would show a material variation from the statutory procedure in making up the jury list, the court could not, on the basis of a presumption that the jury commissioners had done their duty, summarily deny the challenge, particularly in the absence of an exception by the adverse party. St. v. Chapman, 139 M 98, 360 P2d 703 (1961).

When the defendant filed a verified, specific, and detailed challenge to a jury panel and the County Attorney did not deny the sufficiency of the facts alleged and the defendant also filed a timely motion for the issuance of a subpoena to the jury commissioners to appear, the trial court could not presume the jury commissioners had performed their duty in selecting the panel. St. v. Deeds, 130 M 503, 305 P2d 321 (1957).

Question of Fact: When all parties treat a challenge to the panel as raising an issue of fact, the Supreme Court will treat the matter as though an issue had been raised by a denial of the challenge. St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914).

Retention of Panel Error: When the accused interposed a challenge to the jury panel because the Sheriff had intentionally omitted to summon some of the jurors drawn by the jury commission, to which the State took an exception, the court erred in overruling the challenge. St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914).

Substantial Compliance Required: A substantial compliance with the law is required in the work of procuring a jury. Anything less will vitiate such work. St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914); St. v. Landry, 29 M 218, 74 P 418 (1903).

Who May Testify: Under former law, it was held that a Judge of the District Court may be called as a witness when the regularity of the drawing of a jury in a criminal prosecution is questioned by a challenge to the panel, inasmuch as he orders such drawing and directs the clerk during its progress, and that both judicial and ministerial officers whose irregularity is complained of may be called upon to testify. State ex rel. Breen v. District Court, 34 M 107, 85 P 870 (1906).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves 1987 MCA 46-16-303, concerning the examination of potential jurors. Some wording has been changed to maintain compatibility with the statute format. For instance, the term "prosecutor" replaces the term "county attorney".

The provision [in 46-16-114] for address if known is for the convenience of both parties.

[Section 46-16-114] establishes the procedure for and gives the court authority to expedite the selection of a competent jury. The proposed rule follows current Montana practice and is consistent with Montana Rules of Civil Procedure, Rule 47(a).

[Section 46-16-115] is intended to permit flexibility in the selection of the jury.

[Section 46-16-115] states that every party in a criminal proceeding has the right to challenge jurors for cause. This provision is consistent with the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure (Rule 47(b)). However, it changes the present criminal law which provides that when several defendants are tried together, they cannot sever their challenges. (See R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7102 [repealed]).

[Section 46-16-116] is basically the same as existing law in the number of peremptory challenges to be allowed. It provides only two categories as to the number of peremptory challenges rather than four and explicitly provides the state with the same number of peremptory challenges as the defendant.

[Section 46-16-118] specifically provides for alternate jurors as is now permitted in civil and criminal cases (See Montana Rules of Civil Procedure 47(c); R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7232 [repealed]).

[Section 46-16-403] allows the court to affect the result of a proceeding without precluding an appeal by the state as could occur by allowing the court to advise the jury to acquit.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "their", substituted "questionnaires" for "addresses"; in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "prosecutor" for "county attorney" and near beginning of second and third sentences substituted "judge" for "court"; and made minor changes in style.

Applicability of Commission Comments: Applicability of commission comments should be evaluated with reference to subsequent amendments. Case Notes

Improper Denial of Challenge for Cause of Juror Who Could Not Act Without Bias Regarding Presumption of Innocence and Defendant's Right to Refrain From Testifying: During voir dire in Braunreiter's burglary trial, a juror expressed the opinion that because Braunreiter had been charged with the crime, Braunreiter should testify and prove that he didn't commit the crime. Defense counsel moved to dismiss the juror for cause, but after the trial court further questioned the juror regarding the presumption of innocence and the juror's willingness to follow the law, the court denied the motion to dismiss for cause. Defense counsel used a peremptory challenge to dismiss the juror and subsequently exhausted peremptory challenges. Braunreiter was convicted and appealed on grounds that the trial court improperly denied the challenge for cause. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The juror's spontaneous response raised serious questions regarding the juror's ability to act without prejudice to Braunreiter's right to the presumption of innocence and to Braunreiter's right to refrain from testifying, and the juror's response to followup questions failed to alleviate those concerns. Therefore, the trial court could not reasonably conclude that the juror had a state of mind that would allow performance free from prejudice, and the court abused its discretion in denying the challenge for cause. St. v. Braunreiter, 2008 MT 197, 344 M 59, 185 P3d 1024 (2008), following St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008).

No Error in Imposition of Time Limit for Voir Dire: Prior to voir dire in Michaud's misdemeanor DUI trial, the District Court imposed a 15-minute limit on each counsel's voir dire questioning. Prior to counsels' questioning, the court engaged in its own comprehensive voir dire of the panel, addressing in advance many areas of inquiry that counsel would normally explore. Counsel then had the opportunity to engage in a colloquy with jurors regarding potential bias and prejudice, as well as the jurors' understanding of the concepts of reasonable doubt, innocence until proved guilty, and burden of proof. Michaud's counsel's time expired, and following two additional questions, counsel passed the panel for cause. Following conviction, Michaud appealed on grounds that the time limit on voir dire interfered with his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that time limits on voir dire in the name of expedience are not encouraged, but that under these circumstances, the District Court's imposition of a time limit, coupled with the court's own extensive voir dire, was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Michaud, 2008 MT 88, 342 M 244, 180 P3d 636 (2008).

Comments by Prospective Juror Not So Egregious as to Be Incurable — Denial of New Trial Proper: Wright was charged with felony possession of and intent to sell drugs. Wright's attorney had been granted a motion in limine excluding all references regarding the defendant's criminal history. A prospective juror, in response to a question by the judge, responded that he knew the defendant and was aware of a past trial involving the defendant and based on the same kind of charges as the present case. The judge dismissed the prospective juror but refused to dismiss the entire panel. The defendant was convicted on three counts, and the trial judge refused to grant a new trial based on the possible prejudicial effect of the comments by the proposed juror. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly denied a new trial because the comments by the prospective juror were not so egregious as to be incurable by the District Court's admonishment to the jury to decide the case based only on the evidence presented during trial. St. v. Wright, 2002 MT 275, 312 M 352, 59 P3d 432 (2002).

Defendant's Exclusion From In-Chambers Individual Voir Dire Proceedings Violative of Right to Be Present at Critical Stages of Trial: Bird was accused of felony partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, the District Court conducted in-chambers voir dire specifically to elicit prospective jurors' personal feelings and experiences regarding domestic violence. Both the prosecutor and defense counsel were present, but Bird was not. Once the jury panel was passed for cause, the court recessed and met with counsel in chambers to allow the exercise of peremptory challenges, but again Bird was not included in the meeting. At the close of the meeting, the prosecutor noticed that Bird was not present and questioned whether the defendant's presence was necessary. The judge said that it was assumed that defense counsel wished to waive Bird's presence, and defense counsel stated that Bird had expressed no feelings about it one way or another. Bird was convicted and appealed on several grounds, including whether: (1) certain jurors should have been removed for cause; (2) defense counsel rendered deficient performance; (3) Bird should have been present during the individual voir dire; (4) Bird was prejudiced by certain testimony; and (5) the burden of proof was improperly shifted to Bird. The Supreme Court found the third issue to be dispositive. The court disagreed with the state's contention that Bird's presence at voir dire had been waived. The right of a defendant to be present at all critical stages of trial, including in-chambers individual voir dire, is a fundamental right that can be waived only if the trial court obtains an on-the-record personal waiver by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently and knowingly waives that right. There can be no waiver by a person who does not know the person's rights or what is being waived. Bird was not informed of the constitutional right to be present during voir dire and was not given the opportunity to choose whether to participate, so not only did Bird not waive the constitutional right, he was never afforded the opportunity to waive it. Bird's exclusion from voir dire was a structural error that undermined the integrity of the entire trial, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), and St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), and distinguishing U.S. v. Gagnon, 470 US 522 (1985). See also St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000).

Juror's Fitness to Serve at Discretion of Trial Court: The Supreme Court will not reverse a District Court's decision regarding a juror's fitness to serve absent an abuse of discretion and a showing of prejudice. The trial court has significant latitude when ruling on allegations of juror misconduct because that court is best able to observe jurors and to decide the potential for prejudice, and its determination will be given considerable weight and deference. St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999), followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Cost of Jury Selection and Prosecution Improperly Charged to Indigent Defendant: It was determined that Winterrowd was indigent, so counsel was appointed for him from the public defender's office. After being informed that Winterrowd had received a social security settlement and would no longer be considered indigent, the public defender moved to withdraw. Trial was continued to allow Winterrowd to obtain counsel. About 1 week before the scheduled hearing, Winterrowd moved for another continuance because the settlement had not arrived and he had not yet retained counsel. The state objected, arguing that Winterrowd had not demonstrated due diligence and that his claim that he would receive a settlement was unsupported by documentation. The trial court did not rule on the continuance motion. At the start of trial, Winterrowd again moved for a continuance, but the motion was denied. The trial proceeded through voir dire, with Winterrowd acting pro se. Following a break, the court granted the motion to continue and excused the jurors but ordered Winterrowd to pay the costs incurred in summoning the jurors and in prosecuting him. After granting the public defender's motion to withdraw, it was error for the court to charge Winterrowd with the costs when he was unable to obtain counsel. St. v. Winterrowd, 1998 MT 74, 288 M 208, 957 P2d 522, 55 St. Rep. 307 (1998).

Voir Dire Question Unrelated to Defense Properly Disallowed: Sattler contended that his right to voir dire on his defense of self-defense was infringed by the District Court's refusal to allow inquiry as to whether there must be a cause or reason to commit a homicide in jail. Generally, when notice of a defense is given, the refusal to allow defendant's voir dire on the defense constitutes prejudicial error. However, in this instance, Sattler was allowed to ask two questions directly related to jurors' opinions regarding self-defense, but a third question, regarding the cause or reason to commit a homicide in jail, was properly disallowed because it went beyond the self-defense theory in suggesting to prospective jurors that the state was required to prove motive, which was not the case. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998), distinguishing St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971), and St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Improper Comments by Prospective Jurors During Voir Dire — Prejudicial Effect Warranting Reversal: Comments made in the presence of the entire jury panel indicating that certain potential jurors not only knew the defendant but also were aware of the defendant's high propensity for violence were prejudicial, thereby poisoning the perspective of the entire jury panel in such a way that the court could not rectify the problem through admonishment or curative jury instructions and constituting reversible error. This opinion was narrowly drawn and reserved only for the most egregious and prejudicial juror comments—comments that indicate a bias that the juror cannot lay aside or comments that, when made in the presence of other prospective jurors, amount to inadmissible opinions about the defendant's character or propensities. The Supreme Court suggested that District Courts advise prospective jurors, before voir dire commences, not to volunteer the substance of any comments or opinions that they may have about the parties but rather to notify the court that they have information or an opinion about a party. The trial judge can then explore the substance of that information in camera and avoid any taint to the entire jury panel. St. v. McMahon, 271 M 75, 894 P2d 313, 52 St. Rep. 353 (1995), following principles established in Putro v. Baker, 147 M 139, 410 P2d 717 (1966), and followed in St. v. Hardaway, 1998 MT 224, 290 M 516, 966 P2d 125, 55 St. Rep. 936 (1998).

Voir Dire Questions Referencing Statistical Probability Not Offer of Testimony — Admonishment Curative of Taint: During voir dire, the prosecuting attorney referred to the statistical probability of the molestation of minors. Defendant objected that this was an offer of testimony and an attempt to personalize information in the form of statistics for which there was no testimony at trial, resulting in a taint of the entire jury panel. The Supreme Court was not convinced that the statistical statements were necessary or appropriate, but found that any taint was remedied by the trial court's admonishment to the jury that the statements were not evidence and that only sworn testimony and tangible evidence could be considered. St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988).

Limiting Defense Time and Inquiry Into Preconceived Notions of Guilt: It was improper and inexcusable for judge, at voir dire, to repeatedly admonish defense counsel that a jury would be selected that day and to infer that defense counsel was an obstacle to that end. In a case such as this, which has a great amount of publicity, it is especially essential that voir dire ensures that defendant is adjudged by fair and impartial jurors. The court should strive for that objective, not expeditious selection of the jury. Defense counsel's examination of the potential jurors' preconceived notions of defendant's guilt should not have been repeatedly met with sustained objections. It was erroneous to deny defense counsel permission to ask a potential juror whether, if he were a defendant, he would want someone with that potential juror's frame of mind sitting on the jury. Defense counsel was also repeatedly admonished to limit inquiry to whether the potential juror could set aside his impressions of the case and reach a verdict based solely on the evidence; however, such a question cannot be asked and answered in a vacuum, and the defense must be allowed to fully examine the extent of the juror's pretrial convictions and determine what would be required to eradicate those convictions. One exchange during voir dire resulted in a juror who might have required defendant to prove his own innocence. However, the improperly conducted voir dire resulted in harmless error because given defendant's testimony at trial, any juror would have had to convict him of the charges. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987).

Failure of Juror to Disclose Relationship: Defendant was charged with and convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. During voir dire, members of the jury panel were asked whether any of them knew any of the employees at the Butte-Silver Bow law enforcement agency and whether any of them were related to or knew closely anyone else employed by a law enforcement agency. Defendant contended he was prejudiced when a juror failed to disclose her brother-in-law was a civilian jailer at the jail. On appeal, the Supreme Court said other jurisdictions have held that nondisclosure of information is not grounds for reversal unless the nondisclosure amounts to "intentional concealment". There was nothing in the record to show intentional concealment or any misconduct by the juror. The omission appeared inadvertent and unintentional. There was no error in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984), followed in St. v. Woods, 221 M 17, 716 P2d 624, 43 St. Rep. 601 (1986), St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005). Hatten was followed in St. v. Rennaker, 2007 MT 10, 335 M 274, 150 P3d 960 (2007).

Judge's Discussion of Trial Process and Length of Service With Jurors Outside Presence of Prosecution, Defense, or Defendant: Prior to trial, the judge brought the 55 prospective jurors into court, explained the trial process, asked them if they could serve 2 weeks, and discharged two of them after the discussion. The prosecutors, defendant, and defense counsel were not present, and no record was kept of the proceeding. There was no prejudice to defendant, but the Supreme Court stated that a record should have been kept and that it was not suggesting that such an examination should be adopted by other judges or that the method of examination was the best one. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Change of Venue Determination Prior to Voir Dire: Voir dire is not the solution to every venue case in which it must be determined whether prejudice still exists and whether by reason of it there is a reasonable apprehension that accused cannot receive a fair and impartial trial. Although that issue is usually determined by voir dire, each case must turn on its own merits, and a motion for a change of venue may be decided prior to voir dire if the circumstances of the case indicate inherent prejudice. Judicial economy and effective administration of justice are not served by the use of voir dire to decide the issue when it is apparent that it should be decided before voir dire, and there is the inherent problem of an atmosphere that may exert pressure on the jury selected. State ex rel. Coburn v. Bennett, 202 M 20, 655 P2d 502, 39 St. Rep. 2300 (1982).

Absence of Defendant During Peremptory Challenges Not Violative of Constitutional Rights — Pro Forma Challenge in Purely Legal Matters: In a prosecution for theft by accountability, the defendant was not denied due process of law by her absence from the courtroom during peremptory challenges of jurors. Although the defendant's presence may be crucial during the voir dire questioning of the jury, the Supreme Court has previously held that a defendant's rights are not violated when the matters handled in his absence are purely legal and the peremptory challenge of jurors is only a pro forma execution of the decisions formulated during voir dire. Her absence was therefore not injurious to either her right of due process or her right of confrontation. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981).

No Evidence That Exclusion of Particular Line of Questioning During Voir Dire Was Prejudicial: The defendant's right to a fair trial may have been prejudiced by not being allowed to ask each juror whether relatives or friends had ever been victims of an assault. However, no evidence was presented to the Supreme Court that the defendant was prejudiced by the judge's restrictions; therefore, it was not reversible error. St. v. Lamere, 190 M 332, 621 P2d 462, 37 St. Rep. 1936 (1980).

Proper Limitation on Voir Dire — Questions to Jury: The judge interrupted defense counsel during her opening and closing statements and during voir dire. Although a judge should not interrupt the opening so as to prevent defendant from outlining his defense, the trial judge can stop counsel from giving instructions or arguing the case as was done here. Admonishing counsel's use of "law school questions" during voir dire is within the judge's latitude in controlling voir dire. The judge's conduct of the trial was meant to expedite and facilitate the trial, and the defendant is not entitled to a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 190 M 332, 621 P2d 462, 37 St. Rep. 1936 (1980).

Proper Limitation on Voir Dire — Religious Beliefs: In a prosecution for failure to file proper tax returns, it was within the trial judge's discretion to restrict defendant from inquiring into the religious beliefs of the prospective jurors. Given the wide discretion allowed a trial judge, the lack of relevancy of religion to the issues at bar, and the permitted inquiry into the jurors' general belief in God, the limitation was proper. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698 (1980).

Individual Voir Dire Based on Pretrial Publicity: A motion for individual voir dire of prospective jury members based on the prejudicial effect of pretrial publicity must be adequately supported by evidence of the prejudicial effect of the publicity on the prospective jurors. In this case, defendant failed to do so and did not even exercise his right to challenge any of the potential jurors for cause due to bias or prejudice. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Proper Limitation on Voir Dire — Charge and Punishment: The defendant was not prejudiced by a restriction of the voir dire examination regarding homicide charges and capital punishment. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Failure to File Notice of Defense — Effect on Voir Dire: The defendant refused to give notice as required by the statute. He claimed prejudice because he was not allowed to voir dire on the subject of mental disease and defect. However, at the time he wished to voir dire he had not complied with the notice and the issue could not at that time be presented to the jury. The court was correct in refusing to allow the voir dire. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute addresses the challenge of a potential juror for cause. The statute is principally a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-16-304. Subsection (2)(e) has been amended to allow a challenge for cause to a potential juror who has served on a trial jury for a case involving a related offense. This amendment slightly expands the extent of this challenge but should not significantly affect established procedure. The subsection also adopts some terminology changes, but these changes are only intended to clarify the subsection.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At end of (2)(e) inserted "or a related offense"; in (2)(h), after "opinions", inserted "concerning the punishment"; and made minor changes in style.

1981 Amendment: Substituted "excuse" for "exemption" and "excused" for "exempted" in (3).

GENERAL

Failure to Ask Jurors Followup Questions Regarding Impartiality During Voir Dire Not Considered Deficient Counsel Performance: Whitlow contended that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because, during voir dire, the defense attorney failed to ask followup questions of two jurors regarding impartiality. Whitlow's assertion was based primarily on an affidavit and testimony provided by defense counsel years later, stating that although counsel did not recall any partiality problems during voir dire, in hindsight, counsel probably should have asked additional questions of the jurors. The Supreme Court examined the trial transcript and defense counsel's voir dire notes and concluded that Whitlow failed to demonstrate that counsel's performance was deficient and failed to overcome the presumption that the challenged acts and omissions fell within the wide range of reasonable assistance measured under prevailing professional norms and in light of the surrounding circumstances. Whitlow's ineffective assistance claim failed. Whitlow v. St., 2008 MT 140, 343 M 90, 183 P3d 861 (2008), overruling St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185 (1982), and its progeny to the extent that the Morigeau "ignorance or neglect" test for ineffective assistance of counsel conflicts with the correct approach, which is the "objective standard of reasonableness" test set out in Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668 (1984), and followed in St. v. Rose, 2009 MT 4, 348 M 291, 202 P3d 749 (2009).

Defense Counsel's Conduct During Voir Dire Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Notti asserted that defense counsel's failure to elicit information from or to challenge two jurors for cause during voir dire amounted to ineffective assistance. The District Court found that counsel did not challenge the jurors because counsel believed that there was no basis for a challenge for cause and because counsel believed that the jurors would be fair. On appeal, the Supreme Court examined counsel's conduct toward each juror during voir dire and affirmed. Counsel made informed strategic decisions not to challenge the jurors, and counsel's failure to challenge the jurors did not fall below the range of competence expected of attorneys in criminal cases. Notti's claim of ineffective counsel failed. Notti v. St., 2008 MT 20, 341 M 183, 176 P3d 1040 (2008).

No Error in Removing Prospective Juror Who Would Have Trouble Applying Law: In a felony-murder trial, the District Court did not commit error by removing a prospective juror for cause when the juror stated that he might have trouble applying a law that he found disagreeable and mentioned a series of such laws, including seat belt, gun, and forfeiture laws. This attitude reflected a bias related to an issue critical to the outcome of the case—whether he could follow the law as given in light of the evidence. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in dismissing the juror for cause. St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004).

Error in Excusing Juror for Cause Before Voir Dire — Error Harmless Absent Showing of Prejudice: Prior to voir dire in defendant's trial for sexual intercourse without consent and incest, the prosecutor requested that juror no. 43 be excused. The juror had recently worked in the County Attorney's office and had access to a wide range of information relating to issues that defendant had been involved in, and the prosecutor had recently fired the juror for unsatisfactory performance. The trial judge dismissed the juror because of concerns that the juror might have feelings or predilections for one side or the other and because of the possibility of the juror communicating with other prospective jurors. Following conviction, defendant appealed the decision to excuse the juror for cause prior to voir dire. The Supreme Court concluded that the trial court erred in excusing the juror without an in-court examination to determine actual bias; however, the error was not a material failure to substantially comply with statutes governing procurement of a trial jury, so the dismissal was subject to harmless error review. Defendant could not demonstrate prejudice because even if juror no. 43 had not been dismissed, the juror would not have been on the jury because the last juror empaneled was juror no. 36. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Bearchild, 2004 MT 355, 324 M 435, 103 P3d 1006 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), and St. v. Blem, 610 NW 2d 803 (S. Dak. 2000).

Test for Structural Error During Voir Dire — Automatic Reversal Warranted for Structural Error in Improper Denial of Challenge for Cause to Prospective Juror: Structural error exists when there is a material failure to substantially comply with statutes governing the procurement of a jury trial. Jury selection is critically important in ensuring an accused's right to an impartial jury and a fair trial, and errors involving jury selection indelibly affect the fairness of the trial because the errors precede the trial. After reviewing St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000), and St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the Supreme Court held that structural error occurs if: (1) a District Court abuses its discretion by denying a challenge for cause to a prospective juror; (2) the defendant uses one or more peremptory challenges to remove disputed jurors; and (3) the defendant exhausts all peremptory challenges. If the test is met, the error is structural and automatic reversal is required. St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), overruling St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099 (1993), and St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998), to the extent that Williams and DeVore required a defendant to establish that the District Court error contributed to defendant's conviction by showing that the jury was charged with the determination of a factual issue important to the charges against defendant.

No Presumption of Prejudice: Where the trial court mistakenly granted challenges for cause to the prosecution but denied a similar challenge by defendant, the Supreme Court held that prejudice will not be presumed where the record shows that the trial court's error affected neither constitutional nor jurisdictional rights of the defendant, and defendant on appeal has failed to demonstrate prejudice to his substantial rights resulting from the error. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Individual Voir Dire Based on Pretrial Publicity: A motion for individual voir dire of prospective jury members based on the prejudicial effect of pretrial publicity must be adequately supported by evidence of the prejudicial effect of the publicity on the prospective jurors. In this case, defendant failed to do so and did not even exercise his right to challenge any of the potential jurors for cause due to bias or prejudice. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188 (1980).

Mental Defect or Disease — Notice of Defense — Right to Voir Dire on the Subject: The defendant was properly denied the right to voir dire the jury on the subject of mental disease or defect because he did not give any notice of intent to use the defense. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Independent Knowledge of Juror — Failure to Object: The fact that a juror had acted as a special prosecutor in a disbarment action against an attorney under a workers' compensation indictment and had used the defendant's disbarment, which dealt at length with the facts involved in the defendant's criminal case, as a model in drafting his pleadings did not require a reversal of the defendant's conviction when, at the conclusion of the trial, the juror met with the judge and counsel and told them what he knew and the defendant made no objection. The defense failed to meet its responsibility by its failure to properly object and thereby give the court an opportunity to remedy any alleged defects. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Nature of Right to Challenge: The right to challenge is the right to reject, not to select, a juror, and no person can acquire a vested right to have any particular member of a panel sit upon his case until such member has been accepted and sworn. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931), followed in St. v. Barnes, 232 M 405, 758 P2d 264, 45 St. Rep. 1150 (1988).

CONSANGUINITY OR RELATIONSHIP

Failure of Counsel to Rely on Statutory Definition of Guardian-Ward Relationship in Challenging Juror Employed by Law Enforcement Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: A potential juror was employed as a guard at Richeson's detention center. Defense counsel challenged the juror for cause, but the motion was denied, and Richeson had to use his last peremptory challenge instead. On appeal, Richeson claimed ineffective assistance of counsel because the attorney did not reference this section, which defines the guardian-ward relationship between a jailer and an inmate, asserting that the statutorily defined bias would have required removal of the juror for cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the law requires certain standards from correctional facilities and individual guards and detention officers, those standards do not meet the requirements of a guardian-ward relationship or create an implied guardian-ward relationship between prisoners and individual guards. Thus, Richeson's counsel did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness in failing to argue the guardian-ward relationship, and Richeson's ineffective assistance claim failed. St. v. Richeson, 2004 MT 113, 321 M 126, 89 P3d 958 (2004).

Who Removed for Cause: A juror will not be removed for cause unless he falls under one of the classes of this section or is partial. When the record did not support a claim that a juror (who was the trial judge's brother-in-law) was partial, the defendant was not deprived of a fair trial. St. v. Hendricks, 171 M 7, 555 P2d 743 (1976).

Prosecutor's Brother-in-Law Not Disqualified: A juror who, upon examination, has shown no bias, either implied or actual, is not disqualified by reason of being a brother-in-law of the prosecuting attorney. St. v. Cadotte, 17 M 315, 42 P 857 (1895).

PRIOR JURY SERVICE

Use of Peremptory Challenge Rather Than Challenge for Cause to Remove Juror Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Deschon contended that he was deprived of a fair trial through defense counsel's failure to exercise challenges for cause to remove a juror who previously served on a jury that convicted a defendant on the same charge that Deschon was facing and another juror with a long involvement in law enforcement whose impartiality could be questioned. However, evidence in a voir dire reconstruction hearing revealed why counsel used peremptory challenges to remove the jurors instead. Counsel was prohibited from challenging the first juror for cause under St. v. Russell, 73 M 240, 235 P 712 (1925), because the juror would have had to serve on a jury trying a related offense to the offense that Deschon was charged with. Regarding the second juror, the mere fact that the juror was connected with law enforcement did not necessitate a finding of impartiality, and because the juror maintained that he could be impartial, a peremptory challenge was the only available method of removing the juror from the panel. Deschon did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Deschon, 2004 MT 32, 320 M 1, 85 P3d 756 (2004).

Juror Not Disqualified: When one had served as a juror in a prosecution for rape, he was not disqualified, as for actual bias, from serving in the same capacity in a later case of the same character against another defendant in which the prosecutrix was the same as in the first, by the fact that on the former trial evidence of the guilt of the latter defendant had been introduced. St. v. Russell, 73 M 240, 235 P 712 (1925).

SERVICE ON CORONER'S JURY

Duty of Attorneys to Advise Court That Coroner's Juror Serving as Trial Juror: When the voir dire examination of a trial juror in a murder case failed to reveal that he had served on the Coroner's jury that had investigated the occurrence, which was known to the County Attorney, who directed the proceedings at the inquest, and discovered by the defense counsel after the trial jury had been sworn, it was the duty of both to advise the trial court at the earliest opportunity to prevent a mistrial. St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944).

DEATH PENALTY

Constitutionality of "Death Qualified" Jury — Mention of Possibility of Death Sentence Not Prejudicial Per Se: Prior to voir dire, Gollehon requested the trial court to prohibit the state from asking jury panel members to declare their beliefs concerning the death penalty, arguing that: (1) questioning the members about a possible sentence was inappropriate because Montana juries do not participate in the sentencing portion of a trial; (2) social science evidence proves that when a jury is "death qualified", it is more prone to convict the defendant; and (3) if a jury knows that the death penalty could be imposed upon conviction, the error is prejudicial per se. In analyzing the death qualification of juries under this section, the Supreme Court cited Witherspoon v. Ill., 391 US 510, 20 L Ed 2d 776, 88 S Ct 1770 (1968), for the holding that excusing jurors simply because they voice general objections to the death penalty is insufficient and that only in instances when that belief prohibits the juror from applying the law that the judge has provided may a juror be excused for cause. Addressing the question of social science evidence seeming to indicate prejudice to a defendant when a jury is death qualified, the Supreme Court rejected the studies, noting that in Lockhart v. McCree, 476 US 162, 90 L Ed 2d 137, 106 S Ct 1758 (1986), the U.S. Supreme Court had seriously questioned the validity of similar studies, ruling that even if the studies were valid, it did not prove that death qualification was unconstitutional. Further, death qualification is a procedure to ensure that a jury is committed to its task and is therefore not per se an unconstitutional due process violation. St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 1, 864 P2d 249, 50 St. Rep. 1250 (1993).

Prospective Juror's View of Death Penalty: Two prospective jurors were properly excluded under the exception to the general rule of Witherspoon v. Illinois, 391 US 510, 20 L Ed 2d 776, 88 S Ct 1770 (1968), because they were irrevocably committed to voting against conviction because of the possibility of a death penalty. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

SEVERITY OF PUNISHMENT

Statute Not Violated When Defendant Prohibited From Informing Jury of Penalty: Where, in a prosecution for aggravated assault, the defendant's counsel was prohibited from informing the jurors of the penalty for robbery and then inquiring whether they felt the penalty was too severe, the District Court did not err and no violation of 46-16-304 (renumbered 46-16-115) occurred. The court allowed counsel to inquire if any juror was aware of the penalty, and none of the jurors responded affirmatively. Moreover, the defendant could not show that the restriction resulted in prejudice to him. St. v. Ritchson, 193 M 112, 630 P2d 234, 38 St. Rep. 1015 (1981).

STATE OF MIND DEPRIVING IMPARTIALITY

No Showing of Juror Bias — Denial of Challenge for Cause Proper: Hart contended that a challenge for cause of a prospective juror should have been granted. The Supreme Court reviewed the colloquy on the record and affirmed. The juror's responses did not reveal actual bias; they made it clear that the juror's personal opinions would not govern his decision in the case and that the juror understood that the law was superior and must govern the process. The challenge for cause was properly denied. St. v. Hart, 2009 MT 268, 352 M 92, 214 P3d 1273 (2009).

Dismissal for Cause Based on Juror's Work in Law Enforcement Properly Denied: A potential juror stated that she worked in law enforcement as a 9-1-1 dispatcher but could not recall if she was on duty the night of the incident in question. She also had a relationship with a police officer and recalled the case being discussed among her coworkers. For these reasons Dewitz moved that the juror be dismissed for cause, but the motion was denied. Dewitz appealed on grounds that the trial court erred by not dismissing the juror for cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. The juror stated that she could be impartial and had not formed an opinion regarding Dewitz's innocence or guilt. The juror's involvement in law enforcement was not, in itself, sufficient to grant dismissal for cause, nor did discussing the case with coworkers and remembering a brief generalization of what occurred prove that the juror was exposed to information that was inadmissible at trial. The trial court did not abuse its discretion by denying the motion to dismiss for cause and was therefore affirmed on the issue. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Juror's Ability to Make Decision Based on Evidence Despite Friendship With Crime Victim — No Error in Denial of Challenge for Cause: Taylor moved to remove a juror for cause based on the juror's friendship with the victim and the fact that the victim had told the juror that Taylor had perjured himself. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the juror heard from the victim that Taylor had perjured himself, the juror did not state that he had formed an opinion that the victim was correct, and the juror consistently stated that he would make an independent, unbiased decision based on what the evidence showed at trial. Considering the juror's responses as a whole, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying Taylor's challenge for cause. St. v. Taylor, 2009 MT 161, 350 M 447, 208 P3d 422 (2009).

Potential Juror's Belief in Credibility of Witness Not Considered Prejudice Toward Defendant — Dismissal for Cause Properly Denied: A potential juror who was acquainted with a prosecution witness expressed the opinion that the witness was a very credible person and that the juror would believe the witness's testimony. The trial court declined to dismiss the juror for cause. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the juror stated that the prosecution witness's testimony would be more believable than testimony from a witness the juror did not know, the juror never said that he could not be fair or impartial to the defendant. Further, the trial court did not improperly rehabilitate the juror, but rather attempted to clarify the juror's answers to a series of questions from counsel regarding whether the juror would be willing to consider opposing testimony and surrounding circumstances for consistency, so the court's questioning could not be considered a coaxed recantation of bias. Denial of the motion to remove the juror for cause was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009). See also St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008).

County Commissioner's Knowledge of and Opinion on Case Precluding Impartiality — Dismissal for Cause Warranted — Reversed: A County Commissioner who was called for jury duty had discussed the case numerous times with the County Attorney, raising serious doubts about the Commissioner's ability to be fair and impartial, and the record showed that the Commissioner possessed a state of mind that prevented him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudicing defendant's substantial rights. A motion to remove the Commissioner for cause should have been granted, but instead defendant had to use a peremptory challenge to remove the Commissioner and exhausted all peremptory challenges, requiring reversal and remand for a new trial. St. v. Herman, 2009 MT 101, 350 M 109, 204 P3d 1254 (2009).

Juror Bias Against Crime, Not Defendant — Challenge for Cause Properly Denied: During voir dire in Normandy's trial for partner or family member assault, a prospective juror expressed a bias against domestic violence because it had affected his wife during her first marriage. Normandy moved to dismiss the juror for cause, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although the juror expressed a bias against the crime, the juror did not voice a predisposition regarding Normandy's guilt or innocence, stating that he thought he could be fair and impartial. If voir dire raises serious doubts about a juror's ability to be fair and impartial or if a juror has a fixed opinion of the defendant's guilt, the juror should be excused. However if, as here, a juror merely expresses concern about impartiality but believes he can fairly weigh the evidence, the court is not required to remove the juror. St. v. Normandy, 2008 MT 437, 347 M 505, 198 P3d 834 (2008), following St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Golie, 2006 MT 91, 332 M 69, 134 P3d 95 (2006).

Improper Denial of Challenge for Cause of Juror Who Could Not Act Without Bias Regarding Presumption of Innocence and Defendant's Right to Refrain From Testifying: During voir dire in Braunreiter's burglary trial, a juror expressed the opinion that because Braunreiter had been charged with the crime, Braunreiter should testify and prove that he didn't commit the crime. Defense counsel moved to dismiss the juror for cause, but after the trial court further questioned the juror regarding the presumption of innocence and the juror's willingness to follow the law, the court denied the motion to dismiss for cause. Defense counsel used a peremptory challenge to dismiss the juror and subsequently exhausted peremptory challenges. Braunreiter was convicted and appealed on grounds that the trial court improperly denied the challenge for cause. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The juror's spontaneous response raised serious questions regarding the juror's ability to act without prejudice to Braunreiter's right to the presumption of innocence and to Braunreiter's right to refrain from testifying, and the juror's response to followup questions failed to alleviate those concerns. Therefore, the trial court could not reasonably conclude that the juror had a state of mind that would allow performance free from prejudice, and the court abused its discretion in denying the challenge for cause. St. v. Braunreiter, 2008 MT 197, 344 M 59, 185 P3d 1024 (2008), following St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008).

Juror Concerned About Defendant's Innocence but Able to Set Concern Aside — Denial of Challenge for Cause Not Abuse of Discretion: Robinson contended that the trial court erred by not excusing a juror for cause when the juror expressed concern about Robinson's innocence based on the fact that Robinson was on trial. However, despite the concern, the juror repeatedly stated that she understood that Robinson was presumed innocent and that she could and would set aside her concern and be impartial. The Supreme Court noted that a juror need not be excused for cause simply by raising some concerns about a defendant's innocence as long as the trial court reasonably concludes that the juror is able to be impartial. The decision to grant a challenge for cause is within the discretion of the trial court, and in this case, the Supreme Court found no abuse of that discretion. St. v. Robinson, 2008 MT 34, 341 M 300, 177 P3d 488 (2008), following St. v. Falls Down, 2003 MT 300, 318 M 219, 79 P3d 797 (2003).

Failure to Dismiss Partial Juror for Cause — Structural Error Warranting New Trial: On voir dire, a juror revealed a belief that defendant would not be on trial unless there was something tying defendant to the crime and that only if there was evidence presented that proved defendant's innocence would the juror be convinced that the defendant was not guilty. The trial court declined to grant defendant's motion to dismiss the juror for cause, and following conviction, defendant appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, reiterating the preference for dismissal for cause when voir dire reveals a serious question about a juror's ability to afford a defendant a presumption of innocence. The trial court's refusal to dismiss the juror was an abuse of discretion that resulted in structural error warranting a new trial. St. v. Hausauer, 2006 MT 336, 335 M 137, 149 P3d 895 (2006).

Commonly Held Belief Not Grounds for Removal of Juror for Cause: Harville punched an elderly woman in a laundromat during a dispute over a washing machine and went to trial for misdemeanor assault. During voir dire, two jurors indicated that it was their belief that a man should not hit a woman and that they were not sure they could set aside their belief. Harville moved to dismiss the jurors for cause, but the Municipal Court denied the motion, and Harville used two peremptory challenges to remove the jurors. On appeal, Harville contended that the Municipal Court erred by denying the challenges for cause. The District Court reasoned that the jurors' beliefs were consistent with beliefs held by society in general. Harville did not meet the burden of establishing error regarding the commonly held belief rationale and failed to present any argument or advance any authority under which a commonly held belief may be the basis for a successful challenge for cause. Denial of the motion to dismiss for cause was affirmed. St. v. Harville, 2006 MT 292, 334 M 380, 147 P3d 222 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002).

Potential Juror's Responses Raising Questions Regarding Impartiality — Use of Peremptory Challenge to Remove Juror — Structural Error Warranting Remand: Voir dire responses by a potential juror who had been injured by a drunk driver established a state of mind in reference to Golie's DUI case that would prevent the juror from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to Golie's substantial rights. The trial court abused its discretion by declining to allow the juror to be excused for cause, so defense counsel had to use a peremptory challenge to remove the juror and exhausted all peremptory challenges. As established in St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004), such abuse of discretion constitutes a structural error requiring automatic reversal, and the Supreme Court remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Golie, 2006

MT 91, 332 M 69, 134 P3d 95 (2006), followed in St. v. Harville, 2006 MT 292, 334 M 380, 147 P3d 222 (2006).

Denial of Motion to Remove Juror for Cause Not Error Absent Showing of Juror Bias: During voir dire in Marble's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, defense counsel asked the panel whether the act of anal intercourse between two males would be considered so abhorrent as to affect their ability to view and weigh the evidence fairly. One juror responded that his religious convictions made the idea of such an act morally repugnant. Defense counsel moved to remove the juror for cause, but the motion was denied. After further questioning, counsel again moved to remove the juror for cause, but the motion was again denied. Counsel ultimately used a peremptory challenge to remove the juror. On appeal, Marble asserted that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motions to remove the juror for cause. Analyzing the juror challenges in light of the statutory language and the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court held that the juror did not exhibit an actual bias during voir dire that would have prohibited the juror from acting with impartiality and without prejudice. Absent a showing of bias, denial of the motion to remove the juror for cause was not an abuse of discretion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Marble, 2005 MT 208, 328 M 223, 119 P3d 88 (2005), following St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002).

Denial of Challenge for Cause of Potential Juror Connected With Law Enforcement — No Error Absent Showing of Bias: During jury selection in Richeson's criminal trial, one of the potential jurors was identified as a guard at Richeson's detention center. Richeson challenged the juror for cause, but after questioning the juror, the District Court denied the challenge, and Richeson used the last peremptory challenge to strike the juror. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The bare fact that a juror is connected with law enforcement does not in itself necessitate a finding of bias resulting in dismissal for cause. Rather, challenges for cause are granted or denied pursuant to both statutory language and the totality of the circumstances, and abuse of discretion occurs if a court fails to dismiss a juror if actual bias is discovered during voir dire. The widest possible examination should be allowed a potential juror connected with law enforcement, and if there is any doubt in the event of a challenge for cause, the trial court should allow the challenge. However, in this case, the juror was questioned extensively, and the juror's testimony did not reveal a state of mind in reference to Richeson that would prevent the juror from acting impartially and without prejudice to Richeson's substantial rights, that demonstrated that the juror had formed an assumption of innocence or guilt based on employment in law enforcement, or that the employment would cause the juror to harbor any actual bias. Although bias is sometimes revealed by circumstantial evidence, nothing in the record reflected circumstantial bias in this case, but the record did reflect a person who expressed an honest belief in the ability to be a fair juror to both the state and the defendant. Thus, no prejudice was shown, but there was sufficient information for counsel to decide to use a peremptory challenge. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to remove the juror for cause. St. v. Richeson, 2004 MT 113, 321 M 126, 89 P3d 958 (2004), following St. v. Thompson, 169 M 158, 545 P2d 1070 (1976), St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978), St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002), and St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004), and distinguishing St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998).

No Error in Denying Challenges for Cause for Two Jurors With Sex Crime Counseling or Evaluation Experience Absent Clearly Stated Bias or Coaxed Recantation — Fixed Opinion of Guilt Rule: During voir dire in Heath's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, Heath moved to dismiss for cause one juror who had been a victim of a sex crime and had counseled other sex crime victims and another juror with education and desire to become a sex offender evaluator. The motions were denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that jurors may be challenged for cause based on a state of mind depriving impartiality but also on a fixed opinion of guilt or innocence depriving impartiality and took the opportunity to clarify the "fixed opinion of guilt" rule, holding that it is but one argument that can be asserted under the statutory state of mind basis for a challenge for cause. Further, challenges for cause must be determined pursuant to both the statutory language of this section and the totality of the circumstances presented. In this case, both jurors indicated that they could look at the facts and not allow their experiences to affect their judgment. Despite Heath's argument that the jurors' responses were coaxed, their initial and spontaneous responses did not raise a serious question of bias, and Heath's allegations that the jurors would identify with the victim were purely speculative. The jurors' experience and training did not establish a state of mind that would prevent them from acting with impartiality and without affecting Heath's substantial rights; thus, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004), following St. v. DeVore, 1998

MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998), St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002), and St. v. Falls Down, 2003 MT 300, 318 M 219, 79 P3d 797 (2003), and followed in St. v. Rogers, 2007 MT 227, 339 M 132, 168 P3d 669 (2007).

Use of Peremptory Challenge Rather Than Challenge for Cause to Remove Juror Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Deschon contended that he was deprived of a fair trial through defense counsel's failure to exercise challenges for cause to remove a juror who previously served on a jury that convicted a defendant on the same charge that Deschon was facing and another juror with a long involvement in law enforcement whose impartiality could be questioned. However, evidence in a voir dire reconstruction hearing revealed why counsel used peremptory challenges to remove the jurors instead. Counsel was prohibited from challenging the first juror for cause under St. v. Russell, 73 M 240, 235 P 712 (1925), because the juror would have had to serve on a jury trying a related offense to the offense that Deschon was charged with. Regarding the second juror, the mere fact that the juror was connected with law enforcement did not necessitate a finding of impartiality, and because the juror maintained that he could be impartial, a peremptory challenge was the only available method of removing the juror from the panel. Deschon did not meet the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective assistance of counsel, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Deschon, 2004 MT 32, 320 M 1, 85 P3d 756 (2004).

No Abuse of Discretion in Denying Defendant's Challenges for Cause Based on Alleged Bias: Defendant challenged four different jurors for cause, and each challenge was denied. On appeal, defendant asserted that even though the potential jurors indicated that they could be fair and impartial, that did not cure their bias. The Supreme Court examined the voir dire record for each juror. Three were biased by media reports, and one was not sure how he would feel about defendant's guilt if defendant did not take the stand or present evidence, but each juror stated that the juror could set aside any personal opinions and make a fair and impartial decision based on the evidence. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Falls Down, 2003 MT 300, 318 M 219, 79 P3d 797 (2003). See also St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004).

When Juror Should Be Disqualified for Prejudice: A juror should be disqualified based on prejudice only when the juror has formed fixed opinions of the guilt or innocence of the defendant that the juror would not be able to lay aside and render a verdict based solely on the evidence. A District Court should not attempt to rehabilitate a juror whose spontaneous responses on voir dire expose a serious question about the ability to be fair and impartial. St. v. Falls Down, 2003 MT 300, 318 M 219, 79 P3d 797 (2003), following St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998). See also St. v. Heath, 2004 MT 58, 320 M 211, 89 P3d 947 (2004).

Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Voir Dire Dismissed on Direct Appeal — Chastain Overruled: Following a felony DUI conviction, Herrman appealed, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire. Counsel failed to remove several jurors for cause, but later removed the jurors by peremptory challenge, effectively causing the loss of peremptory challenges to which Herrman was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that jury impartiality goes to the very integrity of the justice system and that the presence of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses must be presumed prejudicial and result in reversal. Herrman cited St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), for the proposition that ineffective assistance occurred because counsel failed to develop information in the record demonstrating an individual juror's bias and to exercise challenges for cause against those jurors expressing bias. However, the Supreme Court overruled Chastain because it was a mistake to determine that counsel was ineffective during voir dire based on the lack of a reason apparent on the record. Although lawyers will state their reasons on the record for challenging a juror for cause, they do not state their reasons for not challenging a juror. Herrman's lawyer might have had tactical reasons for not challenging certain jurors for cause, but those reasons were not on the record, so the Supreme Court could not address Herrman's ineffective assistance claims without considering matters outside the record. Contentions based on matters outside the record are more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. Thus, Herrman's direct appeal was dismissed to allow a petition for postconviction relief that could address why counsel did not challenge certain jurors for cause. St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), followed in St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and, with regard to lack of a record regarding defense counsel's trial tactics as necessitating a postconviction hearing in lieu of direct appeal, in St. v. Henderson, 2003 MT 285, 318 M 31, 78 P3d 848 (2003). Herrman was also followed in St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004). See also St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Juror Statements of Actual Bias Against Defense That Sex Crime Victim Was Old Enough to Consent — Reversal Warranted for Failure to Grant Challenge for Cause: Freshment's defense to charges of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under age 16 was that he believed that the victim was old enough to give consent. During voir dire, two prospective jurors gave straightforward, consistent statements of actual bias against Freshment's legal defense. Following trial counsel's attempts to rehabilitate the jurors, the District Court denied Freshment's challenges for cause, so Freshment was required to use peremptory challenges to remove the jurors from the panel, ultimately exhausting all of his peremptory challenges. Under St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998), abuse of discretion occurs if a court fails to excuse a prospective juror when actual bias is discovered during voir dire, so both jurors should have been dismissed for cause. Under the rule in St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), the District Court's error was conclusively prejudicial and automatic reversal was required. St. v. Freshment, 2002 MT 61, 309 M 154, 43 P3d 968 (2002).

Juror's Belief That Sexual Abuse Victim Would Not Lie as Demonstration of Questionable Partiality — Defendant Entitled to Have Juror Excused for Cause — Court's Abuse of Discretion in Ignoring Juror's Spontaneous Statements of Impartiality: During voir dire at Good's trial for felony sexual abuse of children and felony sexual assault, two jurors expressed reservations about their ability to give the benefit of any doubt to Good in light of their predisposition to favor the testimony of a teenaged complaining witness under the circumstances. Good challenged the jurors for cause. The trial judge attempted to rehabilitate the jurors through a colloquy on civics and the presumption of innocence and ultimately declined to remove the jurors for cause. Good appealed on grounds that he was wrongfully denied two of his six peremptory challenges when he had to use them to remove the jurors in question. The Supreme Court agreed. Although neither juror expressed an unequivocal opinion that Good was guilty, they did express a form of bias based on their opinion that a young sexual abuse victim would not lie, which demonstrated a serious question regarding their ability to act with impartiality and to afford Good the presumption of innocence to which he was entitled. The denial of Good's challenges for cause constituted structural error, warranting automatic reversal. The Supreme Court went on to admonish trial judges to refrain from attempting to rehabilitate jurors by putting them in a position in which they will not disagree with the trial court. St. v. Good, 2002 MT 59, 309 M 113, 43 P3d 948 (2002), following St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 339, 297 M 427, 993 P2d 672 (1999). See also St. v. DeVore, 1998 MT 340, 292 M 325, 972 P2d 816 (1998).

Potential for Emotional Involvement as Juror Bias — Omissions by Counsel During and as Result of Voir Dire as Ineffective Assistance Warranting Reversal: Two prospective jurors expressed reservations about their ability to judge a case fairly, yet counsel failed either to follow up with additional questions about whether the prospective jurors could set aside their feelings and render a fair verdict or to exclude the jurors by challenge for cause or peremptorily. When counsel, for no apparent reason, abandons a client's right to challenge a juror, error is attributed to counsel. The presence on a jury of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses is considered prejudicial. Counsel's failure to take steps to prevent the presence on the jury of two such jurors constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and reversible error. St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57, 54 St. Rep. 1044 (1997), following U.S. v. Eubanks, 591 F2d 513 (9th Cir. 1979), and overruled in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), to the extent that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to counsel's reasoning.

Conflicting Juror Statements at Trial: Juror said she was sympathetic toward her pupil, who was the child of deliberate homicide victim. Juror told defense counsel she could not be sure she could give defendant a fair trial. She told the prosecutor she could render a fair verdict on the evidence. The judge questioned her, and her responses supported her statement to the prosecutor. A challenge to the juror for cause was properly denied. Bashor v. Risley, 730 F2d 1228 (9th Cir. 1984).

Effect of Pretrial Publicity on Jurors — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: Because of the pervasiveness of news coverage, it is impossible to obtain prospective jurors who have heard nothing of a serious crime committed in their area. Only where prospective jurors have formed fixed opinions on the guilt or innocence of a defendant that they would not be able to lay aside should they be disqualified as jurors. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Alleged Juror Prejudice — Confusion in Voir Dire Record: When defendant contended that the presence of an allegedly prejudiced juror deprived him of his right to trial by a fair and impartial jury, the existence of some confusion in voir dire as evidenced by the record was good reason (in conjunction with authorities relating to scope of review of juror challenge rulings) to rely on the trial court's decision to deny defendant's challenge for cause based on implied bias. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224 (1979).

County Officer as Prospective Juror: This statute does not permit an automatic challenge for cause solely for the reason that a prospective juror in a criminal case is also a county officer. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

Law Enforcement Officer as Potential Juror:

In declaring that one's status as a law enforcement officer does not ipso facto disqualify him from sitting as a juror in a criminal case, the court was mindful of the natural inclinations of one whose life is committed to law enforcement. For this reason, the court stated that the widest possible examination should be allowed of such a person as a potential juror and, should there be any doubt in the event of a challenge for cause, the trial court should resolve the doubt in favor of allowing the challenge. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

The bare fact that a juror is connected with law enforcement does not, without a showing of bias, necessitate a finding that he would not be an impartial juror. St. v. Thomson, 169 M 158, 545 P2d 1070 (1976), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Juror's Impartiality — Effect on Change of Venue Request: The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion for change of place of trial based on the mere existence of any preconceived notion as to the guilt or innocence of an accused as sufficient impartiality is established if the juror can lay aside his impression or opinion and render a verdict based on the evidence presented in court. St. v. Lewis, 169 M 290, 546 P2d 518 (1976), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994).

Juror's Opinion: When a juror on his voir dire in a burglary case stated that he had formed an opinion based on what he had heard on the radio and television and read in the newspapers but had not discussed the case with anyone purporting to know any of the facts about it and declared under oath that he could lay aside his opinion and judge the case solely on the evidence presented, it was not error to deny the defendant's challenge. St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963).

Challenges for Cause Upheld: When the State challenged three jurors for cause and the evidence showed that one of the jurors was nearly deaf and the other two had formed opinions, the court was correct in excusing the jurors for cause. St. v. Gates, 131 M 78, 307 P2d 248 (1957).

Challenge Overruled: When the court relied on answers to the last two questions and on the assumption that there was a misunderstanding as to the earlier questions in examining a prospective juror for prejudice, the overruling of the challenge was not disturbed, especially when the defendant had three peremptory challenges left at the time and exercised one to discharge such juror; the fact that the defendant regarded other jurors as undesirable, on which he might have exercised his challenges, gave him no right to have such juror excused for bias when there was no showing that the other jurors were disqualified. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

New Trial — Juror Bias: The court set aside a conviction of first degree burglary and remanded the case for a new trial for error committed by the trial court, confessed by the Attorney General and shown by the record, in refusing the defendant's motion for retrial based on the ground that a juror was biased and prejudiced. St. v. Summers, 107 M 34, 79 P2d 560 (1938).

Newspaperman's Bias: After conviction of first degree murder, the defendant moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, that a juror had been guilty of misconduct in concealing from the court, while under examination on his voir dire, the fact that after the arrest of the defendant he, as correspondent for the newspaper published at the county seat, had furnished it articles, which were published, in effect complimenting the officers for their quick action in apprehending the "murderer", whose "worthless carcass will lie to rot deeply buried when the wheels of justice cease to grind", etc. The motion was denied. The court held, in answer to the contention that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion, that in view of the explanation of his conduct by the juror on the hearing of the motion that the articles were not intended to be personal as applied to the defendant, whom he did not know, but applicable to anyone who committed homicide, and the advantageous position of the trial judge in passing upon the sincerity and truth of the statements of the juror on his examination touching his competency as well as on the hearing of the motion, the court did not err in its ruling. St. v. Hoffman, 94 M 573, 23 P2d 972 (1933). See also St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Challenge to Juror: In a prosecution for receiving stolen property, a juror answered voir dire questions propounded by the State by admitting that he was a close friend of the defendant but could try him as if he were a stranger but that he would like to be excused. He then stated that he would not convict the defendant even if he believed him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Thereafter, however, on examination by the defendant's counsel, he again asserted that he would vote for conviction regardless of his friendship for the defendant if proper under the law and the evidence. The court's ruling excusing the juror may not be held reversible error even though it be conceded that technical error was committed in sustaining the challenge on an improper ground. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931). See also St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099, 50 St. Rep. 1672 (1993).

Effect of Juror Admitting Bias: When a juror in a criminal case on examination first admits bias in favor of the defendant but later states that notwithstanding such bias he can consider the evidence impartially, the latter statement should be received with caution. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

When Trial Judge Should Sustain Challenge: On the voir dire examination of a prospective juror the trial court is the judge of the weight to be given to his testimony, and if it has any doubt as to the existence of such a state of mind in a juror as would disqualify him, it should sustain a challenge to him in the interest of justice. St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Causes Enumerated Not Exclusive: The constitutional provision that one accused of crime shall have the right to trial by an impartial jury is a limitation upon the power of the Legislature, and it is beyond its power to curtail it. Hence, when it clearly appeared from the examination of a juror on his voir dire that some circumstance or connection with the case rendered him unfit to serve, he should have been disqualified even though the cause did not fall within any of those specified in the former statute. St. v. Russell, 73 M 240, 235 P 712 (1925), followed in St. v. Williams, 262 M 530, 866 P2d 1099, 50 St. Rep. 1672 (1993).

Juror's Prejudice: A juror who testified on his voir dire examination that he entertained a bitter prejudice against the Industrial Workers of the World and against every member of it, that the prejudice would abide with him throughout the trial, and that it would require evidence to remove the prejudice and less evidence to convict the defendant, who was a member of the organization, than if he were not a member, was not an impartial juror, and refusal to grant a challenge for cause was error. St. v. Brooks, 57 M 480, 188 P 942 (1920).

Bias Concealed by Juror: Under former statute providing for a new trial when the verdict has been decided by lot or by any means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of all the jurors, the fact that a juror, when sworn, was biased and prejudiced against the defendant, which fact he concealed upon his voir dire examination and which neither the defendant nor his counsel discovered until after the verdict, was ground for a new trial. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Juror With Opinion Based on Newspaper Story or Hearsay: A juror is competent who has formed and expressed an opinion on the case from reading newspaper statements and from hearsay but who states that he does not know the defendant, has no prejudice, and notwithstanding such opinion, can impartially try the case. St. v. Sheerin, 12 M 539, 31 P 543 (1892). See also St. v. Howard, 30 M 518, 77 P 50 (1904); St. v. Byrne, 60 M 317, 199 P 262 (1921); St. v. Juhrey, 61 M 413, 202 P 762 (1921); St. v. Vettere, 76 M 574, 248 P 179 (1926); St. v. Simpson, 109 M 198, 95 P2d 761 (1939), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Knox, 119 M 449, 175 P2d 774 (1946); St. v. Moran, 142 M 423, 384 P2d 777 (1963); St. v. White, 151 M 151, 440 P2d 269 (1968).

Case Notes

Defendant's Batson Challenge of Prosecution's Race-Based Use of Peremptory Challenges During Voir Dire Properly Dismissed: During voir dire in Barnaby's trial on drug charges, the state used two peremptory challenges to dismiss jurors who were tribal members. Defense counsel used one peremptory challenge to remove a tribal member. Barnaby objected to the state's use of challenges to remove members from the venire based solely on their race, citing Batson v. Ky., 476 US 79 (1986), but the objection was overruled. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the three-part Batson test to determine whether the state exercised its peremptory challenges in a discriminatory manner. First, defendant must establish a prima facie case for discrimination based on the fact that defendant belongs to a cognizable racial group and then must raise an inference that the state used peremptory challenges to exclude members of the venire on account of their race. If defendant makes that case, the state must provide a race-neutral explanation for its use of peremptory strikes, and the trial court then determines whether the defendant has established purposeful discrimination. Here, the trial court did not rule whether Barnaby presented a prima facie case for discrimination. Nevertheless, the state provided its explanation for striking the jurors. One of the jurors was related to Barnaby, and the other was a close friend of Barnaby's attorney. The trial court also noted that the third strike was made by Barnaby, not the state. Although the trial court did not develop a complete record by providing a full explanation of the rationale for denying Barnaby's Batson challenge (subsequently required under St. v. Parrish, 2005 MT 112, 327 M 88, 111 P3d 671 (2005)), the Supreme Court affirmed because the state provided highly credible race-neutral explanations for its peremptory strikes. St. v. Barnaby, 2006 MT 203, 333 M 220, 142 P3d 809 (2006).

Sufficient Race-Neutral Explanation Regarding Exercise of Peremptory Challenge to Remove Only Potential Juror of Different Ethnic Background — Batson Argument Properly Denied: During defendant's trial for deliberate homicide, aggravated kidnapping, and sexual intercourse without consent, the state exercised a peremptory challenge to remove the only potential juror of a different ethnic background. Defendant contended that the challenge was discriminatory, based on Batson v. Ky., 476 US 79 (1986). Despite the fact that the District Court did not make findings regarding its reason for denying defendant's objection, the record was sufficient for the Supreme Court to determine that the state provided a sufficient race-neutral explanation for its exercise of the peremptory challenge, namely that concern for the juror arose not from ethnic background, but rather from the juror's experience with assault cases. The explanation was sufficient to withstand defendant's Batson challenge, and the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Falls Down, 2003 MT 300, 318 M 219, 79 P3d 797 (2003).

Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Voir Dire Dismissed on Direct Appeal — Chastain Overruled: Following a felony DUI conviction, Herrman appealed, claiming ineffective assistance of counsel during voir dire. Counsel failed to remove several jurors for cause, but later removed the jurors by peremptory challenge, effectively causing the loss of peremptory challenges to which Herrman was entitled. The Supreme Court noted that jury impartiality goes to the very integrity of the justice system and that the presence of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses must be presumed prejudicial and result in reversal. Herrman cited St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57 (1997), for the proposition that ineffective assistance occurred because counsel failed to develop information in the record demonstrating an individual juror's bias and to exercise challenges for cause against those jurors expressing bias. However, the Supreme Court overruled Chastain because it was a mistake to determine that counsel was ineffective during voir dire based on the lack of a reason apparent on the record. Although lawyers will state their reasons on the record for challenging a juror for cause, they do not state their reasons for not challenging a juror. Herrman's lawyer might have had tactical reasons for not challenging certain jurors for cause, but those reasons were not on the record, so the Supreme Court could not address Herrman's ineffective assistance claims without considering matters outside the record. Contentions based on matters outside the record are more appropriately raised in a petition for postconviction relief. Thus, Herrman's direct appeal was dismissed to allow a petition for postconviction relief that could address why counsel did not challenge certain jurors for cause. St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), followed in St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003), and, with regard to lack of a record regarding defense counsel's trial tactics as necessitating a postconviction hearing in lieu of direct appeal, in St. v. Henderson, 2003 MT 285, 318 M 31, 78 P3d 848 (2003). Herrman was also followed in St. v. Olsen, 2004 MT 158, 322 M 1, 92 P3d 1204 (2004). See also St. v. Whitlow, 2001 MT 208, 306 M 339, 33 P3d 877 (2001), and St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007).

Peremptory Challenges to Prospective Jurors — Factors Necessary to Show Purposeful Discrimination in Jury Selection — Waiver of Batson Challenge When Not Timely Raised: Ford contended that the state violated his due process rights by improperly exercising all of its peremptory challenges at trial to exclude women from the jury panel, citing J.E.B. v. Ala. ex rel. T.B., 511 US 127 (1994), as a prohibition against gender discrimination during jury selection. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court applied a de novo review to the trial court's application of the law, deferring to the trial court's findings of fact unless clearly erroneous. The Supreme Court then reviewed the history of the discriminatory use of peremptory challenges as addressed in Batson v. Ky., 476 US 79 (1986), and its progeny, noting that the rules regarding challenges to jury selection no longer apply exclusively to prosecutors striking members of the venire who are the same race as the defendant, but that any racially motivated reason for striking a prospective juror is prohibited whether the juror shares the racial identity of the defendant or not (see Powers v. Ohio, 499 US 400 (1991)). Further, the challenge is no longer limited to the government in criminal actions but has been extended to prevent a defendant in a criminal action from using peremptory challenges to exclude jurors based on race (see Ga. v. McCollum, 505 US 42 (1992)), has been applied to private litigants in civil cases (see Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 US 614 (1991)), and has been used to prohibit gender discrimination in jury selection, as in J.E.B. In order to establish a prima facie case of purposeful discrimination, a defendant must show that: (1) the defendant is a member of a cognizable racial group; (2) the prosecutor exercised peremptory challenges to remove members of the defendant's race from the venire; and (3) these facts and other relevant circumstances raise an inference that the prosecutor used the peremptory jury selection practice to exclude members of the venire from the petit jury on account of their race. In addition, numerous courts have held that the right to be tried by a jury whose members are selected pursuant to nondiscriminatory criteria must be exercised in a timely manner, and failure to raise a Batson challenge before the jury is sworn and before the venire is dismissed results in waiver of the challenge. In Ford's case, his counsel waited until after the jury was sworn and the venire dismissed before raising the Batson challenge. Because the motion was untimely, and therefore waived, the Supreme Court declined to address the merits of Ford's claim of discriminatory use of peremptory challenges. St. v. Ford, 2001 MT 230, 306 M 517, 39 P3d 108 (2001), followed in St. v. Parrish, 2005 MT 112, 327 M 88, 111 P3d 671 (2005), and Ford v. St., 2005 MT 151, 327 M 378, 114 P3d 244 (2005).

Potential for Emotional Involvement as Juror Bias — Omissions by Counsel During and as Result of Voir Dire as Ineffective Assistance Warranting Reversal: Two prospective jurors expressed reservations about their ability to judge a case fairly, yet counsel failed either to follow up with additional questions about whether the prospective jurors could set aside their feelings and render a fair verdict or to exclude the jurors by challenge for cause or peremptorily. When counsel, for no apparent reason, abandons a client's right to challenge a juror, error is attributed to counsel. The presence on a jury of even one juror who cannot fairly assess the credibility of witnesses is considered prejudicial. Counsel's failure to take steps to prevent the presence on the jury of two such jurors constituted ineffective assistance of counsel and reversible error. St. v. Chastain, 285 M 61, 947 P2d 57, 54 St. Rep. 1044 (1997), following U.S. v. Eubanks, 591 F2d 513 (9th Cir. 1979), and overruled in St. v. Herrman, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), to the extent that a claim of ineffective assistance of counsel for failure to challenge prospective jurors in voir dire can be determined from a record that is silent as to counsel's reasoning.

Death Penalty Not Sought — No Capital Case — Peremptory Challenges Limited: When the prosecutor and court agree that the death penalty will not be sought, it will not be considered a capital case in determining the number of peremptory challenges to which a party is entitled. It was, therefore, proper for the court to limit each defendant to six peremptory challenges. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Absence During Peremptory Challenges Not Violative of Constitutional Rights: In a prosecution for theft by accountability, the defendant was not denied due process of law by her absence from the courtroom during peremptory challenges of jurors. Although the defendant's presence may be crucial during the voir dire questioning of the jury, the Supreme Court has previously held that a defendant's rights are not violated when the matters handled in his absence are purely legal and the peremptory challenge of jurors is only a pro forma execution of the decisions formulated during voir dire. Her absence was therefore not injurious to either her right of due process or her right of confrontation. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981).

How Challenges Taken — Waiver: When the State waived its fourth peremptory challenge and the defendant exhausted his peremptory challenges, it was not error, on the panel's being filled and passed for cause, to permit the State to peremptorily challenge a juror who was in the box when the State waived its fourth challenge; the State's waiver of its fourth challenge was not a waiver of any subsequent challenge to which it was entitled. St. v. Peel, 23 M 358, 59 P 169 (1899).

Case Notes

Substitution of Juror After Case Submitted to Jury — No Error: After a felony sexual intercourse without consent case was submitted to the jury, a juror told the trial court that she could not perform her duties, and the trial court discharged her and replaced her with an alternate juror. Grindheim objected on grounds that this section does not allow substitution of a juror after a case is submitted to the jury. The Supreme Court disagreed and cited St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153 (1986), for the holding that substitution of an alternate for a juror who can no longer perform the juror's duties is permitted at any time prior to the reaching of a verdict. St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Absence of Defendant From Critical Trial Proceeding Violative of Fundamental Right to Appear and Defend in Person — No Error Given Curative Action of Trial Court: During Kennedy's criminal trial, a juror communicated with one of the state's witnesses. The trial judge then met with the juror in chambers without Kennedy or any counsel present, and the juror admitted the conversation, but denied mentioning anything about it to the jury. The court then met with counsel in chambers, replaced the juror with an alternate, excluded the witness from testifying, and went on with the trial. Defense counsel moved for mistrial and dismissal with prejudice, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that excluding Kennedy from the conversation with the juror violated Kennedy's fundamental right to be present at all critical stages of trial to defend in person. Further, any waiver by defense counsel by failing to object was ineffective because Kennedy was never told that he had a right to be present or that the juror questioning was about to occur. However, Kennedy was not prejudiced or deprived of a fair trial by the error in light of the District Court's corrective actions. Thus, denial of a mistrial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

Possibility of Felony Charge Against Juror as Affecting Impartiality — Replacement Affirmed: Defendant in a sexually related homicide case contended District Court erred by replacing a juror during trial after finding out the juror was to be arrested for felony sexual intercourse without consent. The court held that the possibility of the juror's being charged was sufficient to prevent his impartiality in deliberations. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that defendant failed to demonstrate any prejudice from the action and that replacement was timely pursuant to this section. St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986), followed in St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Alternate Juror — Conversation With Jury After Jury Retires: A jury alternate returned to the jury room with the jury after the case had been submitted for decision, which defendant contended was reversible error, since 46-16-503 requires an officer of the court to prevent conversations between the jurors and others after the jury retires. The Supreme Court held that an alternate, although excluded from deliberating and voting, is in every other respect a juror; therefore, an alternate does not fall within the statutory ban against conversations with others. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Alternate Juror Properly Called: The court did not err when, prior to the jury retiring, it replaced with an alternate a juror who was a personal friend of the prosecutor and had personal knowledge of the evidence of the case. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977).

46-16-120. Misdemeanor offenses.

Commission Notes

1991 Comment: This statute is a controlling provision for those cases in which a defendant is charged with a misdemeanor offense. The statute has retained elements of 1987 MCA 46-12-103 and 46-17-205 [now repealed].

Case Notes

Counsel Present but Defendant Not in Attendance for District Court Appeal in Misdemeanor Case — No Authority of District Court to Dismiss Appeal When Defendant Not Required to Be Present: Clark appealed a Justice's Court judgment for issuing a bad check, and the District Court set a trial de novo. On the day of trial, Clark's counsel was present, but Clark did not appear in person. Because Clark was not present, the District Court dismissed the appeal pursuant to 46-17-311 and reinstated the Justice's Court judgment. Clark appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed and remanded. Under this section, a defendant may appear by counsel only in all misdemeanor cases unless the court requires the defendant's personal appearance. Because Clark's counsel was present and ready to proceed and because the District Court did not require Clark's personal presence, the District Court did not have authority to dismiss the appeal and should have proceeded with the trial pursuant to 46-16-122. St. v. Clark, 2006 MT 313, 335 M 39, 149 P3d 551 (2006).

Appearance of Accused Through Attorney Allowed Unless Personal Appearance Ordered: This section clearly allows persons charged with misdemeanor offenses to appear through their attorney only, unless the court specifically requires a personal appearance by the accused. In this case, a Justice of the Peace specifically ordered the defendant to "make all court appearances" but did not order the defendant to appear in person. Therefore, an appearance by the defendant's attorney satisfied the statute, and it was error for the defendant to be held in contempt for failure to appear. St. v. Voth, 270 M 349, 892 P2d 537, 52 St. Rep. 225 (1995).

46-16-121. Felony offenses.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the provision governing the presence of the defendant at proceedings in felony cases. It also directs that unless the court expressly orders the defendant's presence, the defendant has the option of being personally present at all other proceedings.

Subsection (3) expressly states that the defendant need not appear before the Supreme Court. Under this provision, the defendant's presence is not required for appeal, postconviction, and other motion hearings occurring after sentencing. This does not intend to alter the defendant's right to be present when that right is otherwise established. See Rule 14, Rules of Sentence Review Division (1987).

Case Notes

Shackling of Defendant at Trial to Ensure Security of Courtroom — No Due Process Violation: At Herrick's attempted deliberate homicide trial, the trial court agreed to provide additional security measures, including leg shackles, reasoning that the jury was not likely to see the shackles while Herrick was seated. Following conviction, Herrick appealed on grounds that the use of shackles violated his due process right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that the due process clause of the U.S. Constitution entitles a criminal defendant to appear before a jury free of shackles and other physical restraints and concluded that the Montana Constitution does not provide more protection with regard to shackling than the U.S. Constitution. However, that right is not absolute, and a trial judge's decision to shackle a defendant is not unconstitutional per se (see Morgan v. Bunnell, 24 F3d 49 (9th Cir. 1994)). The Supreme Court adopted the two-part test in Morgan for determining whether a trial court has abused its discretion in restraining a defendant at trial. Under that test, the trial court must be persuaded by compelling circumstances that some measure is needed to maintain the security of the courtroom and must pursue less restrictive alternatives before imposing physical restraints. In this case, the trial court satisfied both parts of the test. The facts presented compelling circumstances to support the court's exercise of its broad discretion in determining that additional security was necessary, and the court took great care to prevent the jury from being aware that Herrick's ankles were shackled. Nothing indicated that the jury saw the leg restraints at any time, so Herrick's rights to individual dignity, a fair trial, and due process were not violated. St. v. Herrick, 2004 MT 323, 324 M 76, 101 P3d 755 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Finch, 975 P2d 967 (Wash. 1999), followed in St. v. Merrill, 2008 MT 143, 343 M 130, 183 P3d 56 (2008), to the extent that keeping a defendant shackled during trial without establishing compelling circumstances for security measures constitutes a violation of the defendant's constitutional due process rights. See also Ill. v. Allen, 397 US 337 (1970).

Presence of Defendant in Handcuffs — No Mistrial:

When Porter entered the courtroom for trial, he was in handcuffs. Defense counsel requested that the handcuffs be removed, and Porter was not shackled during trial. Nevertheless, Porter contended that the failure of counsel to request a mistrial constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed. In St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977), the court addressed a similar situation and concluded that a defendant is not denied a fair trial or entitled to a mistrial solely because the defendant was momentarily and inadvertently seen in handcuffs. In St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980), the court found that in the absence of an indication of prejudicial circumstances, such an occurrence does not warrant a new trial. In St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193 (1981), the court concluded that no showing of prejudice to a defendant results from a momentary viewing of a defendant in handcuffs. Despite these previous holdings, Porter suggested that Rhoden v. Rowland, 172 F3d 633 (9th Cir. 1999), should apply. The Rhoden court found that a defendant's shackling during trial amounted to a due process violation. The Supreme Court distinguished Rhoden because Porter was not shackled during trial, and only briefly appeared in handcuffs in front of a group of potential jurors. Porter failed to establish any prejudice, and counsel's failure to move for a mistrial did not constitute ineffective assistance. Porter v. St., 2002 MT 319, 313 M 149, 60 P3d 951 (2002).

If there were no showing of prejudice to the defendant resulting from a momentary viewing of him in handcuffs by the jury outside the courtroom, he has not been denied a fair trial and hence is not entitled to a mistrial. St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

It was not reversible error for the trial court to deny the defendant's motion for mistrial because the State had caused the defendant to appear in handcuffs before the jury panel. Defendant was "momentarily and inadvertently seen in handcuffs" by prospective jury members prior to trial, and there was no indication of prejudicial consequences in the record. St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980).

Defendant's Exclusion From In-Chambers Individual Voir Dire Proceedings Violative of Right to Be Present at Critical Stages of Trial: Bird was accused of felony partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, the District Court conducted in-chambers voir dire specifically to elicit prospective jurors' personal feelings and experiences regarding domestic violence. Both the prosecutor and defense counsel were present, but Bird was not. Once the jury panel was passed for cause, the court recessed and met with counsel in chambers to allow the exercise of peremptory challenges, but again Bird was not included in the meeting. At the close of the meeting, the prosecutor noticed that Bird was not present and questioned whether the defendant's presence was necessary. The judge said that it was assumed that defense counsel wished to waive Bird's presence, and defense counsel stated that Bird had expressed no feelings about it one way or another. Bird was convicted and appealed on several grounds, including whether: (1) certain jurors should have been removed for cause; (2) defense counsel rendered deficient performance; (3) Bird should have been present during the individual voir dire; (4) Bird was prejudiced by certain testimony; and (5) the burden of proof was improperly shifted to Bird. The Supreme Court found the third issue to be dispositive. The court disagreed with the state's contention that Bird's presence at voir dire had been waived. The right of a defendant to be present at all critical stages of trial, including in-chambers individual voir dire, is a fundamental right that can be waived only if the trial court obtains an on-the-record personal waiver by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently and knowingly waives that right. There can be no waiver by a person who does not know the person's rights or what is being waived. Bird was not informed of the constitutional right to be present during voir dire and was not given the opportunity to choose whether to participate, so not only did Bird not waive the constitutional right, he was never afforded the opportunity to waive it. Bird's exclusion from voir dire was a structural error that undermined the integrity of the entire trial, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), and St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), and distinguishing U.S. v. Gagnon, 470 US 522 (1985). See also St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000).

Motion for New Trial Properly Denied — Attorney Assistance Not Ineffective: Swan argued that he was ineffectively represented because his attorney failed to request an instruction on a lesser included offense, neglected to ensure Swan's presence at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge, and allowed joinder of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and felony aggravated assault charges. Finding that Swan failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court held that Swan was effectively represented because counsel's performance was within the range of competence demanded of counsel in such cases and did not prejudice Swan in a manner that would have resulted in a different trial result. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Repronouncement of Sentence in Defendant's Presence: When the trial court pronounced sentence against the defendant, convicted of second-degree assault, while the defendant was absent, it was not error for the court on its own motion to vacate the sentence and repronounce the same sentence 2 days later in the presence of the defendant and his attorney. St. v. Porter, 143 M 528, 391 P2d 704 (1964).

Conclusive Presumption: One convicted of a crime may not assert prejudicial error on the ground that the record on appeal fails to disclose that he was present at the time the verdict was returned unless the record affirmatively shows the contrary, otherwise it must be conclusively deemed that he was present in court at all stages of the trial. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

Presence of Accused at Trial — Substantial Right: Under former law, the presence of the defendant at his trial was a matter that affected the substantial rights of both parties, and therefore the provision requiring the Supreme Court to give judgment on appeal without regard to technical errors or defects not affecting the substantial rights of the parties had no application. St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922).

Clerk's Minutes Sufficient Showing: The clerk's minutes in a prosecution for a felony were construed on appeal to show that the defendant was present in court when the verdict was returned. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

46-16-122. Absence of defendant from trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is based on Rule 1043 of the California Rules of Criminal Procedure. Subsection (2) sets forth options for the court, including trial in absentia, in misdemeanor cases.

Subsection (3) governs those instances in which the defendant may be absent in felony cases after the trial has commenced in his presence.

Compiler's Comments

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in (2)(c) substituted "an arrest" for "a bench".

Case Notes

Conviction Not Entered in Violation of Defendant's Right to Be Present at Trial — Use of Prior DUI Conviction to Support Felony DUI Charge Not Error: The state sought to use three prior DUI convictions to enhance Weaver's 2005 DUI charge to felony DUI, fourth offense. Weaver contended that use of the prior 1996 conviction was constitutionally infirm because he had been tried in absentia in violation of his right to be present at the proceedings and that any waiver of that right had to be proved to be knowing, voluntary, and specific as required by this section. Because Weaver swore on direct examination that he did not have notice of the 1996 trial date, the burden shifted to the state to provide direct evidence that the 1996 conviction was not entered in violation of Weaver's rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the state met its burden. Oral and documentary evidence showed that either Weaver knew of the 1996 trial date and was willfully absent or he kept himself deliberately ignorant of the trial date, thus waiving the right to be present. When a defendant's failure to know of a continued trial date is directly attributable to the defendant's efforts to keep himself ignorant of that date, the defendant may not later complain about a lack of knowledge. Thus, the 1996 conviction was not entered in violation of Weaver's right to be present, and the District Court correctly ruled that the 1996 conviction could be used to support a charge of felony DUI. St. v. Weaver, 2008 MT 86, 342 M 196, 179 P3d 534 (2008), following U.S. v. Houtchens, 926 F2d 824 (9th Cir. 1991).

Failure of Counsel to Raise Issue of Defendant's Absence at In-Chambers Meetings as Ineffective Assistance — Failure to Raise Issue on Direct Appeal Prejudicial: During Price's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, there were 12 in-chambers conferences between the trial judge and counsels at which various subjects were discussed, including jury selection, presentation of witnesses, witness testimony, exclusion of evidence, removal of certain jurors after trial began, basic scheduling matters, and others. Price was present for only one conference. Price's trial counsel claimed that he had informed Price of the right to be present, but that Price declined to participate, and trial counsel waived Price's right to be present at 8 of the 11 conferences. Price attained new counsel for his appeal, and even though Price claimed that he never waived the right to be present at the conferences, appellate counsel failed to raise the issue of Price's absence, despite the holding in St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), that a defendant has the right to be present during critical stages of a trial. The District Court held that Price was not prejudiced because, taking into account the three meetings that counsel did not waive Price's right to be present, the outcome would not have changed had Price been there. Price appealed on grounds that the failure of appellate counsel to raise the issue constituted ineffective assistance. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. There was a legitimate legal basis upon which to raise the issue that was sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome of the appeal, and appellate counsel's failure to raise the issue constituted prejudicial error. The case was remanded to allow Price a new appeal on the issue. Price v. St., 2007 MT 307, 340 M 109, 172 P3d 1236 (2007). See also St. v. Riggs, 2005 MT 124, 327 M 196, 113 P3d 281 (2005).

Counsel Present but Defendant Not in Attendance for District Court Appeal in Misdemeanor Case — No Authority of District Court to Dismiss Appeal When Defendant Not Required to Be Present: Clark appealed a Justice's Court judgment for issuing a bad check, and the District Court set a trial de novo. On the day of trial, Clark's counsel was present, but Clark did not appear in person. Because Clark was not present, the District Court dismissed the appeal pursuant to 46-17-311 and reinstated the Justice's Court judgment. Clark appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed and remanded. Under 46-16-120, a defendant may appear by counsel only in all misdemeanor cases unless the court requires the defendant's personal appearance. Because Clark's counsel was present and ready to proceed and because the District Court did not require Clark's personal presence, the District Court did not have authority to dismiss the appeal and should have proceeded with the trial pursuant to this section. St. v. Clark, 2006 MT 313, 335 M 39, 149 P3d 551 (2006).

Defendant's Voluntary Absence From Trial — Trial in Absentia Affirmed: Following arraignment in City Court on numerous misdemeanor charges, Clark was informed of a trial date. Clark's motion for a continuance because of gout was denied when the state objected on grounds that Clark had a history of continuing trials on the basis of a physical ailment. The morning of trial, Clark checked into the hospital complaining of chest pains, but the hospital was unable to verify Clark's physical complaints and released him. The court informed Clark through the nurse that the trial would progress, but Clark never appeared. Clark was tried in absentia and convicted on all but two charges. The District Court affirmed the City Court decision to try Clark in absentia, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed as well. Clark knew of the trial date and was voluntarily absent from trial, thereby waiving the fundamental right to be present at trial. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 169, 327 M 474, 115 P3d 208 (2005).

Written Voluntary Waiver of Right to Be Present at Trial Properly Accepted: Rather than be present at the second day of trial, McCarthy signed a waiver of that fundamental right that was presented by his attorney. McCarthy later complained that the trial court erred by accepting the waiver without conducting a competency hearing and without determining whether the waiver was voluntary and whether McCarthy understood the consequences of the waiver. The Supreme Court found no error. McCarthy was informed through counsel of his right to be present, was afforded an opportunity to waive his rights, and made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary waiver of the right to be present that was witnessed by the attorney and properly presented to the trial court for the record. There was no substantial evidence that McCarthy was incompetent to waive his right and thus no reason for the trial court to conduct a competency hearing prior to accepting the waiver. St. v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004), distinguishing and following St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), and St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002).

Defendant Excluded From Trial — Defendant to Be Allowed to Reclaim Right to Be Present — Violation of Fundamental Right to Be Present Absent on-the-Record Personal Waiver: At Aceto's criminal trial, he initially represented himself with counsel on standby but became agitated and frustrated when questioning a witness, cursed the court and the witness, threw files at the witness, and was removed from the courtroom. The next day, outside the presence of the jury, Aceto apologized to the court and objected to his removal. The court ordered standby counsel to take over the defense and ordered that Aceto would not be allowed in the courtroom, but would be allowed to view the proceedings from the county detention center. Following conviction, Aceto appealed on grounds that his fundamental rights were violated because he was neither warned prior to removal from the courtroom nor allowed to return after he apologized. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed. The right to appear and defend in person is a fundamental right, and waiver of the right must be informed, intelligent, specific, voluntary, knowing, personal, and on the record. Once Aceto was ejected from the courtroom, he was not accorded the right to be physically present as an option that could be waived. Thus, the District Court violated Aceto's right to be present, as well as the letter of this section, in excluding Aceto from the courtroom without warning and refusing to allow him to return. St. v. Aceto, 2004 MT 247, 323 M 24, 100 P3d 629 (2004), following St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002). See also Ill. v. Allen, 397 US 337 (1970), and Badger v. Cardwell, 587 F2d 968 (9th Cir. 1978).

Defendant's Exclusion From In-Chambers Individual Voir Dire Proceedings Violative of Right to Be Present at Critical Stages of Trial: Bird was accused of felony partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, the District Court conducted in-chambers voir dire specifically to elicit prospective jurors' personal feelings and experiences regarding domestic violence. Both the prosecutor and defense counsel were present, but Bird was not. Once the jury panel was passed for cause, the court recessed and met with counsel in chambers to allow the exercise of peremptory challenges, but again Bird was not included in the meeting. At the close of the meeting, the prosecutor noticed that Bird was not present and questioned whether the defendant's presence was necessary. The judge said that it was assumed that defense counsel wished to waive Bird's presence, and defense counsel stated that Bird had expressed no feelings about it one way or another. Bird was convicted and appealed on several grounds, including whether: (1) certain jurors should have been removed for cause; (2) defense counsel rendered deficient performance; (3) Bird should have been present during the individual voir dire; (4) Bird was prejudiced by certain testimony; and (5) the burden of proof was improperly shifted to Bird. The Supreme Court found the third issue to be dispositive. The court disagreed with the state's contention that Bird's presence at voir dire had been waived. The right of a defendant to be present at all critical stages of trial, including in-chambers individual voir dire, is a fundamental right that can be waived only if the trial court obtains an on-the-record personal waiver by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently and knowingly waives that right. There can be no waiver by a person who does not know the person's rights or what is being waived. Bird was not informed of the constitutional right to be present during voir dire and was not given the opportunity to choose whether to participate, so not only did Bird not waive the constitutional right, he was never afforded the opportunity to waive it. Bird's exclusion from voir dire was a structural error that undermined the integrity of the entire trial, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Bird, 2002 MT 2, 308 M 75, 43 P3d 266 (2002), following St. v. Reed, 65 M

51, 210 P 756 (1922), and St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), and distinguishing U.S. v. Gagnon, 470 US 522 (1985). See also St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000).

District Court Response to Unrepresented Defendant's Failure to Appear — Remand Precluded: Subsection (2) of this section governs a District Court's response to the failure of a defendant who is unrepresented by counsel to appear during the course of a misdemeanor trial. The court has no authority to remand an appeal to a lower court under that subsection. Rickett v. Billings, 262 M 339, 864 P2d 762, 50 St. Rep. 1586 (1993), affirming Hardin v. Myers, 194 M 248, 633 P2d 677 (1981).

Hearing on Motion for New Trial: This section and Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const. (now Art. II, sec. 24, 1972 Mont. Const.), do not require that the defendant be present at a hearing on a motion for a new trial because such a hearing is held after the verdict has been rendered and is not part of the trial. St. v. Peters, 146 M 188, 405 P2d 642 (1965).

Consent to Taking Exhibits to Jury Room: After the jury had retired to the jury room for deliberation of its verdict, the jury members requested certain exhibits be sent to them. While the defendant was not present in the courtroom, his counsel gave his consent. The Supreme Court held that the proceeding did not constitute a part of the trial and therefore the defendant's presence was not required. St. v. Olson, 87 M 389, 287 P 938 (1930).

46-16-123. Absence of defendant on receiving verdict or at sentencing.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes the procedure permitting the return of a verdict and imposition of sentence in the defendant's absence. Under the 1987 code, sentencing was to occur in open court but the defendant's presence was not expressly required. See 1987 MCA 46-18-102. The statute provides that the defendant need not be present for sentencing in misdemeanor cases and allows the defendant to be absent in some instances from sentencing in felony cases.

The 1987 code allowed a verdict to be returned in misdemeanor cases without the defendant being present. In felony cases, the defendant's presence was required. The statute also provides for the possibility of entering a verdict, under appropriate circumstances, despite the defendant's absence.

Date Defendant Sentenced In Absentia Considered Date of Legally Effective Sentence for Appeal Purposes: Clark was charged with a misdemeanor traffic violation but failed to appear for trial and was tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Municipal Court in absentia pursuant to 46-16-123 on June 12, 2006. A warrant was issued for failure to appear, and Clark appeared before a different Municipal Court on July 14, 2006, and was informed of the June sentence. Clark sought to appeal to District Court, but the District Court dismissed the appeal on grounds that it was untimely. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Clark argued that dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was in error because the period for filing a Municipal Court appeal should have begun on July 14 when he was informed of the June sentence, rather than June 12 when the sentence was actually imposed. The Supreme Court disagreed. A valid sentence was imposed on June 12 and was not subject to postponement or modification until Clark appeared on the bench warrant. By Municipal Court Rule, Clark had until June 26 to file an appeal, but the appeal was not filed until July 28 and was therefore untimely and was properly dismissed by the District Court. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 317, 346 M 80, 193 P3d 934 (2008). See also St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

46-16-130. Pretrial diversion.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: A provision regulating pretrial diversion, sometimes called deferred prosecution, is new to Montana, although the practice has been statutorily recognized since at least 1979. See 1987 MCA 44-5-103(10) and (12).

The Commission believed a pretrial diversion provision was necessary because prosecutors have long employed diversion on an informal, individual basis by deferring prosecution if, for example, the accused agreed to undergo rehabilitative treatment. Since the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice recommended such programs in its 1967 report, many states have formalized diversion by statute or court rule. Pretrial diversionary programs are premised on the belief that it is not always necessary and, in fact, may often be detrimental to pursue formal courtroom prosecution for every criminal violation. In most situations, the criminal prosecution is suspended subject to the defendant's consent to treatment, rehabilitation, restitution, or other noncriminal or nonpunitive alternatives.

The statute contemplates that the decision to divert lies with the prosecutor in an exercise of his powers and is not ordinarily subject to judicial review. This conforms with existing practice in that several Montana County Attorneys conduct formal diversion programs, yet no Montana case has been found that discusses the practice. However, some litigation has occurred in other jurisdictions. These cases are collected in an annotation at 4 ALR 4th 147.

Possible Deferred Prosecution Agreement Not Considered Confidential Criminal Justice Information — Discussion by Prosecutor With Newspaper of Possible Deferred Prosecution Agreement Not Privacy Violation or Breach of Duty: Plaintiff alleged that the County Attorney negligently breached a legal duty and violated the Montana Criminal Justice Information Act of 1979 when the County Attorney told a local newspaper that plaintiff was considering a deferred criminal prosecution agreement. Plaintiff asserted that the information was confidential and that dissemination of the information was tortious. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that criminal justice information is defined as information relating to criminal justice that is collected, processed, or preserved by a criminal justice agency and held that mere discussion of a possible deferred criminal prosecution agreement does not constitute a discussion of criminal justice information. Although there may be circumstances in which a person suspected of having committed a crime has a reasonable expectation that the person's privacy will not be violated by the release of details of an investigation, plaintiff here could not seriously claim a privacy violation when it was already public knowledge that the allegations were against her, what the allegations were, who was involved as complainants, that she was the subject of a school board investigation concerning the allegations, and that her intended retirement from teaching was connected to the allegations. There was no material issue of fact concerning whether the County Attorney negligently breached a duty owed to plaintiff by discussing a possible deferred criminal prosecution agreement with the newspaper or by releasing a copy of the initial offense report, and summary judgment was affirmed. Rules of Evidence for Criminal Cases 1991 Part Comments: This part consolidates into a single part several 1987 code provisions concerning the use of evidence at a criminal trial. The statutes are modeled after and primarily preserve the 1987 code.

Part Commission Comments

Part Case Notes

Inadmissible Recorded Commentary of Crime — Harmless Error: During Strauss's negligent homicide trial, the District Court admitted two videotape recordings of the crime scene. One tape included an audio commentary portion by an investigating officer, and one depicted the positions of Strauss and the victim relative to their positions at the time that the crime was committed. Strauss objected to both tapes, but they were admitted over objection. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the tape with commentary should have been admitted without sound because the commentary was the prior statement of a nonparty witness that the Montana Rules of Evidence classify as nonhearsay. However, the commentary was not offered to rebut an allegation of fabrication, improper influence, or motive or for identification, so it could not be classified as admissible nonhearsay. Nevertheless, the state presented admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the commentary, so its admission was harmless error. As for the second videotape, based on Peschke v. Carroll College, 280 M 331, 929 P2d 874 (1997), the tape was a reenactment of Strauss's crime and was therefore subject to the foundational requirements in St. v. Leroux, 133 N.H. 781, 584 A2d 778 (1990), and Pickren v. St., 269 Ga. 453, 500 SE 2d 566 (1998), including authentication and identification. A recorded reenactment must accurately portray the event in question, and the party presenting the recording must show that the reenactment was filmed under conditions substantially similar to the actual event, which may be satisfied by testimony of a witness who was present at the crime. The state failed to meet its burden by not presenting testimony of a witness who was present at the crime scene and could testify to the accuracy of the tape. However, that error was also considered harmless because the second tape was largely cumulative of the first recording, was not injurious to Strauss's defense, was not probative of any disputed issue, and did not contribute to Strauss's conviction. St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003).

Videotaped Testimony — Preliminary Showing of Necessity Not Required: When defendant was entitled to be present at videotaping of victim's testimony and to confront the accuser but chose not to, the essential elements required by the confrontation clause were present and, therefore, the procedure did not violate defendant's constitutional right to confrontation. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993).

Videotaping Techniques Not Prejudicial: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the jury to watch videotaped testimony in which the videocamera operator zoomed in on the child sexual assault victim when she cried or was otherwise distressed. Whether prejudicial effect is outweighed by probative value is a matter within the discretion of the trial court. The Supreme Court declined a request to implement uniform procedures applicable to videotaping of testimony. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993).

Redirect Examination as to Other Crimes Following Cross-Examination as to Whether Search Took Place: During cross-examination of a recalled prosecution witness in a prosecution for conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs, a detective was asked if defendant's house was searched and answered that they had no reason to do it. On redirect examination, it was error for the judge to allow, over objections, questions and answers regarding other evidence of defendant's prior involvement with drugs. The testimony exceeded the scope of the cross-examination and violated defendant's right to notice that the information would be brought out at trial. St. v. Shaw, 255 M 298, 843 P2d 316, 49 St. Rep. 1012 (1992).

Evidence of Activity Following Commission of Crime Improperly Suppressed: The state sought to introduce evidence of defendant Moore's activities following the alleged homicide of Brisbin. The District Court denied admission of the evidence based on the potential for prejudice. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was improperly suppressed because it was relevant as tending to prove commission of the crime charged and the defendant's responsibility for it. As stated in Cruz v. St., 645 SW 2d 498 (Tex. Ct. App. 1982), admissibility is predicated on the jury's right to hear what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the crime charged so that the jury may evaluate the evidence in the context in which the criminal act occurred. Actions of a defendant subsequent to the alleged commission of a crime tend to show the consciousness of guilt and are a part of the res gestae and corpus delicti of the crime charged. Such evidence is highly probative, is not subject to the "other crimes" restriction of this rule, and is therefore admissible. St. v. Moore, 254 M 241, 836 P2d 604, 49 St. Rep. 752 (1992), followed in St. v. Berosik, 1999 MT 238, 296 M 165, 988 P2d 775, 56 St. Rep. 938 (1999).

Admissions Made to Polygraph Examiner After Polygraph Examination Finished — Admissible: Admissions made to a polygraph examiner in a postexamination interview were not inadmissible because they were somehow tied to the inadmissibility of polygraph examination results. The admissions were made after disconnection from the device and in another room and were made in response to a note given to the examiner while the postexamination interview was being conducted. The evidence of the accused's admissions had nothing to do with polygraph test results wherein the operator evaluated the credibility of a witness. The operator merely related admissions he perceived from the accused, and it was then the jury's province to evaluate the testimony. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Criminal Mischief for Damage to One's Own Property to Defraud Insurer — Relevance of Pictures of Property: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief in that he purposely drove his pickup over a steep bank to wreck it so he could collect from his insurance company. Later the pickup was vandalized. Pictures of the pickup taken after the vandalism were properly admitted as proof of defendant's motive, and their probative value was substantial and was not outweighed by prejudice to defendant, who claimed that they should not have been admitted because they were evidence of other crimes as well as the one with which he was charged and that he had not been charged with vandalism. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Parole Status of Defendant — Prosecution Questions Eliciting: On the first day of trial, the prosecutor agreed to caution his witnesses to avoid mention of defendant's parole status. The prosecutor breached his promise by twice asking one of his witnesses a question eliciting the answer that defendant was on parole. The court cautioned the jury to disregard the testimony. As a matter of law, the Supreme Court could not hold that failure to grant motion for mistrial was an abuse of discretion. Prejudice would not be presumed. Defendant failed to show that a substantial right was denied and that there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to his conviction. The evidence supporting conviction was substantial, if not overwhelming, and defendant's version of the events was simply incredible. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Circumstantial Evidence Insufficient to Sustain Conviction of Attempted Sale of Narcotics — Chemical Tests Inconclusive — Burden of Proof: Where the defendant offered to sell an undercover agent a pound of cocaine and field tests conducted on the substance offered for sale proved the substance could be either cocaine or a prescription drug called lidocaine, the District Court erred in convicting the defendant of felony sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs), as there was insufficient evidence to support a conviction. Under St. v. Stoddard, 147 M 402, 412 P2d 827 (1966), circumstantial evidence must not only be entirely consistent with guilt, it must be inconsistent with any other rational theory. Here, the field test failed to prove the drug was a dangerous drug. St. v. Starr, 204 M 210, 664 P2d 893, 40 St. Rep. 796 (1983).

Chain of Evidence — Bicycle Ridden by Motor Vehicle Homicide Victims: Defendant purposely hit and killed, with auto he was driving, two persons riding a bicycle. Testimony indicated that investigating officer picked up the bicycle at the scene and that it appeared to be in reasonably the same condition at trial as it was in when he picked it up. There was no indication at trial that it had been tampered with or was in worse condition than when officer picked it up. It was properly admitted in evidence over objection that there was insufficient evidence that it was in the same condition at trial as it was at the scene of the incident and that no chain of evidence establishing to whom it belonged and its condition prior to and after the incident was shown. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Photos of Persons Hit by Auto — Inflammatory Nature in Homicide Case: Photographs of place at which defendant purposely hit and killed two bicycle riders with auto he was driving were testified to by police officers who did not take or direct the taking of the photos but who came to the scene and investigated a very short time after the victims were hit. They testified that the photos depicted the scene as they remembered it. The photos were properly admitted in evidence. The probative value of a color photo of one victim was not outweighed by its allegedly inflammatory nature, and the photo was admissible since it lent credence to testimony of a witness that death was caused from injuries received when victim was struck by the auto. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Youth Court Proceedings — Admissibility in Criminal Proceeding: On appeal by defendant following his conviction, the Supreme Court held that evidence given in a Youth Court proceeding against a juvenile and evidence of the disposition of the juvenile in such a proceeding is to be excluded for all purposes. It was reversible error requiring a new trial when, upon cross-examination of defendant's character witness, the prosecutor asked the witness if he knew of a charge of attempted rape when defendant was 15 years old and service of 6 months' probation. The questions of the prosecutor in regard to the juvenile proceedings were evidence and inadmissible. St. v. Holzworth, 201 M 54, 651 P2d 1255, 39 St. Rep. 1949 (1982).

Other Crimes — Procedural Requirements Not Followed: Gray drove his pickup off an embankment and reported to the police that he was forced off the road. The truck was not totaled and was taken to a body shop for repairs. While at the body shop, the truck was vandalized on Gray's instructions. After the vandalism, the truck was not repairable. Gray was charged with criminal mischief with the purpose to defraud an insurer for driving the truck off an embankment. The evidence of Gray's involvement in the vandalism is evidence of other crimes. The court held that the four-element test to determine the admissibility of evidence of other crimes set out in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), was met but that the procedural requirements of Just were not followed. The judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered. St. v. Gray, 197 M 348, 643 P2d 233, 39 St. Rep. 622 (1982).

Prosecutorial Misconduct: It is not the duty of the prosecuting attorney to make independent determinations concerning the admissibility of evidence once the court rules such evidence is inadmissible. Willful attempts by the prosecutor in this case to place excluded evidence before the jury resulted in a reversal of the conviction because of its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bain, 176 M 23, 575 P2d 919 (1978).

Erroneous Admission of Collateral Evidence: It was reversible error for the court to admit collateral, irrelevant, and prejudicial evidence as the underlying reason for a debt, payment of which was coerced by the defendant's intimidating acts. St. v. Williams, 174 M 288, 570 P2d 578 (1977).

Use of Photographic Evidence:

Since the alleged prejudice could have been easily explained away in cross-examination, there was no intent to excite feelings with the photographs, and the purpose and use of the photographs was to assist the jury in understanding the case. The defendant's allegation that the photographs were gruesome, inflammatory, or otherwise prejudicial was unfounded. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

If the probative value of the photographs is proved and the use is not calculated to arouse the sympathies or prejudices of the jury, there is no error in their admission. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Use of Accused's Pretrial Testimony to Impeach: The pretrial testimony of the defendant at a suppression hearing may be used to impeach but not on the issue of guilt. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Circumstantial Evidence: The conviction of the defendant on a charge of burglary in the first degree on only circumstantial evidence did not violate 46-16-601 (renumbered 46-16-204) on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to warrant conviction. The burden of proof never shifts, but the burden of evidence may shift frequently, and when all the evidence is circumstantial, the test is whether the facts and circumstances are of such quality and quantity to support the jury determination of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Proctor, 153 M 90, 454 P2d 616 (1969).

Statement Explaining Constitutional Rights: The trial court did not err in permitting the State's witness to read an entire statement in which the defendant was warned of his constitutional rights and which was signed by the defendant since the statement was material as evidence that the defendant's constitutional rights and waiver thereof were clearly and understandably enunciated. St. v. Lucero, 151 M 531, 445 P2d 731 (1968).

Improper Admission of Judgment Roll: While the trial court erred in permitting the State in a perjury trial to introduce the judgment roll in the cause in which the alleged false testimony was given, containing papers not properly part thereof under statute, the procedure amounted to a mere irregularity which could not in any manner have prejudiced the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

1991 Comment: This statute reflects 1987 MCA 46-16-201. The statute expressly states that the Rules of Evidence will apply to criminal prosecutions. This is not a change in established procedure.

Case Notes

Failure to Object to Firefighter's Lay Testimony Regarding Burn Patterns — Admissibility Affirmed: During Henderson's arson trial, the state sought to introduce testimony of a firefighter who was at the scene. Defense counsel objected that because the firefighter was not a qualified expert, the firefighter's opinion testimony should not be allowed. The trial court allowed counsel to voir dire the firefighter in the presence of the jury, and the firefighter responded by explaining how to find a point of origin of a fire, describing indications of arson, and discussing pour patterns. Defense counsel did not move to strike the testimony or move for a limiting instruction after the court allowed the firefighter to testify as a lay witness, nor did counsel register a continuing objection to ensuing testimony that was based in part on the voir dire responses. Following conviction, Henderson contended that the testimony amounted to impermissible expert testimony, but the Supreme Court affirmed. By eliciting the evidence on voir dire, Henderson waived the right to object on appeal. Additionally, even though the testimony went beyond personal observations made at the scene, given Henderson's failure to object to the voir dire testimony regarding pour patterns, the trial court did not err in allowing testimony concerning the firefighter's observation of pour patterns at the scene. St. v. Henderson, 2005 MT 333, 330 M 34, 125 P3d 1132 (2005).

Physician-Patient Privilege: The physician-patient privilege is not available to a defendant in a criminal action since the qualifying language "in a civil action", used in 26-1-805, specifically limits the privilege to civil actions and is thus within the exception of this section. St. v. Campbell, 146 M 251, 405 P2d 978 (1965).

Inspection of Writings: Even if section 93-8301, R.C.M. 1947 (now superseded by Rule 34, M.R.Civ.P.), was made applicable to criminal cases by this section, the defendant was not entitled to the inspection of written material when there was no showing as to what the material consisted of, whether it was relevant to the defense, or that it was admissible in evidence. State ex rel. Keast v. District Court, 135 M 545, 342 P2d 1071 (1959).

Explanation of Alterations in Written Confession: When alterations appeared in an alleged written confession of the defendant, it was incumbent upon the State, under 26-1-106, relating to writings offered in evidence as exhibits in civil cases but made applicable to criminal cases by this section, to account for them before it is admissible in evidence. In the instant case the defendant testified that the writing was inaccurate. St. v. Crighton, 97 M 387, 34 P2d 511 (1934).

Accused as a Witness: When a defendant in a criminal cause becomes a witness in his own behalf, he is subject to the same rules of cross-examination and impeachment as any other witness. St. v. O'Neill, 76 M 526, 248 P 215 (1926).

Commission Notes

1991 Comment: This statute is essentially a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-16-601. The statute requires that the defendant's guilt be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. An amendment changing the final phrase to read "the defendant must be found not guilty" has been adopted. The amendment does not affect the statute that establishes the prosecution's affirmative duty to prove the defendant's guilt.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At end substituted "the defendant must be found not guilty" for "he is entitled to an acquittal"; and made minor change in style.

Justice Shaw's Reasonable Doubt Instruction: Due to the frequent citation to the instruction of Chief Justice Shaw on "reasonable doubt", found in Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850), the noted passage is printed here for convenience. "Then, what is a reasonable doubt? It is a term often used, probably pretty well understood, but not easily defined. It is not mere possible doubt; because everything relating to human affairs, and depending on moral evidence, is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case, which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge. The burden of proof is upon the prosecutor. All the presumptions of law independent of evidence are in favor of innocence; and every person is presumed to be innocent until he is proved guilty. If upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal. For it is not sufficient to establish a probability, though a strong one arising from the doctrine of chances, that the fact charged is more likely to be true than the contrary; but the evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty; a certainty that convinces and directs the understanding, and satisfies the reason and judgment, of those who are bound to act conscientiously upon it. This we take to be proof beyond reasonable doubt; because if the law, which mostly depends upon considerations of a moral nature, should go further than this, and require absolute certainty, it would exclude circumstantial evidence altogether."

Case Notes

No Error in Refusal to Instruct Jury That Acquittal Required if Evidence Supportive of Either Guilt or Innocence: At Misner's deliberate homicide trial, Misner cited St. v. Sheriff, 188 M 26, 610 P2d 1157 (1980), in proposing a jury instruction stating that when a jury finds two interpretations of the evidence to be equally reasonable, one of which points to the defendant's guilt and the other to innocence, the jury must accept the interpretation that points to innocence. The trial court rejected the instruction, and on appeal, Misner asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Sheriff is no longer good law on this point. The correct rule, as set out in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005), is that when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one of which supports guilt and the other innocence, it is the function of the trier of fact to determine which is most reasonable. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007).

Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: When it was clear from the record that a reasonable juror could have concluded from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt on several counts was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict of acquittal, and further prosecution was not barred on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140 (1993), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996).

No Burden-Shifting in Statute Allowing Evidence of Refusal to Take DUI Test: Relying on St. v. Long, 778 P2d 1027 (Wash. 1989), Robertson argued that 61-8-404(2) allows the prosecution to argue that an inference of guilt could be drawn from the evidence of his refusal to take a Breathalyzer test, impermissibly shifting the burden of proof to him to establish that the refusal was not a reflection of guilt, in violation of this section. Although the Washington and Montana versions of 61-8-404(2) are virtually identical, the Montana Supreme Court distinguished Long, finding nothing in the statute that inferred a consciousness of guilt arising from the introduction of evidence of the proof of refusal to take the test. The state still must prove the offense of DUI beyond a reasonable doubt. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000).

Identification of Defendant as Perpetrator — Necessity of In-Court Identification: It was not reversible error to refuse to dismiss on the ground that there was no in-court identification of defendant as the perpetrator. The method of identifying a defendant as the perpetrator is largely within the discretion of the trial judge. It was sufficient in this case that several police officers referred in their testimony to defendant as being the perpetrator. St. v. Stringer, 263 M 295, 868 P2d 588, 51 St. Rep. 63 (1994).

Question of Whether Circumstantial Evidence Supports Finding of Guilt or Innocence for Trier of Fact: Bromgard moved for a directed verdict of acquittal on charges of rape, arguing that the state had only provided circumstantial evidence and no fingerprints or other forensic evidence. The Supreme Court held that a conviction could be based on circumstantial evidence alone and that if the evidence was susceptible to two interpretations, one supporting guilt and the other supporting innocence, the trier of fact determines which is most reasonable. St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140, 50 St. Rep. 1320 (1993), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994), St. v. Treible, 275 M 59, 910 P2d 237, 53 St. Rep. 38 (1996), St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999), and St. v. Billedeaux, 2001 MT 9, 304 M 89, 18 P3d 990 (2001).

Jury Instruction on Meaning of Reasonable Doubt:

The jury instruction approved in St. v. Lucero, 214 M 334, 693 P2d 511 (1984), was upheld by the Supreme Court against objections that it was "strikingly" similar to an instruction disapproved by the U.S. Supreme Court in Cage v. La., 498 US 39, 112 L Ed 2d 339, 111 S Ct 328, (1990). The Supreme Court examined both instructions and found that they were dissimilar. St. v. Flesch, 254 M 529, 839 P2d 1270, 49 St. Rep. 813 (1992).

The following jury instruction, specifically approved in St. v. Lucero, 214 M 334, 693 P2d 511 (1984), is a proper statement of the meaning of reasonable doubt: "Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is proof of such a convincing character that a reasonable person would rely and act upon it in the most important of his own affairs. Beyond a reasonable doubt does not mean beyond any doubt or beyond a shadow of a doubt." St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Evidence of Flight Instruction Proper: Defendant failed to appear on the first day of his trial, but appeared the next day with an implausible story to explain his nonappearance. An evidence of flight instruction by the trial court was therefore proper. A jury is allowed to infer a consciousness of guilt from evidence of defendant's flight either to avoid arrest or prosecution (citing St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278, 44 St. Rep. 597 (1987)). Although mere failure to appear does not support the instruction, the failure to appear coupled with the implausible excuse does. St. v. Burk, 234 M 119, 761 P2d 825, 45 St. Rep. 1777 (1988), followed in St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993). Byers was overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Jury Instruction — Defendant's Failure to Produce Witnesses or Evidence: When the jury was instructed separately on the burden of proof in a criminal case, it was not error for the court to give the following instruction: "The jury will always bear in mind that the law never imposes upon a defendant in a criminal case the burden or duty of calling any witnesses or producing any evidence and no adverse inferences may be drawn from his failure to do so." St. v. Elliott, 221 M 174, 717 P2d 572, 43 St. Rep. 723 (1986).

Instruction Defining "Reasonable Doubt":

For use in future criminal cases, the Supreme Court suggests general instruction No. 1-004 of the pattern jury instructions recommended by the Commission on District Courts, without further elaboration of the definition. The pertinent part of that instruction reads: "3. The State of Montana has the burden of proving the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. 4. Proof beyond a reasonable doubt is proof of such a convincing character that a reasonable person would rely and act upon it in the most important of his own affairs. Beyond a reasonable doubt does not mean beyond any doubt or beyond a shadow of a doubt." St. v. Lucero, 214 M 334, 693 P2d 511, 41 St. Rep. 2509 (1984).

An instruction that mere unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify conviction but that one found in possession of property that may have been stolen must explain such possession in order to remove the effect of that fact as a circumstance to be considered with other evidence pointing to guilt did not deprive the defendant of the presumption of innocence. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

An instruction on "reasonable doubt" not strictly adhering to the one given by Chief Justice Shaw in Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850), and generally followed by courts, but adding inter alia that the jury is "not at liberty to disbelieve as jurors if you believe as men; your oath imposes upon you no obligation to doubt where no doubt would exist if no oath had been administered", was held not erroneous, the court being of the opinion that the decision holding that the term "reasonable doubt" defines itself is the most logical of a large number of authorities reviewed. St. v. Curtiss, 114 M 232, 135 P2d 361 (1943); St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

The trial court, in giving the definition of "reasonable doubt" in an instruction on the subject repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court, did not commit reversible error by prefacing it thus: "You are instructed that a doubt which a juror is allowed to retain in his mind and under the influence of which he should form a verdict of not guilty, must always be a reasonable one", and the contention of the appellant that the phrase in effect did away with the presumption of innocence declared by a former section was not sustained. St. v. Zorn, 99 M 63, 41 P2d 513 (1935).

While the court has frequently approved as correct and sufficient to meet all requirements the instruction taken from Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850) (Territory v. McAndrews, 3 M 158 (1878); St. v. Martin, 29 M 273, 74 P 725 (1903); St. v. DeLea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1907)), error was not committed in submitting the following instruction: "The term reasonable doubt best defines itself. In a legal sense, however, a reasonable doubt is a doubt which has some reason for its basis; a doubt for which there exists in the minds of the jurors a reason, and not a doubt arising from mere caprice or groundless conjecture." (Chief Justice Brantly). St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916).

Instruction That "Reasonable Doubt" Must Be Based on Evidence and Testimony: The instruction given in the present case was misleading because the jury was instructed that a reasonable doubt could only be surmised from the evidence or testimony presented at trial and not from any other source. A lawyer or one trained in the law may recognize that a lack of evidence or an insufficiency of evidence presented at trial may give rise to a reasonable doubt, but a juror relying on the letter of this instruction may not. The effect of a jury instruction is determined by the way in which a reasonable juror could have interpreted it, not by the state courts' interpretation of its legal import. The jury could reasonably interpret the instruction to mean that affirmative evidence supporting the appellant's innocence was required as the basis for a reasonable doubt. The effect is to shift the burden of proof to the appellant, which is not constitutionally permissible. St. v. Lucero, 214 M 334, 693 P2d 511, 41 St. Rep. 2509 (1984).

Intent Disputed — Improper to Conclude Beyond Reasonable Doubt That Sandstrom Instruction Was Harmless Error:

If intent was a disputed issue at trial, a reviewing court could not rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction was harmless error and could not have tainted a jury verdict, even if the evidence of intent was overwhelming. The appropriate inquiry is whether any reasonable juror could have given the presumption raised by the instruction persuasion-shifting or conclusive effect. [Annotator's Note: See McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), apparently holding to the contrary.] In re Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: "The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant's claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Any Evidence Consistent With Theory of Innocence — Jury Not Bound to Acquit: Because of the presumption of innocence, the defendant contended that the jury must accept his interpretation of facts in a criminal trial when testimony at trial could reasonably be interpreted to support either the State's or defendant's view. A jury is not bound to accept defendant's view and reject State's view simply because the defendant would be found not guilty under the former and guilty under the latter. It is the duty of the jury to resolve conflicts of evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Effect of Possession of Stolen Property: Instruction taken from 45-6-304 (now repealed) that "you are instructed that possession of stolen property shall not constitute proof of the commission of the offense of theft. Such fact shall place a burden on the possessor to remove the effect of such fact as a circumstance to be considered with all the other evidence pointing to his guilt" was reversible error as it took away defendant's presumption of innocence and forced him to testify, by placing a burden on him to either disprove unlawful possession or prove lawful possession. That section was declared unconstitutional in St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982). St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982).

"May Infer" Rather Than "Must Presume" Not a Sandstrom Instruction: A jury instruction that uses "may infer" rather than the "Sandstrom-like" language of "must presume" is not mandatory and does not shift the burden of proof to the defendant. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982), followed in St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278, 44 St. Rep. 597 (1987).

Sandstrom Instruction — Overwhelming Evidence of Intent: Petitioner was convicted of deliberate homicide by shooting victim four times in the head. Federal District Court found it to be a violation of due process that a Sandstrom instruction that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" had been given at trial, and granted habeas corpus. The circuit court reversed on appeal, stating that it was inconceivable that any rational juror could have been convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that petitioner shot victim four times in the head without also being convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that he did so "knowingly or purposefully" (the mental element of deliberate homicide in Montana). Thus the error was harmless, for the jury would beyond a reasonable doubt have reached the same conclusion even absent the instruction. McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981); reversing McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478 (D.C. Mont. 1980).

Substantial Circumstantial Evidence to Infer Burglary:

Even though the evidence concerning a burglary by the defendant was circumstantial, the evidence was substantial enough to support the crime of burglary. Further, the quality of the state's evidence was sufficient to meet its burden of proof. The question, following Jackson v. Va., 443 US 307, 61 L Ed 2d 560, 99 S Ct 2781 (1979), is whether after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Roberts, 194 M 189, 633 P2d 1214, 38 St. Rep. 1551 (1981).

The conviction of the defendant on a charge of burglary in the first degree on only circumstantial evidence did not violate 46-16-601 (renumbered 46-16-204) on the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to warrant conviction. The burden of proof never shifts, but the burden of evidence may shift frequently, and when all the evidence is circumstantial, the test is whether the facts and circumstances are of such quality and quantity to support the jury determination of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Proctor, 153 M 90, 454 P2d 616 (1969).

Truck Theft — Substantial Lack of Evidence: Where nothing in evidence proved that a truck sold elsewhere was the truck taken from a car lot and where there was no proof that defendant took the truck missing from the lot, the evidence was not sufficient to convict. St. v. West, 190 M 38, 617 P2d 1298, 37 St. Rep. 1772 (1980).

Sandstrom Instruction — Harmless Error Doctrine Correct Test — Plain Error Rule Not Applicable — Federal Habeas Corpus: In rejecting the State's contention that the giving of the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) constituted harmless error, the court stated that in applying the "harmless constitutional error" doctrine, as set out in Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), it must be shown that the constitutional right affected is not a right basic to a fair trial and it must be found harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. For conviction the due process clause requires that each element of a crime be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, this being basic to a fair trial. The Sandstrom instruction by shifting the burden of proof of intent, an element of the crime of homicide, to the defendant denies him due process, and thus the court cannot consider the instruction as harmless error. The "plain error" doctrine is not applicable because it only sets a standard of "highly probable" that the instruction error "materially affected the verdict", the wrong standard by which to measure the effect of constitutional error. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478 (D.C. Mont. 1980); reversed by McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), on the ground that under the facts of this case the error was harmless.

Sandstrom Instruction — Viewing Instructions as a Whole — Assurance of Effect on Jury: Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus was filed in U.S. District Court. When the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) was given at a homicide trial, it may be that the defect can be cured by viewing all of the instructions as a whole; other instructions may be so "rhetorically inconsistent" (ibid. 518-519, n. 7) with the Sandstrom instruction that they overcome its presumptive effect. The court may not speculate on the curative effects of the other instructions on the jury; it must be assured that the jury did not find the defendant guilty on the grounds that he merely acted voluntarily, rather than finding the necessary criminal intent. In examining the instructions given, the court was not so assured and the petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was granted. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478 (D.C. Mont. 1980); reversed by McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), on the ground that under the facts of this case the error was harmless.

Proof of Elements of Crime — Sandstrom-Type Jury Instruction — Retrial Ordered: Defendant appealed his conviction for criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). The only issue he raised which had substantive merit was the challenge to a jury instruction similar to the Sandstrom instruction which had been found defective previously. This case is the first considered in Montana since the Sandstrom decision which has been found to be controlled by Sandstrom. To sustain the charge against the defendant, the State needed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant purposely or knowingly manufactured a dangerous drug. The voluntary act here is manufacturing. The ordinary consequence is a dangerous drug. Under this framework, the challenged jury instruction directed the jury to presume intent, purposely or knowingly, upon proof by the State of a voluntary act, manufacturing, and that act's ordinary consequence, a dangerous drug. Given the lack of qualifying instructions, a reasonable jury may have interpreted the instruction in either of two impermissible ways, as a conclusive presumption or as a shifting to the defendant of the burden of proving lack of intent upon proof by the State of the defendant's voluntary act and its ordinary consequences. The court could not agree that the offensive instruction could not have contributed reasonably to the jury's verdict because the State's case was entirely circumstantial and the evidence of intent was not overwhelming. Therefore, they could not find the error harmless. St. v. Wogamon, 188 M 34, 610 P2d 1161 (1980).

Proof of Elements of Crime — Sandstrom-Type Jury Instruction: Defendant, convicted of attempted deliberate homicide and aggravated burglary, appealed claiming error in the jury instruction stating that "you may infer that the attempted homicide was committed knowingly or purposely" under certain circumstances. Because the instruction did not apply to the burglary charge, that conviction stood. As to the homicide charge, the Supreme Court said that the instruction in question must be examined in the context of the other instructions given, as the court had decided previously that an identical instruction was not error in the context of the other instructions given. In finding the instruction in question here not error, the court contrasted the Sandstrom instruction, a presumption mandatory by its very terms which allowed the jury no discretion, with the instruction here in which the jury was told it "may infer" an element of the crime, namely, that the attempted homicide was committed knowingly or purposely. The latter instruction referred to an inference of fact and was, by its express terms, permissive. The language did not involve either a conclusive or burden-shifting presumption, nor did the instruction have the effect of allocating to the defendant some part of the burden of proof that properly rested on the State throughout the trial. This was made clear by the other instructions given by the trial court. It was not necessary for the jury to be instructed that they need not make the inference because the terms of the instructions made clear the effect and operation of the inference. Further, the operation and effect of the inference was clearly explained to the jury. St. v. Sheriff, 188 M 26, 610 P2d 1157 (1980).

Presumption of Intent — Effect on Due Process:
Defendant, charged with mitigated deliberate homicide, alleged as error the giving of the jury instruction: "The law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." Under Montana law, causing the death of another becomes deliberate homicide only when it is committed purposely or knowingly. These elements are necessary to the proof of this particular crime and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the prosecution. Intent is a difficult element to prove. The evidence normally must be in the nature of outward manifestations of the defendant's state of mind, but when a telephone line to the police station from the scene of the murder happened to be open and the defendant was overheard at length, the court knew what he was thinking from his own words. It is difficult to conceive of a better indication as to defendant's intent. Also, the officer heard the fight at the time these words were spoken and another officer found the defendant and the victim's body minutes later. The only contested element here was intent, and the evidence on it was overwhelming. Basing its holding on the probable impact of the instructions upon the mind of the average jury member, in light of the evidence, the impact of the instruction upon the jury could not reasonably have contributed to the verdict. The error in giving the contested instruction was harmless. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980).

Distinguishing Sandstrom, the court noted that the jury was not given a mandatory presumption, but it was told it could reasonably infer the defendant's intent for all the consequences which one acting in a like position would reasonably have expected. Nothing in the instruction lessened the duty of the State to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, nor did it affect the presumption of the defendant's innocence. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980), distinguishing Sandstrom v. St., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

The jury in a deliberate homicide case was instructed that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts". The U.S. Supreme Court determined that this instruction denied a defendant the constitutional right to a jury determination of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of all elements of the offense. The case was remanded to the Montana Supreme Court to determine if the instruction constituted harmless error. To find harmless error, the Supreme Court must be able to assert that the offensive instruction could not reasonably have contributed to the jury verdict. The court cannot make this assertion. The case is remanded to the District Court for retrial. St. v. Sandstrom, 184 M 391, 603 P2d 244 (1979).

In answer to the defendant's contention that the presumption in section 94-8-225, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), shifted the burden of proof of lack of intent to the defendant, the Supreme Court stated that if the existence of the proven fact would convince a rational juror of the existence of the inferred fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the statute comports with due process. St. v. McBenge, 175 M 362, 574 P2d 260 (1978).

Fair Trial — Self-Defense Instruction Proper: The jury was given the following instruction: "You are instructed that the defense of justifiable use of force or self-defense is an affirmative defense and the defendant has the burden of proving self-defense to raise a reasonable doubt of his guilt." In light of the Patterson and Leland cases the court held that, despite a stronger wording than it favors, the burden of proof did not shift to defendant with this instruction. Time and again the jury was instructed that the defendant was presumed to be innocent and that the State must prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Lopez, 185 M 187, 605 P2d 178 (1980), following Patterson v. N.Y., 432 US 197, 53 L Ed 2d 281, 97 S Ct 2319 (1977), and Leland v. Oreg., 343 US 790, 96 L Ed 1302, 72 S Ct 1002 (1952), distinguishing Sandstrom v. St., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is stricter than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

Sufficiency of Evidence — Pretrial Photographic Identification: Although a pretrial photographic identification may be suggestive, the court will examine the entire record and determine whether there are sufficient material facts, other than in-court identification, to support the conviction. St. v. Beaudette, 171 M 138, 557 P2d 297 (1976).

Possession as Prima Facie Evidence: A jury instruction taken verbatim from section 94-2704.1, R.C.M. 1947 (45-6-304, now repealed), that stated that possession of recently stolen livestock is prima facie evidence of guilt of larceny did not constitute reversible error since, even though the State has the burden of proof in criminal cases, the burden of evidence may shift to the defendant. St. v. Gloyne, 156 M 94, 476 P2d 511 (1970).

Instruction Placing Burden to Explain on Defendant: In a prosecution for grand larceny, an instruction that had the effect of placing a burden on the defendant to explain his possession of stolen property was erroneous. Such a burden deprives the defendant of his cloak of innocence and forces him to testify. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Burden of Proof — Burden of Evidence: In criminal cases the burden of proof never shifts, but the burden of the evidence may shift frequently. St. v. Moorman, 133 M 148, 321 P2d 236 (1958).

Erroneous Directed Verdict — Conflicting Evidence: In a prosecution for unlawfully driving a truck with an overload, which is a misdemeanor, it was error for the court to instruct and direct the jury to return a verdict of guilty when the evidence as to the true weight of the truck was in conflict as shown by two different state police scales. St. v. Baillargeron, 126 M 310, 249 P2d 799 (1952).

Conviction Not Justified by Evidence: In a prosecution for the crime of carrying a concealed weapon in which the defendant was found guilty by a jury, it was held on appeal that in view of the uncertainty in the mind of the State's only eyewitness as compared with witnesses for the defendant, coupled with the effect of a former section, the evidence was not sufficient to justify a conviction for the crime charged. St. v. Gilbert, 125 M 104, 232 P2d 338 (1951).

Insufficient Evidence — Showing Required: A defendant is not required to show an entire absence of evidence of some fact necessary to make out a case in order to secure a new trial. If he can convince the District Court that the evidence in its entirety is insufficient in weight to justify the verdict, he is entitled to a new trial. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

Jurors Impeaching Own Verdict: The fact that jurors may impeach their own verdict when it has been decided by lot excludes all other exceptions to the general rule that jurors will not be heard to impeach their own verdict. St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916); St. v. Wakely, 43 M 427, 117 P 95 (1911); Sutton v. Lowry, 39 M 462, 104 P 545 (1909); St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907); St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Bias Concealed by Juror: Under a former statute providing for a new trial when the verdict has been decided by lot or by any means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of all the jurors, the fact that a juror, when sworn, was biased and prejudiced against the defendant, which fact he concealed upon his voir dire examination and which neither the defendant nor his counsel discovered until after the verdict, was ground for a new trial. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

46-16-211. Who are competent witnesses.

Case Notes

Procedure When Sequestered Witness Hears Testimony: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent contended on appeal that he was prejudiced by the State's failure to exclude a witness from the hearing room while the trial was in process. All witnesses had been put under the rule of exclusion. One witness, a physician, was not aware of the court's order and inadvertently came into the courtroom a few minutes before he was to testify. The Supreme Court held that excluding testimony is not an appropriate remedy. The jury should be instructed on the credibility of the witness. In this case the witness was unaware of the order. The testimony he heard was totally unrelated to that which he was giving. No prejudice to the defendant was shown. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983).

Evidence of Drug Use of Witnesses Inadmissible as Too Remote and Without Foundation: The defendant appealed her conviction for deliberate homicide and aggravated assault in part by contending that it was error to prohibit the defense from referring to the use of marijuana by prosecution's primary witnesses in the hours before the shootings. In the Gleim case, Montana endorsed the majority rule requiring a showing that the witness was under the influence of drugs at the time the events about which he testified occurred before evidence of the witness' drug use is admissible. Implicit in the formulation of the Gleim rule is a recognition of the remoteness concept. The question of remoteness is directed to the discretion of the trial court.

While remoteness is a matter that generally goes to the credibility of the evidence rather than to its admissibility, evidence can be excluded if it is so remote that it has no evidentiary value. Given the defendant's failure to lay a proper foundation that the witnesses were under the influence of drugs at the time of the material events in this case, exclusion of the evidence was justified both under the Gleim rule and under the remoteness doctrine. St. v. Sorenson, 190 M 155, 619 P2d 1185, 37 St. Rep. 1834 (1980).

Opinion Testimony Conditioned on Foundation: It is within the discretion of the trial court to allow opinion to be given, conditioned on the subsequent production and admission of evidence that forms the basis of the opinion. Since necessary evidence that served to complete the chain of possession was supplied, there was no prejudice to the defendant. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Fifteen-Year-Old Boy Competent: A boy 15 years old, called as a witness, who answered that he understood what he had done when he took the oath, that he knew the difference between truth and falsehood, that the truth was that which was so and not that which was not so, and that he knew that if he did not tell the truth he would be punished, sufficiently qualified himself to testify in a criminal case. St. v. Cadotte, 17 M 315, 42 P 857 (1895).

46-16-212. Competency of spouses.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: Two amendments to the 1987 code's provisions regarding privilege for communication between spouses have been adopted. See 1987 MCA 46-16-212. Subsection (1)(c) has added "abuse" to the language for clarification and has amended the exception to include either spouse's children. Subsection (2) emphasizes that the privilege applies only to communications or conversations.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning of (1) substituted "Neither spouse may testify to the communications or conversations between spouses that occur during their marriage unless" for "Except with the"; in (1)(a), at end, substituted "the defendant-spouse is obtained" for "both"; in (1)(b), at beginning, inserted "the defendant-spouse has been charged with an act of"; in (1)(c), at beginning, inserted "the defendant-spouse has been charged with abuse", before "children" inserted "the other spouse or either spouse's", and after "children" deleted "by either party, or abandonment or neglect of one by the other"; in (2), at beginning, inserted exception clause and at end deleted "in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Testimony Allowed Despite Marriage Between Defendant and Witness After Crime Charged but Before Trial — Applicability of Spousal Privilege — Harmless Error: After Baldwin was charged for several drug crimes, he married one of the witnesses who was to testify against him. The District Court cited this section and allowed the witness to testify. Baldwin asserted error, and the Supreme Court agreed. The language of this section applies to the competency of a spouse to testify, not to spousal privilege. Because Baldwin and the witness were married at the time of trial, under 26-1-802, the testimony should have been excluded based on spousal privilege. However, admission of the testimony in this case was harmless error because the testimony of several other witnesses was sufficient to support Baldwin's conviction. St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003).

Wife Not Incompetent Witness in Criminal Trial Against Husband — 1991 Amendment to Statute as Procedural Change: An alleged crime was committed prior to October 1, 1991. The version of this section in effect at that time held that with some exceptions, one spouse was incompetent to testify against another in a criminal proceeding. The legislative change to this section in 1991 provided that with some exceptions, one spouse was competent to testify against another in a criminal proceeding. Because the statutory change was procedural rather than substantive, the version in effect at the time of trial rather than at the time of the crime was held to apply. Therefore, the testimony of a spouse, if it meets the other rules of evidence, is not to be excluded on the grounds of competency as a witness unless it is testimony of communications and conversation between the spouses during their marriage. St. v. Moore, 254 M 241, 836 P2d 604, 49 St. Rep. 752 (1992).

Preindictment Delay — No Violation of Due Process: Defendant forged and cashed a check of his wife's and kept the proceeds for himself. The County Attorney's office investigated in March 1988 but declined to prosecute because the wife was barred from testifying against defendant by 26-1-802 (spousal privilege) and this section (competency of spouses). The couple was divorced in May 1989. On December 12, 1989, defendant was charged with theft and forgery and was eventually convicted of theft. The Supreme Court affirmed and found that defendant had not shown actual, substantial prejudice as a result of the delay in prosecution. Prosecution was commenced within the applicable 5-year statute of limitations. The fact that defendant could no longer rely on the spousal privilege and competency of spouses statutes to prevent a witness from coming into court and testifying about the theft does not constitute "prejudice" to defendant. St. v. Krinitt, 251 M 28, 823 P2d 848, 48 St. Rep. 1088 (1991).

Admission of Adverse Testimony of Wife — Harmless Error: The trial court erroneously allowed defendant's wife to testify over his objection under 46-16-212, which indicates that a wife is not a competent witness against her husband without his consent in a criminal proceeding against him regardless of whether the testimony pertains to observations of the spouse's actions or whether the testimony consists of communications made between spouses. To be distinguished is 26-1-802, which indicates that if a defendant is not married at the time of trial, his former spouse is competent to testify but cannot be examined without his consent as to any communication made between the spouses during the marriage. In the present case, the trial court's error was harmless since the wife's testimony was essentially identical to the defendant's and thus did not affect any substantial right of the defendant and there was no reasonable possibility that the wife's testimony could have contributed to defendant's conviction. St. v. Roberts, 194 M 189, 633 P2d 1214, 38 St. Rep. 1551 (1981), followed in St. v. Shaw, 199 M 248, 648 P2d 287, 39 St. Rep. 1324 (1982).

Neglect of Children: A wife could testify against her husband in a homicide prosecution for the alleged beating death of her child since such conduct amounted to "neglect" of a child within this section. "Neglect" includes any abuse of children, whether inflicted negligently or intentionally. This section rather than 26-1-802 was applicable in determining any marital privilege. St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973).

Evidence Other Than Communications: The statute applies to communications only. Therefore, the testimony of the Deputy Sheriff that the wife of the defendant accompanied him to the area where evidence which served to convict the defendant was recovered should have been allowed. St. v. Houchin, 149 M 503, 428 P2d 971 (1967).

Improper Testimony: It was error to permit a wife to testify against her husband in a trial for assault when no offense against the wife was charged. St. v. Storm, 124 M 102, 220 P2d 674 (1950).

46-16-213. Testimony of person legally accountable.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is primarily a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-16-213, which recognized a limitation on the value of testimony provided by persons legally accountable. The statute continues to recognize that in order to sustain a conviction, such evidence must be corroborated. The second sentence was not retained because it was considered unnecessary.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "person may not be found guilty" for "conviction cannot be had" and deleted last sentence that read: "The corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof"; and made minor change in style.

Case Notes

No Error in Instructing Jury That Determination of Accomplice Left to Trier of Fact: Dewitz's traveling companion was initially charged with setting up a meth lab because the rooms were rented in the companion's name, but the charges were dismissed when it was discovered that the companion was not involved in setting up the meth lab in Dewitz's room. At trial, an instruction was given to the jury stating that it was up to the jury to determine whether the companion was an accomplice. Dewitz contended that the trial court should have instead instructed the jury that, having been initially charged with the same crime, the companion was an accomplice as a matter of law and that corroborating evidence was therefore required. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because the parties disagreed whether the companion was an accomplice, the issue was properly given to the jury to decide. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009), distinguishing St. v. Johnson, 276 M 447, 918 P2d 293 (1996).

Sufficient Corroborating Evidence to Testimony of Legally Accountable Witness: Corroborating evidence included testimony of the wife of a witness deemed legally accountable for offense, the hunting license records produced by a game warden, the testimony by a game warden as to the opening date of hunting season in 2002, a photo of defendant with the bear carcass, and the game warden's testimony that he inspected bear parts in a freezer located in a lodge owned by defendant. This was sufficient to support an accountable witness's testimony regarding unlawful possession of an illegally killed bear. St. v. Wendler, 2008 MT 370, 346 M 467, 197 P3d 932 (2008).

Photographs and Deer Tags Sufficient to Corroborate Accomplice Testimony: Envelopes containing photographs and unused deer hunting tags were sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice, who was the defendant's wife, regarding hunting and protected bird violations. State v. Torgerson, 2008 MT 303, 345 M 532, 192 P3d 695 (2008).

Sufficient Corroborative Evidence to Support Conspiracy Conviction: Marler was convicted of conspiracy to commit robbery. On appeal, Marler contended that there was insufficient corroborative evidence to support the conspiracy conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. A person may not be found guilty solely from an accomplice's testimony unless that testimony is corroborated by other evidence that in itself and without the aid of the testimony of the one responsible or legally accountable for the same offense tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Pursuant to St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004), evidence may corroborate accomplice testimony sufficiently even though standing alone it fails to support a conviction or to make out a prima facie case against the defendant. Circumstantial evidence, disputed evidence, or evidence that is consistent with innocent conduct may suffice to corroborate accomplice testimony, but evidence fails to corroborate accomplice testimony sufficiently if it reveals nothing more than a crime's occurrence or the circumstances of the crime's commission. In this case, the state presented independent evidence tending to connect Marler with the conspiracy to commit robbery, including a map of the floor plan of the business to be robbed, testimony of Marler's attempts to recruit others in the robbery, the arrest of an armed conspirator outside the apartment where Marler was residing, cell phone images of the coconspirators holding handguns and displaying the same hand gestures, and testimony that Marler had plans to leave town but needed additional funds. When viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, the evidence was sufficient for a jury to conclude that Marler conspired to commit robbery, and the District Court's denial of Marler's motion for acquittal based on insufficient evidence was affirmed. St. v. Marler, 2008 MT 13, 341 M 120, 176 P3d 1010 (2008).

Eyewitness Testimony and Forensic Evidence Sufficient to Corroborate Accomplice Testimony: Forensic evidence matching the victim's head wounds to a ball-peen hammer and verified accounts of the defendant's demeanor and activities were adequate to corroborate an accomplice's testimony. St. v. Burkhart, 2004 MT 372, 325 M 27, 103 P3d 1037 (2004).

Failure of Counsel to Request Instruction on Accomplice Testimony Constituting Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Failure of Court to Give Instruction Prejudicial: Kougl was convicted of operating an unlawful clandestine laboratory and subsequently appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel. The state's case was based largely on the testimony on three accomplices. At trial, both the prosecution and defense counsel pointed out to the jury in closing arguments that accomplice testimony should be viewed with suspicion because of the accomplices' criminal conduct and the deals that they cut with the state. However, Kougl's counsel did not request a jury instruction that accomplice testimony ought to be viewed with distrust and that it must be corroborated. Applying the Strickland test for effective assistance of counsel, the Supreme Court found that Kougl's counsel's failure to request the instructions constituted a failure to use the law to strike at the heart of the state's case, and because there was no plausible explanation for not asking for the instructions, counsel's performance was deficient and the first prong of Strickland was satisfied. Further, the trial court failed its duty to instruct the jury on the law, which is a duty that may not be delegated to counsel because what the court tells the jury carries the force of law, while counsel's comments do not. Thus, the second prong of Strickland requiring a showing of prejudice was also satisfied because if the jury had been properly instructed, there was a reasonable probability that it would have arrived at a different outcome. Therefore, Kougl received ineffective assistance of counsel, and Kougl's conviction was reversed. St. v. Kougl, 2004 MT 243, 323 M 6, 97 P3d 1095 (2004), following St. v. Rose, 1998 MT 342, 292 M 350, 972 P2d 321 (1998), and followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008).

Sufficient Independent Evidence Corroborating Accomplice Testimony of Conspiracy to Commit Theft: Following conviction for conspiracy to commit felony theft, Black asserted that the testimony of several witnesses was not sufficiently corroborated. The Supreme Court disagreed. Corroborating evidence need not extend to every fact to which an accomplice testifies, nor is corroborating evidence insufficient just because it is circumstantial, disputed, or inconsistent with innocent conduct. Setting aside the accomplice testimony entirely, in this case, there was sufficient independent evidence from Black himself and from nonaccomplice witnesses to indicate Black's complicity in the theft. St. v. Black, 2003 MT 376, 319 M 154, 82 P3d 926 (2003), followed in St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009), regarding the test for sufficiency of corroborating evidence.

Accomplice Facing Charges Related to Different Count From Defendant — Corroboration of Testimony: Byers was charged with conspiracy to manufacture dangerous drugs based on the testimony of three accomplices. The testimony of two of the accomplices was inadmissible under this section, but testimony was also given by a third accomplice who was charged with complicity with Byers in a different crime. Byers contended that the testimony of the third accomplice was also inadmissible; however, because the third accomplice was facing charges related to acts with Byers on a different count, the corroborative testimony of the third accomplice was proper. St. v. Byers, 2003 MT 83, 315 M 89, 67 P3d 880 (2003).

Evidence Unrelated to Accomplice Testimony Sufficient to Corroborate Drug Lab Operation: Byers was charged with operating a methamphetamine laboratory and conspiracy to manufacture methamphetamine. Two accomplices testified against Byers in exchange for use immunity. Byers asserted that the accomplices' testimony was inadmissible pursuant to this section, but the Supreme Court disagreed. There was sufficient physical evidence of drug manufacturing to provide independent corroboration of the witnesses' testimony, unrelated to the accomplice testimony, so that a jury could reasonably infer that Byers was involved in the manufacture of methamphetamine. Byers' conviction was affirmed. St. v. Byers, 2003 MT 83, 315 M 89, 67 P3d 880 (2003).

Sufficient Corroborative Evidence:

In Fey's trial for negligent homicide, negligent vehicular assaults, conspiracy, misdemeanor DUI, and misdemeanor transactions with minors, there was sufficient corroborating evidence for an accomplice's testimony that he removed alcohol from a wrecked car on Fey's instruction. A jury could have reasonably inferred from the fact that Fey walked into a field to investigate an object "which caught his eye as it reflected light from the sun" that he was looking for the alcohol containers that the witness had removed from the car the night of the crash. The evidence clearly tended to connect Fey with the commission of conspiracy. St. v. Fey, 2000 MT 211, 301 M 28, 7 P3d 358, 57 St. Rep. 829 (2000), following St. v. Kemp, 182 M 383, 597 P2d 96 (1979).

Defendant questioned the sufficiency of corroboration of the robber's testimony and defendant's girlfriend's testimony. The following corroborating evidence was sufficient to uphold a conviction of robbery by accountability: (1) defendant's admission to his girlfriend that he was in a bar with the robber prior to the robbery and that the robber had a gun and planned to commit a robbery; (2) defendant's statements to the FBI that he drove the getaway car that was used in the crime; (3) defendant's admission to the FBI that he had taken the robber to her residence to change clothes; (4) defendant's admission that he had taken money from the robber after the robbery; and (5) discovery by police of defendant and the robber in a car matching the description of the vehicle seen at the scene of the robbery less than 2 hours after the robbery. St. v. Koontz, 249 M 109, 813 P2d 463, 48 St. Rep. 601 (1991).

The following corroborating evidence was sufficient to uphold a conviction of arson: (1) a bank held a lien on the trailer house that burned; (2) the trailer was worth less than the lien, giving defendant a motive to burn it; (3) the trailer was insured; (4) both a fireman and the fire marshal testified that a propane burner was found face down on a bedspring after the fire, and the burner was the only thing that could have started the fire; and (5) few remnants of items of value were found in the trailer after the fire. St. v. Conrad, 241 M 1, 785 P2d 185, 47 St. Rep. 32 (1990).

Testimony of defendant's accomplices linking him to two burglaries was corroborated by stolen items found in the vicinity of defendant's house and by testimony of a police officer linking defendant to the scene of one of the burglaries. In finding this corroboration sufficient, it was held that corroborative evidence need not be sufficient, by itself, to support conviction or even to make out a prima facie case. It need not extend to every fact to which the accomplice testifies. No specific instruction on the credibility of the witness's identification testimony need be given where general instructions addressed witness credibility and burden of proof required to convict. St. v. Price, 234 M 144, 762 P2d 232, 45 St. Rep. 1798 (1988), followed in St. v. Ungaretti, 239 M 314, 779 P2d 923, 46 St. Rep. 1710 (1989).

Where accomplices of the defendant testified that the defendant was guilty of felony theft from the Vets Club, there was other sufficient evidence presented at the defendant's trial to corroborate the testimony of the accomplices, in that: (1) the defendant admitted to being with the accomplices on the night of the theft; (2) the tire marks outside the Vets Club matched those on the defendant's vehicle; (3) the defendant was familiar with the interior of the club; and (4) the vehicle placed at the scene of the theft was the only vehicle owned by the defendant that was in the town where the theft occurred at the time in question. St. v. Shaw, 199 M 248, 648 P2d 287, 39 St. Rep. 1324 (1982).

Where accomplice's testimony was supported by his wife's testimony that defendant left with accomplice in a vehicle later found at the scene and by victim's testimony as to the taking of a wallet, which was later found outside by a utility worker just as accomplice's testimony had indicated, there was sufficient corroborative evidence of accomplice's testimony to sustain burglary conviction. St. v. Manthie, 197 M 56, 641 P2d 454, 39 St. Rep. 350 (1982).

Defendant questioned the sufficiency of corroboration of accomplice testimony. A codefendant testified that defendant drove the getaway car after the robbery of a bar. The only other testimony regarding defendant's possible presence and participation came from a witness who identified the driver as a woman, a deputy who interviewed accomplices, and an officer who overheard defendant express anger at a codefendant for turning State's evidence. Corroborative evidence may be circumstantial and can come from the defendant or his witnesses. One accomplice cannot supply the independent evidence necessary to corroborate another witness. The corroborative evidence must clearly: (1) be independent; (2) point toward defendant's guilt; and (3) provide a legally sufficient connection between defendant and offense. The State clearly failed to present any evidence corroborative of accomplice testimony. This failure necessitated reversal. St. v. Case, 621 P2d 1066, 37 St. Rep. 2057 (1980) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Defendant could not have been convicted without the testimony of an accomplice witness, but this fact does not establish that the corroborating proof was insufficient. The physical evidence connects the defendant with the victim, with the victim's vehicle, and with the victim's coat. Such evidence, together with the defendant's behavior a short while after the crime and at his arrest, constitutes sufficient corroborating evidence. St. v. Shurtliff, 187 M 235, 609 P2d 303 (1980).

Fact that defendant, by his own admission, had possession of stolen guns on two occasions is sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice and support a conviction of burglary. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

There is no doubt that the crimes of burglary and theft were committed, and the corroborating evidence clearly tends to connect defendant with the commission of the crimes as a conspirator. Among other things, as to the burglary, the defendant had constructive possession of the stolen property, knew the victim, and had been to his house and seen the stereo; as to the theft, defendant admitted companionship with the perpetrators preceding the robbery, going to the gas station with one of them before the robbery, and having loaned his car to them during the time the crime was committed. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224 (1979).

The State presented sufficient evidence to corroborate the testimony of one responsible or legally accountable for the same offense. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 174 M 174, 569 P2d 583 (1977).

An accomplice's testimony was sufficiently corroborated by independent evidence, as a matter of law, to warrant the submission of the case to the jury for a determination of the trustworthiness of the accomplice's testimony. St. v. Briner, 173 M 185, 567 P2d 35 (1977).

In a prosecution for aggravated assault, an accomplice's testimony was sufficiently corroborated when part of it was undisputed and the victim of the assault identified the defendant as the person who struck him with the weapon. St. v. Orsborn, 170 M 480, 555 P2d 509

(1976), reaffirming St. v. Cobb, 76 M 89, 245 P 265 (1926), decided under section 94-7220, R.C.M. 1947 (a forerunner of this section).

The identification of the defendants by the pharmacist whose pharmacy had been robbed and by witnesses who observed the defendants fleeing the scene of the robbery constituted sufficient independent corroboration of an accomplice's testimony to support a conviction of robbery. St. v. Spielmann, 163 M 199, 516 P2d 617 (1973).

Sufficient Corroborative Evidence of Burglary and Theft to Allow Testimony of Legally Accountable Witness: Before his trial for burglary and theft, Teske sought to exclude the testimony of a witness who was alleged to be legally accountable for Teske's crimes. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the witness to testify. The testimony was corroborated by the testimony of another witness and by the physical evidence. Although the witness may have been more involved in the crimes than he was willing to admit, the question before the jury was whether Teske was guilty, and on that issue, there was sufficient evidence to convict. St. v. Teske, 1999 MT 227, 296 M 88, 987 P2d 368, 56 St. Rep. 894 (1999).

Requirements for Application of Accomplice Testimony Corroboration Rule: Blackcrow was charged with robbery and aggravated burglary. At the close of the state's case, Blackcrow moved for directed verdict on grounds that the only evidence presented at trial that connected Blackcrow to the charged offenses was uncorroborated accomplice testimony, which was insufficient to support a conviction. There are two requirements that must be met in order for the application of this section to justify a directed verdict for acquittal: (1) the witness whose testimony is being offered must be an accomplice and legally accountable for the defendant's conduct; and (2) the accomplice's testimony must be uncorroborated by additional evidence. Whether a person may be held legally accountable for the conduct of another and so qualify as an accomplice for purposes of the accomplice testimony rule is, unless undisputed by the parties, a matter of fact to be determined by the jury. In this case, the fact that there was conflicting testimony on the issue of a witness's legal accountability further bolstered the conclusion that the issue was properly within the province of the jury. Denial of the motion for a directed verdict was therefore proper. St. v. Blackcrow, 1999 MT 44, 293 M 374, 975 P2d 1253, 56 St. Rep. 194 (1999).

Test for Sufficiency of Corroborative Evidence: The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that there was sufficient evidence to corroborate an accomplice's testimony against the defendant on the basis that the evidence met a three-part test that the evidence clearly: (1) be independent; (2) point toward the defendant's guilt; and (3) provide a legally sufficient connection between the defendant and the offense. St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 686 (1998). See also St. v. Grace, 2001 MT 22, 304 M 144, 18 P3d 1008 (2001).

Photographs of Defendant and Accomplices Relevant for Corroboration of Accomplice Testimony: McKeon contended that dated photographs depicting him brandishing firearms with his alleged robbery accomplices should have been excluded as irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the photographs were relevant for the purpose of corroborating portions of an accomplice's testimony in which the chain of events leading up to the robbery were described, including the fact that the parties were traveling around the West around the time of the crime and that the accomplice had purchased firearms for McKeon and another accomplice similar to those in the photographs. Corroboration of the accomplice testimony was necessary and prudent, and the probative value of the photographs outweighed any possible prejudicial effect. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Testimony of Accomplice Charged With Same Offense as Principal Defendant — Conviction Reversed: Johnson was charged with criminal mischief in vandalizing an automobile. Perez, also present at the scene of the offense, was also charged but was offered a deferred prosecution if she would testify against Johnson. At trial, the state sought to connect Johnson's presence at the scene of the offense only by the testimony of Perez. Johnson moved for a directed verdict of acquittal on the grounds that Perez's testimony violated this section, but the District Court denied the motion. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that because Perez was charged with being an accomplice, the District Court could not convict on the basis of her testimony alone. The Supreme Court noted that the statutes authorizing the complaint and arrest warrant against Perez required probable cause as a precondition and also noted that Rule 3.8 of the Rules of Professional Responsibility requires a prosecutor to dismiss charges that are not supported by probable cause. The Supreme Court referred to cases cited by the state in which witnesses were accomplices as distinguishable because those witnesses were not charged as accomplices. St. v. Johnson, 276 M 447, 918 P2d 293, 53 St. Rep. 464 (1996), distinguished in St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Witness Not Chargeable With Same Crime: The defendant, charged with selling illegal drugs, argued that the testimony of two state witnesses was inadmissible because there was no corroboration of their statements. The Supreme Court held that no corroboration was necessary because the witnesses testified to having committed similar illegal sales with the defendant rather than to having committed the crime for which the defendant was charged. St. v. Paulson, 250 M 32, 817 P2d 1137, 48 St. Rep. 838 (1991), distinguished in St. v. Johnson, 276 M 477, 918 P2d 293, 53 St. Rep. 464 (1996).

Record Connecting Defendant With Alleged Accomplice — Jury Instruction on Accomplice Testimony Proper: Trial testimony indicated that the defendant had an accomplice and that one of his witnesses may have been the accomplice. The trial court instructed the jury that if the jury found the witness was the accomplice, his testimony must be corroborated by other evidence, but the court did not require the jury to make that finding. Because the record connected the actions of the defendant and his witness, it was not error to give the instruction on accomplice testimony. St. v. West, 245 M 298, 800 P2d 1047, 47 St. Rep. 2129 (1990).

Make of Defendant's Car as Corroborating Evidence: The defendant argued that the corroborating evidence produced by the prosecution was insufficient to support his conviction. The Supreme Court held that the testimony of a witness who saw a car of the same make as the defendant's parked in front of the burglarized house and two men in the vehicle, one with a build similar to the defendant's, was sufficient for corroboration purposes. St. v. Kaczmarek, 243 M 456, 795 P2d 439, 47 St. Rep. 1319 (1990), followed in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993), and St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Reference to Name of Accomplice Unnecessary in Instruction on Accomplice Testimony: Defendant contended the jury instruction on accomplice testimony was inadequate because it did not identify by name the parties who were accomplices and whose testimony should be viewed with distrust. However, the Supreme Court found no requirement that an instruction on accomplice testimony refer by name to the accomplice, noting that whether a witness is an accomplice within the meaning of the law may be a factual question for the jury. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Corroborative Physical Evidence Held Relevant in Murder Case: The defendant argued that certain physical evidence introduced to corroborate an accomplice's testimony against him was irrelevant and prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was relevant in that each of the objects independently corroborated the testimony of one of the accomplices. St. v. Kills On Top, 241 M 378, 787 P2d 336, 47 St. Rep. 366 (1990).

Receiver of Stolen Property Not Accomplice: The defendant in a burglary trial argued that the jury should have been instructed to view with distrust the testimony against him given by a witness who had received some of the stolen property. The Supreme Court ruled that one receiving stolen property is not an accomplice and no jury instruction was needed. St. v. Moreno, 241 M 359, 787 P2d 334, 47 St. Rep. 351 (1990).

Weight Given to Recanted Accomplice Testimony — Discretion of Trial Court to Determine Veracity: An accomplice recanted testimony relied on in the conviction of defendant 15 years earlier. Defendant contended the District Court improperly applied the presumption of truthfulness to the original testimony but not to the recantation. In light of the inherent suspicion surrounding recanted testimony and the public interest in swift and sure justice, the Supreme Court adopted the view that the weight to be given such testimony is for the judge passing on the motion for a new trial to determine. Absent a clear abuse of discretion, the trial court will be upheld. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988).

Notification of Authorities by Person Asked to Participate — No Accountability: A person who was solicited for participation in a crime and, upon learning of the specifics of the intended criminal act, notified authorities and prevented the crime from occurring was not accountable for any crime and was not an accomplice to the crime of solicitation. St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987).

Accomplice Testimony Corroborated by Expert: Testimony by an accomplice to a school break-in was sufficiently corroborated by a fingerprint expert's opinion that a fingerprint found on a cash box in the school was that of defendant. St. v. Martin, 226 M 463, 736 P2d 477, 44 St. Rep. 804 (1987).

State's Witnesses Not Accomplices — No Corroboration Required — Burglary: There was sufficient evidence in the record to show that neither of two state witnesses was an accomplice to make the question one for the jury. As the jury determined that neither witness had the requisite criminal intent, their corroborative testimony was admissible. St. v. Gonyea, 225 M 56, 730 P2d 424, 44 St. Rep. 39 (1987), followed in St. v. Blackcrow, 1999 MT 44, 293 M 374, 975 P2d 1253, 56 St. Rep. 194 (1999).

Conspiracy — Corroborating Evidence: Defendant was convicted of conspiracy to commit criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). He contended that accomplice testimony was not properly corroborated. Because the conviction was for conspiracy, the court considered only testimony which corroborated testimony of accomplices by tending to connect defendant with the conspiracy. The court found that two grandsons and a son testified to defendant's involvement in the enterprise. Accomplice testimony was properly corroborated. St. v. Walton, 222 M 340, 722 P2d 1145, 43 St. Rep. 1312 (1986).

Corroborative Evidence to Prove Burglary — Eyewitness and Notes by Defendant: The defendant in a burglary case questioned whether there was sufficient corroborative evidence to confirm testimony at trial by the accomplices to the crime that defendant committed burglary. The Supreme Court found that the record contained corroborative testimony of a service station attendant who witnessed the crime, as well as notes written by the defendant himself discussing the events surrounding the burglary, which tended to connect the defendant with the burglary. This was found to be sufficient evidence to corroborate testimony from the accomplices. St. v. Woods, 221 M 17, 716 P2d 624, 43 St. Rep. 601 (1986).

Adequacy of Physical Evidence Corroboration: Defendant was charged with criminal possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell. An accomplice-informer testified as to his involvement in purchasing the drugs from Florida. Defendant contended the accomplice's testimony was not adequately corroborated. The Supreme Court held that because defendant was arrested with 30 pounds of marijuana in his possession, his keyring contained keys which opened the suitcase containing the marijuana, phone records verified 13 long-distance calls charged to defendant's home during the transaction, 5 of which were to Florida, and the State introduced into evidence incriminating tape recordings made with the informant-accomplice's consent, there was adequate corroboration of the accomplice's testimony. The court also noted that the tape recordings in and of themselves were sufficient to corroborate the accomplice's testimony. St. v. Canon, 212 M 157, 687 P2d 705, 41 St. Rep. 1659 (1984).

Accomplice — Knowing, Voluntary Behavior Required: The defendant was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. On appeal, she contended that four witnesses for the state were accomplices and that their testimony had not been corroborated. The court held that two of the witnesses were arguably accomplices while the other two were clearly not. The mere fact that someone suspects that another may commit a crime does not make him an accomplice. There was no knowing, voluntary behavior necessary to make the witnesses accomplices; therefore, corroboration was not required. St. v. Nordahl, 208 M 513, 679 P2d 241, 41 St. Rep. 502 (1984), followed in St. v. Duncan, 247 M 232, 805 P2d 1387, 48 St. Rep. 176 (1991).

Possession of Stolen Property — Sufficient Corroboration: Defendant's possession of a knife stolen from a residence was circumstantial evidence connecting him to the crime that the jury was entitled to consider. The possession of the stolen knife was sufficient, independent evidence to satisfy the statutory requirements to corroborate the testimony of three accomplices. St. v. Hammons, 204 M 340, 664 P2d 922, 40 St. Rep. 884 (1983).

Witness Testimony That Defendant Admitted Act to Him — Sufficient: Testimony that defendant told witness that he had killed victims by hitting them with auto he was driving constituted more than sufficient accomplice corroboration evidence. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Accomplice Testimony — Theft Offenses Distinct Crimes: The theft crimes enumerated in 45-6-301 are statutorily distinct crimes; hence, a person who may have received stolen property, a possession theft crime under 45-6-301(3)(c), was not legally accountable for the same crime as the defendant charged with theft by actual taking under 45-6-301(1)(a) for the purposes of requiring corroboration of his testimony under 46-16-213. St. v. Lamere, 202 M 313, 658 P2d 376, 40 St. Rep. 110 (1983), distinguished in St. v. Hernandez, 213 M 221, 689 P2d 1261, 41 St. Rep. 2063 (1984).

Burglarized Items Found in Defendant's Closet — Sufficient: Stolen items were found in defendant's closet and auto. This constituted sufficient evidence as a matter of law to corroborate the testimony against defendant of immunized witness who had participated in the two burglaries of the found items of which defendant was convicted. St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982).

Adequate Jury Instruction — How to View Corroborating Evidence: The following gives adequate guidance to a jury on how to view corroborating evidence in the light of accomplice testimony: "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of one responsible or legally accountable for the same offense, unless the testimony is corroborated by other evidence which in itself and without the aid of the testimony of the one responsible or legally accountable for the same offense tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof." St. v. Laubach, 201 M 226, 653 P2d 844, 39 St. Rep. 2074 (1982), followed in Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992).

Testimony of Accomplice — Corroborating Evidence Consonant With Innocence or Guilt — Jury Question: The defendant was convicted of criminal sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). His conviction was based on the testimony of an undercover agent and an accomplice. The testimony of the undercover agent tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The defendant argued that the agent's testimony was equally consonant with a reasonable explanation pointing toward innocent conduct and is not the corroboration needed to support an accomplice's testimony. The court held that whether or not the defendant's explanation was believable was a factual question for the jury. As a matter of law, the testimony of the undercover agent was sufficient to corroborate the accomplice's testimony. St. v. Anderson, 197 M 374, 643 P2d 564, 39 St. Rep. 629 (1982).

Connection to Defendant Not Shown: Prymarks, footprints, and stolen drugs were never shown to be connected with the defendant. Other physical evidence merely gave rise to suspicion. The explanation of this evidence given by the accomplice was no more reasonable than the explanation given by the defendant. Therefore, the evidence was insufficient when coupled with the accomplice's testimony to support a conviction. St. v. Casagranda, 196 M 56, 637 P2d 826, 38 St. Rep. 2122 (1981).

Accomplice as Matter of Law — No Corroborating Evidence — Directed Verdict Required: The defendant was charged with suppressing evidence in connection with the investigation of his son on a deliberate homicide charge. The case against the defendant was based entirely on the testimony of Hopkins, who testified that the defendant gave him a pistol that belonged to the homicide suspect and asked him to dispose of it. Hopkins kept the pistol for 5 months before turning it over to the police. The court concluded that if the jury inferred from the evidence that the defendant intended to suppress the evidence then it would have to infer that the same intent existed for Hopkins. That would make Hopkins an accomplice as a matter of law. Since there was no corroborating evidence to support the testimony of Hopkins, the District Court should have entered a judgment of acquittal. St. v. Warren, 192 M 436, 628 P2d 292, 38 St. Rep. 773 (1981), distinguished in St. v. McColley, 239 M 466, 781 P2d 280, 46 St. Rep. 1836 (1989).

Prima Facie Case of Culpability Unnecessary: In a prosecution for felony criminal mischief and soliciting another to commit a crime, which prosecution was based on the defendant's alleged arson of his mobile home for purposes of obtaining insurance compensation, the trial testimony of the defendant's accomplice was sufficiently corroborated by other evidence to sustain the conviction. While the other trial evidence does not establish a prima facie case of culpability, that is unnecessary as the evidence need only "tend to connect" the defendant with the commission of the offense. The total sum of the other trial evidence does more than create a suspicion of guilt; it is consistent with the state's theory of culpability. St. v. Mitchell, 192 M 16, 625 P2d 1155, 38 St. Rep. 487 (1981), followed in St. v. Dannels, 226 M 80, 734 P2d 188, 44 St. Rep. 472 (1987); St. v. Cain, 221 M 318, 718 P2d 654, 43 St. Rep. 842 (1986).

Delinquent Youth Conviction — Inadmissible Hearsay — Corroboration of Testimony of Others Accountable for Same Offense: After a minor was cited for running a red light and for driving without a license, the County Attorney charged he was a delinquent youth under the Youth Court Act, alleging the minor had taken the car without the owner's consent. The minor appealed stating that the testimony of two police officers concerning the stolen property report was inadmissible hearsay and that his conviction declaring him a delinquent youth was improperly based on the testimony of other individuals who were legally accountable for the offense. The Supreme Court found that the officers' testimony was inadmissible hearsay. The court also found that the corroborating evidence supplied by the officer who stopped the vehicle tended to connect the youth directly with the offense and that, therefore, the testimony of other minors responsible or legally accountable for the same offense was properly admitted. Despite the fact that the testimony of the other youths in the car, in conjunction with the independent corroborating evidence, could support a conviction in some cases, the reviewing court reversed the conviction. It found that the admission of the hearsay so affected the substantial rights of the accused as to require reversal. In re D.W.L., A Youth, 189 M 267, 615 P2d 887 (1980).

Relevance and Admissibility of Testimony of Previously Acquitted Alleged Principal: The testimony of a previously acquitted alleged principal in a robbery was allowed in the trial of an alleged participant in the same robbery. The denial of any participation in the robbery provided the foundation for the admission of the witness's prior inconsistent statements in which he admitted his participation. There was additional evidence tending to establish that the witness and the defendant had planned the robbery with others. The witness's testimony was therefore relevant and clearly admissible. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

State's Witness Not Accomplice — No Corroboration Required — Robbery: Defendant claimed a witness had been his accomplice and as such his testimony could not convict him or support his conviction unless corroborated by independent evidence. The Montana Supreme Court found the alleged accomplice did not solicit, advise, or encourage anyone in the planning or commission of the robbery in question. He did not ever agree to aid or attempt to aid anyone in such planning or commission. His statements about robbing the store were made at a remote time, and there is no concrete connection between those statements and the robbery. Since the witness was not an accomplice, his testimony stands on the same basis as any other witness's. He need not be corroborated, and his credibility is for the jury to decide. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113 (1980).

State's Witness Not Accomplice — No Corroboration Required — Theft: While one may not be convicted solely on an accomplice's testimony, there is no evidence in the record indicating that Paulus, the State's witness, knowingly, voluntarily, and with common intent united with Harvey in the commission of the theft of the rifle. Paulus does not fit the definition of accomplice, therefore the State was not required to corroborate his testimony. St. v. Harvey, 184 M 423, 603 P2d 661 (1979).

Sufficiency of Evidence to Corroborate Accomplice Testimony — Test: Sufficiency of evidence to corroborate testimony of an accomplice is a question of law. To be sufficient, it must show more than that a crime was in fact committed or the circumstances of its commission. It must raise more than the suspicion of the defendant's involvement or opportunity to commit the crime charged. But the evidence need not be sufficient by itself to support the defendant's conviction or even to make out a prima facie case against him. It may be circumstantial and can come from the defendant or his witnesses. St. v. Kemp, 182 M 383, 597 P2d 96, 36 St. Rep. 1215 (1979), followed in St. v. Forsyth, 197 M 248, 642 P2d 1035, 39 St. Rep. 540 (1982), St. v. Laubach, 201 M 226, 653 P2d 844, 39 St. Rep. 2074 (1982), St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982), St. v. Cain, 221 M 318, 718 P2d 654, 43 St. Rep. 842 (1986), St. v. Holzapfel, 230 M 105, 748 P2d 953, 45 St. Rep. 53 (1988), St. v. Conrad, 241 M 1, 785 P2d 185, 47 St. Rep. 32 (1990), St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990), St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977

P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999), and St. v. Fey, 2000 MT 211, 301 M 28, 7 P3d 358, 57 St. Rep. 829 (2000). See also St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Kind of Corroborating Testimony Required:

While a conviction cannot be had on the testimony of one equally accountable for the same offense, when the corroborating evidence tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offenses of robbery and homicide as a participant in the actual robbery and as an accomplice in the commission of and flight after the deliberate homicide, the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain the defendant's conviction. St. v. Owens, 182 M 338, 597 P2d 72 (1979).

Corroborating evidence may be circumstantial evidence. It need not be sufficient in itself to sustain a conviction but must tend to connect the defendant with the crime. St. v. Standley, 179 M 153, 586 P2d 1075 (1978).

The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion to dismiss the information or, in the alternative, for a judgment of acquittal for lack of corroboration of a State's witness when the evidence tended to connect the defendant with the commission of the offenses charged, was evidence of more than mere opportunity or suspicion that the defendant committed the offenses, and did not establish any reasonable explanation pointing toward innocent conduct. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Act or Declaration of Conspirator: Evidence of the act or declaration of a conspirator relating to the conspiracy may, after proof of the conspiracy, be given against his coconspirator. Lane v. Bailey, 29 M 548, 75 P 191 (1904); St. v. Dotson, 26 M 305, 67 P 938 (1902); Pincus v. Reynolds, 19 M 564, 49 P 145 (1897); Harrington v. Butte & Boston Min. Co., 19 M 411, 48 P 758 (1897); St. v. Byers, 16 M 565, 41 P 708 (1895); Territory v. Campbell, 9 M 16, 22 P 121 (1889).

46-16-215. Use of confession.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a newly developed provision concerning the usefulness of extrajudicial confessions at a criminal trial. The statute recognizes that independent evidence must establish that a crime has been committed before a confession may be admitted into evidence. See St. v. Traufer, 109 Mont. 275 (1939), St. v. Gould, 216 Mont. 455 (1985), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304, 53 St. Rep. 879 (1996).

Case Notes

Sufficient Probable Cause for Filing Information — No Requirement That Information Supporting Charge Be Excised Before Determination of Probable Cause Made: Attorney Holt pleaded not guilty to five counts of felony theft of clients' funds, then moved to dismiss two of the counts, alleging that the affidavit supporting the information did not establish probable cause. The motion was denied. Pursuant to a subsequent plea agreement, Holt pleaded nolo contendere to the contested counts, but reserved the right to withdraw the plea if the agreed sentences were not imposed. Following conviction, Holt appealed on grounds that the District Court erred by not dismissing the counts because the affidavit in support of the information did not allege independent admissible evidence that Holt exercised unauthorized control over the money that was allegedly stolen, asserting in effect that the affidavit contained evidence that must be excised and that without that evidence, the affidavit failed to establish probable cause. The Supreme Court affirmed. A showing of a mere probability that a defendant committed the offense charged is sufficient to establish probable cause to file an information. It is not required that information in the affidavit supporting a charge, which might later be found inadmissible at trial, be excised before a determination of probable cause is made. At the time that Holt entered a plea, it was too early in the case to hold that a motion to dismiss would be successful at the conclusion of the state's case in chief, so denial of the dismissal motion was not error. St. v. Holt, 2006 MT 151, 332 M 426, 139 P3d 819 (2006).

No Corroboration of Testimony of Witnesses to Extrajudicial Confession — Homicide Conviction Affirmed: Following McGarvey's conviction for deliberate homicide, McGarvey asserted that because the two witnesses who testified regarding McGarvey's extrajudicial confession were patently unreliable, corroboration should have been required to uphold their testimony. The Supreme Court agreed that corroboration is required when a defendant's confession is obtained by law enforcement, but the confession in this instance was heard by two lay witnesses, and the Supreme Court declined to require independent corroborating evidence to establish the trustworthiness of McGarvey's alleged extrajudicial confession. Rather, the court noted that in addition to the lay testimony alleging that McGarvey confessed, the state provided sufficient evidence, as a whole, for the trier of fact to determine that McGarvey was guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. McGarvey, 2005 MT 308, 329 M 439, 124

P3d 1131 (2005), distinguishing Opper v. U.S., 348 US 84 (1954), Escobedo v. Ill., 378 US 478 (1964), and U.S. v. Lopez-Alvarez, 970 F2d 583 (9th Cir. 1992).

Character of Independent Evidence Tending to Establish Commission of Crime — Confession of DUI Admissible: Over Martinosky's objection, the District Court admitted a tape recording of his confession as evidence of DUI. On appeal, Martinosky contended that there was insufficient independent evidence to establish the offense, so the confession should not have been allowed as evidence, pursuant to this section. However, independent evidence tending to establish commission of a crime before a defendant's confession may be admitted need not be evidence establishing the crime beyond a reasonable doubt or even evidence establishing a prima facie case that the offense was committed. Citing St. v. Palmer, 247 M 210, 805 P2d 580, 48 St. Rep. 166 (1991), the Supreme Court held that the manner in which a vehicle is operated, including excessive speed and failing to stop when signaled to stop by a law enforcement officer, can be evidence that the driver was under the influence of alcohol. The fact that Martinosky spent several hours drinking in a bar, smelled of alcohol, left the scene of an accident, failed to stop for pursuing police, failed to stop at two stop signs and a stoplight, and was traveling at a high rate of speed in a residential area before crashing into a house was sufficient to establish DUI, so the confession was properly allowed. St. v. Martinosky, 1999 MT 122, 294 M 427, 982 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 495 (1999).

Independent Evidence of Commission of Attempted Deliberate Homicide Held Sufficient: Hayworth was charged with and was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. As part of his appeal, Hayworth argued that his conviction was based only upon his own admission of the offense and the testimony of his accomplice, Burwell. Citing St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the District Court properly denied Hayworth's motion for a directed verdict because there was sufficient independent evidence introduced by the state, in the form of testimony of the victims and rifle casings found by the police on the street, that the offense was in fact committed. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

46-16-220. Child hearsay exception — criminal proceedings.

Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 456, L. 2003, provided: "WHEREAS, the state has an interest in protecting the welfare of children generally; and

WHEREAS, the state has an interest in protecting the well-being of children who are victims of sexual offenses and other violent crimes; and

WHEREAS, the state has an interest in giving child witnesses a voice in criminal proceedings; and

WHEREAS, it is the Legislature's prerogative to enact laws for the protection of children; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature finds that the admission of child hearsay testimony under a residual exception to the general hearsay rules does not always serve the general purposes of the rules and the interests of justice; and

WHEREAS, Rule 802 of the Montana Rules of Evidence provides that the Legislature may by statute provide for exceptions to the general rule that hearsay is not admissible; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature acknowledges the necessity that child hearsay testimony must be examined closely for reliability."

Case Notes

Admissibility of Child Victim's Hearsay Statements When Statutory Criteria Met: Under this section, a District Court may admit a child victim's hearsay statements if: (1) the child is unavailable as a witness; (2) the hearsay is evidence of a probative fact and more probative than any other available evidence; (3) the offering party gives proper notice of the statement; and (4) the court finds that the statement has circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness. If these conditions are met, the court must then set forth its reasoning on the admissibility in findings of fact and conclusions of law, considering the child victim's attributes, information regarding the testifying witness, information regarding the statement, corroborating evidence, and other considerations that in the judge's opinion may bear on the admissibility of the child hearsay testimony. In this case, defendant contended that the court failed to comply with the statutory requirements. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. The District Court issued a 12-page order setting forth its reasoning and analyzing each statutory admissibility factor in turn. The District Court did not act arbitrarily without employing conscientious judgment, its decision did not exceed the bounds of reason resulting in substantial injustice, and after complying with the statutory criteria, the court did not abuse its discretion in admitting the child victim's hearsay statement through a professional counselor and the child's foster mother. St. v. Spencer, 2007 MT 245, 339 M 227, 169 P3d 384 (2007).

Compiler's Comments

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 282, L. 2007, provided: "WHEREAS, physical or sexual abuse of an individual with a developmental disability is an abhorrent phenomenon that should not be tolerated in any society; and

WHEREAS, physical or sexual abuse of an individual with a developmental disability is sometimes hard to prove because no one except the abuser and the individual are present and the individual is sometimes incapable of expressing in language the circumstances of the abuse sufficiently to allow for criminal prosecution of the abuser and because testimony of another individual on behalf of the developmentally delayed individual could be excluded by various provisions of the Montana Rules of Evidence, especially the rule governing exceptions to the rule against the admissibility of hearsay evidence, contained in Rule 804 of the Montana Rules of Evidence, adopted by the Montana Supreme Court in 1976; and

WHEREAS, Rule 802 of the Montana Rules of Evidence adopted by the Montana Supreme Court allows the Legislature to provide exceptions to the rule against admission of hearsay statements into evidence because Rule 802 provides that hearsay is inadmissible except as provided by statute; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature therefore believes that it is appropriate for the Legislature to adopt, using as a guide the guidelines on child hearsay adopted by the Montana Supreme Court in State v. J.C.E., 235 Mont. 264, 767 P.2d 309 (1988), and applied in such opinions as State v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 Mont. 54, 982 P.2d 1045 (1999), a statute allowing the admission into evidence of testimony of third persons under circumstances in which there are sufficient guarantees of trustworthiness to render the testimony of the third person probative and valuable to the trial court or jury."

Part 4
Order of Trial

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part is, in general, a reflection of the 1987 code. The part also contains elements from the federal rule concerning jury instructions. See Rule 30, Fed. R. Crim. P. The statutes establish the order of trial and provide for the settlement of jury instructions. The language of the 1987 code has been changed mainly for clarity; significant departure from established procedure is not anticipated.

Part Case Notes

Mitigating Circumstances in Homicide — Not Affirmative Defense: The defendant shot and killed the companion of his "girlfriend" in a parking lot at Montana Tech (now Montana Tech of the University of Montana). On appeal, the issue was who had the burden of proving the presence or absence of mitigating circumstances to determine whether the defendant was guilty of deliberate homicide or the lesser offense of mitigated deliberate homicide. The court held that mitigation sufficient to reduce deliberate homicide to mitigated deliberate homicide is not an affirmative defense, which would require the burden of proof to be placed upon the defendant. The court went on to hold that the State does not have the burden of proving the absence of mitigating circumstances. Although neither party has the burden of proof, either party may assume such burden. St. v. Gratzer, 209 M 308, 682 P2d 141, 41 St. Rep. 727 (1984), followed in St. v. Ballenger, 227 M 308, 738 P2d 1291, 44 St. Rep. 1107 (1987).

46-16-401. Order of trial.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is modeled after and intended to preserve 1987 MCA 46-16-401. The statute contains elements from the federal rule concerning the delivery of instructions to the jury. Compare subsections (4) and (5) and Rule 30, Fed. R. Crim. P. The code provisions concerning the settlement of instructions are preserved in 46-16-410. Although the statute differs significantly in terms and format, no major changes in established procedure are anticipated.

Subdivision [(1)] has been added to implement the present practice of the court in instructing the jury generally as to their duties at the beginning of the trial.

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Substituted (1) concerning general instructions regarding the conduct of the trial after the jury is sworn but before the introduction of any evidence and cautionary instructions during the course of the trial for former text that read: "(1) The court may instruct the jury as to its duties. Such general instructions must be settled in the same manner as provided for the settlement of special instructions in subsection (4) of this section"; in (2), in first sentence, substituted "prosecutor may make an opening statement" for "county attorney must state the case" and in second sentence substituted "prosecutor's" for "state's" and at end substituted "at the close of the prosecution's case but prior to the defendant's offer of evidence" for "may state his defense and then offer evidence in support thereof after the state rests"; in (3), at end, inserted "at any time before the close of evidence"; deleted former (4) through (6) that read: "(4) (a) When the evidence is concluded, if either party desires special instructions to be given to the jury, such instructions shall be reduced to writing, numbered, signed by the party or his attorney, and delivered to the court.

(b) The instructions shall be settled by the court without the presence of the jury. At the settlement counsel for the parties or the defendant, if he is without counsel, shall be allowed reasonable opportunity to examine the instructions requested and proposed to be given by the court and to present and argue to the court objections to the adoption or rejection of any instruction offered by counsel or proposed to be given to the jury by the court. On such settlement of instructions, the respective counsel or the parties shall specify and state the particular ground on which an instruction is objected to. It shall not be sufficient to object generally that the instruction does not state the law or is against the law, but the objection must specify particularly wherein the instruction is insufficient or does not state the law or what particular clause therein is objected to.

(c) The court shall pass upon the objections to the instructions and shall either give each instruction as requested or proposed, positively refuse to do so, or give the instruction with modification. The court shall mark or endorse upon each instruction in such a manner that it shall distinctly appear what instructions were given in whole or in part and, in like manner, those refused or modified and, if modified, wherein and how modified. All instructions must be filed as a part of the record of the cause. No exceptions are necessary to the rulings of the court on the settlement of instructions.

(d) The court reporter shall be present at such settlement and shall take down all the objections to any or all of the instructions given or refused by the court together with modifications made therein and the ruling of the court thereon.

(5) When the instructions have been passed upon and settled by the court and before the arguments to the jury have begun, the court shall charge the jury in writing, giving in such charge only such instructions as have been passed upon and settled. In charging the jury, the court shall give them all matters of law which it thinks necessary for the jury's information in rendering a verdict.

(6) When the jury has been charged, unless the case is submitted to the jury on either side or on both sides without argument, the county attorney must commence and may conclude the argument. If several defendants having several defenses appear by different counsel, the court must determine their relative order in evidence and argument. Counsel, in arguing the case to the judge or jury, may argue and comment upon the law of the case as given in the instructions of the court, as well as upon the evidence of the case"; inserted (4) concerning giving of instructions; inserted (5) concerning delivery of instructions to jury; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL

Defendant's Absence From In-Chambers Trial Conferences Not Considered Prejudicial — No New Trial Based on Lack of Fair Trial: At Price's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, Price was excluded from 11 in-chambers conferences. Price contended that his absence from the conferences violated his right to be present at all criminal proceedings against him and that he was therefore denied a fair trial. The Supreme Court assumed for purposes of analysis that the conferences constituted critical stages of the trial and that Price did not validly waive the right to be present at the conferences. Nevertheless, the court concluded that failure to include Price in the conferences at worst constituted trial error, rather than structural error that would require automatic reversal, so the court examined the record to determine whether Price was prejudiced and concluded that he was not. The record was not ambiguous as to what occurred at the conferences, and nothing that occurred at the conferences concerned or affected the framework within which Price's trial proceeded or necessarily rendered the trial fundamentally unfair. The one conference at which Price particularly contended that his presence should have been required was one in which a juror expressed concern regarding possible bias toward Price. However, Price's concern was irrelevant when the juror was removed from the jury. After review of the complete trial record, the court concluded that Price's absence from the conferences did not cause any conceivable prejudice depriving Price of a fair trial. Absent reversible error, the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Price, 2009 MT 129, 350 M 272, 207 P3d 298 (2009). See also St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), St. v. Limitation on Opening Statement on Issue Unrelated to Charged Offense Not Abuse of Discretion: At Wilson's trial for tampering with evidence in a vehicle allegedly used in a homicide, the trial court prohibited Wilson from referring in opening statements to evidence concerning a coconspirator's motives to kill the victim. The court did not address any similar limits on cross-examination, and Wilson did not bring up the subject of motivation on cross-examination of the coconspirator. Nevertheless, because of the limitation on opening statements, on appeal, Wilson argued an inability to develop evidence regarding the coconspirator's prior false statements and motive to cover up the homicide and to tamper with evidence of the homicide, which purportedly violated Wilson's right to confront the witness. The Supreme Court disagreed. The main purpose of the right to confront a witness is to secure an opportunity for cross-examination, including the opportunity to expose the witness's motivation for testifying. However, this does not mean that a defendant may cross-examine a witness on any subject in any manner whatsoever without limitations imposed by the trial judge. Rather, trial judges retain wide latitude to impose limits on cross-examination based on various concerns, including confusion of the issues. In this case, the trial court limited opening comments regarding motivation for murder because the trial was not a homicide trial, but rather a trial for tampering with evidence, and motive was outside the scope of the tampering charge and would confuse the jury. Thus, the court did not abuse its discretion by limiting opening comments, and Wilson suffered no prejudice. Wilson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Wilson, 2007 MT 327, 340 M 191, 172 P3d 1264 (2007).

Trial Court's Sua Sponte Objection to Testimony Not Violative of Court's Duty to Ensure Fairness of Trial: Price was charged with assault with a weapon, and his defense was based upon the assertion that his roommate committed the crime. On the opening day of trial, both the prosecution and the defense elicited testimony regarding the roommate's propensity for violence. At the beginning of the second day of trial, outside the presence of the jury, the trial judge objected sua sponte to the admission of the character testimony and heard arguments from both parties regarding the objection before ruling that the testimony was inadmissible. The judge then instructed the jury to disregard the testimony and limited testimony on the subject by a future witness. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the judge's actions constituted an abuse of discretion that impaired Price's defense and entitled Price to a new trial. The Supreme Court noted that although a trial judge should avoid officious interference in proceedings and remain impartial, the judge is not a mere figurehead or umpire at a trial who must remain silent and passive throughout a jury trial, speaking only to rule on motions and objections. Rather, the judge's duty is to ensure fairness, avoid waste of time, keep from the jury extraneous, potentially confusing matters, and facilitate the ascertainment of truth, which does not preclude a judge from excluding inadmissible evidence on the judge's own motion if the judge believes exclusion is in the interests of justice. Here, the judge did not cross the line between arbiter and advocate. The judge's objection pertained to testimony elicited by both parties and thus was not partial to the prosecution. The purpose of the objection was to prevent the jury from being misled by extraneous matters or basing the verdict on incompetence evidence, and the judge's action was in the nature of regulating the proceedings to ensure a fair trial. In addition, limiting the testimony by a future witness to the extent that the state opened the door regarding the roommate's character was not an abuse of discretion because the ruling was proportional to that testimony. St. v. Price, 2006 MT 79, 331 M 502, 134 P3d 45 (2006).

Discretion of Trial Court to Accept One Psychologist's Testimony Over Another's in Deciding Whether Defendant's Mental Condition Warranted Treatment or Incarceration: Pittman's psychologist testified that Pittman was mentally ill and unable to appreciate the criminality of her conduct and should be placed in treatment. The state's psychologist opined that Pittman did not suffer from a mental disease or defect and had the capacity to act with knowledge and purpose at the time of the offenses and recommended sentencing to the state prison and placement in a prison chemical dependency program, mental health therapy, and medication. The trial court accepted the state psychologist's assessment and sentenced Pittman to prison. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the weight and credibility of evidence was within the province of the trial court, and because the trial court's resolution of the conflicting evidence was supported by the record, the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Absence of Defendant From Critical Trial Proceeding Violative of Fundamental Right to Appear and Defend in Person — No Error Given Curative Action of Trial Court: During Kennedy's criminal trial, a juror communicated with one of the state's witnesses. The trial judge then met with the juror in chambers without Kennedy or any counsel present, and the juror admitted the conversation, but denied mentioning anything about it to the jury. The court then met with counsel in chambers, replaced the juror with an alternate, excluded the witness from testifying, and went on with the trial. Defense counsel moved for mistrial and dismissal with prejudice, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that excluding Kennedy from the conversation with the juror violated Kennedy's fundamental right to be present at all critical stages of trial to defend in person. Further, any waiver by defense counsel by failing to object was ineffective because Kennedy was never told that he had a right to be present or that the juror questioning was about to occur. However, Kennedy was not prejudiced or deprived of a fair trial by the error in light of the District Court's corrective actions. Thus, denial of a mistrial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

No Error in Refusal to Allow Two Impeachment Witnesses After Start of Trial — Failure to Object at Trial Precluding Raising Issue on Appeal: After commencement of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide, LaDue moved to add two additional witnesses, asserting that they would verify that two other witnesses were essentially coordinating their testimony to LaDue's disadvantage and that the other witnesses' testimony at trial differed substantially from their earlier statements to police. The motion was denied. LaDue was convicted on a lesser charge and appealed. After examining the record, the Supreme Court concluded that the testimony of the two additional witnesses was not probative and that the independent statements to police shortly after the incident were not notably inconsistent with the oral testimony at trial. Further, LaDue did not suggest a motive for the other witnesses to fix their testimony to his disadvantage, and no such nefarious intent could be gleaned from the record. LaDue failed to establish good cause for adding two new witnesses after the trial commenced, and the District Court did not err in refusing their testimony. The court properly inquired as to the nature of the testimony to be offered by the proposed witnesses and the circumstances surrounding the matter in controversy. Thus, the court had sufficient information to rule, and the ruling was not in error. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Failure to Raise Hall-Type Objection to Jury Instruction on Flight From Crime Scene as Waiver of Appellate Review of Claim of Unnecessary Comment on Evidence: In St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999), the Supreme Court ruled that a jury instruction on the significance of flight should no longer be given because it could be an unnecessary comment on the evidence by the trial court. Nevertheless, during Davis's trial for negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident that resulted in death or personal injuries, the trial court instructed the jury that it could consider testimony regarding flight by Davis as a circumstance tending to prove consciousness of guilt, but not actual proof of guilt. Davis objected, not because the instruction was an improper comment on the evidence, but on grounds that there was no evidence of actual flight in the case. Before the Supreme Court can consider the application of Hall, a defendant must make a proper objection on the basis of an improper comment on the evidence. Davis's failure to raise a Hall-type objection constituted waiver of appellate review of the claim that the flight instruction was an unnecessary comment on the evidence. Further, Davis was not prejudiced by the instruction because it contained the qualification that flight itself was not sufficient evidence of guilt. St. v. Davis, 2000 MT 199, 300 M 458, 5 P3d 547, 57 St. Rep. 773 (2000), following St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939 (1999), and followed in St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 13, 314 M 47, 62 P3d 1118 (2003).

Judge's Questions About Foreigner's Immigration Status as Showing Racial Bias: The District Court erred in asking Ahmed, a resident and native of Bangladesh and a student at MSU-Bozeman, about his immigration status in a trial for aggravated kidnapping and assault but cured the error by sustaining an objection and striking the questioning from the record. Ahmed offered no specific evidence that the questioning showed racial bias by the judge, and the Supreme Court would not presume bias from the mere posing of the questions. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Raising Issue in Postconviction Relief That Could Have Been Preserved for Appeal — Abuse of Process: Defendant sought to challenge jury instructions in a petition for postconviction relief after failing to object to the disputed instructions at trial. He offered no excuse for failing to object and did not argue that he could not have reasonably complied with the procedural requirements of 46-20-104 and this section. Because objections to the instructions could have been raised at trial, those grounds for relief could have reasonably been available for direct appeal. To allow defendant to raise an issue in postconviction relief that he could reasonably have preserved for direct appeal would constitute an abuse of process. St. v. Gorder, 243 M 333, 792 P2d 370, 47 St. Rep. 958 (1990).

Error in Admission of Evidence Cured Upon Jury Admonishment: An error in the admission of evidence may be cured if the jury is admonished to disregard it. St. v. Conrad, 241 M 1, 785 P2d 185, 47 St. Rep. 32 (1990), followed in St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996), and St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000). See also St. v. White, 2008 MT 129, 343 M 66, 184 P3d 1008 (2008).

Rape-Trauma Syndrome — Expert Testimony Admissible on Whether There Was Consent: Testimony of experts on whether the complaining witness in a sexual intercourse without consent case suffers from rape-trauma syndrome is admissible to aid a jury in determining whether there was consent to engage in the sexual intercourse that all parties acknowledge occurred. St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Trial Judge's Role: Trial judge has a duty to conduct the trial in a speedy and fair manner and is allowed wide latitude in doing so. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Purpose: Predecessor section did not undertake to do more than prescribe an orderly procedure for the trial of criminal cases. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

PRELIMINARY INSTRUCTIONS

Potential Jurors Informed That Death Penalty Not to Be Sought as Punishment — No Error: Before voir dire began in a deliberate homicide case that carried a potential punishment of death, the presiding judge informed the jury panel that it was not considered a capital case and that the state would not seek to have the death penalty imposed. Defendant argued that this statement violated the rule against informing a jury of the possible range of sentences available, as stated in St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588 (1982). The Supreme Court distinguished Herrera and adopted St. v. Dawson, 783 P2d 1221 (Ariz. App. 1989), acknowledging that it is generally improper to inform a jury about the potential punishment that a defendant faces upon conviction; however, there is no error, fundamental or otherwise, in informing a jury that a defendant does not face the risk of a death sentence if convicted. A jury panel might include members disposed against capital punishment. The Dawson court approved of a trial court's efforts to relieve the risk that jurors so disposed might be distracted in considering issues of guilt by concern that, in the event of a guilty verdict, the death penalty might result. By advising the jury up front that the state is not requesting the death penalty, a broader-based jury may be retained. St. v. Wild, 266 M 331, 880 P2d 840, 51 St. Rep. 872 (1994).

When Offenses Charged Are Complex: Presentation of preliminary jury instructions before the evidence, especially when some of the offenses charged were complex and difficult to understand, was for good reason. It allowed the jury to have some understanding of the complex circumstantial evidence to be presented. A less complex case not based only on circumstantial evidence might not require such preliminary instructions. In such a case there might not be good reasons for varying the usual trial order. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

Language Not Inflammatory: The defendant's contention that extensive preliminary instructions given by the court were erroneous was rejected by the Supreme Court when it concluded that the language was not inflammatory but as neutral as language detailing the charges involved could be, even though the instructions were given prior to the introduction of evidence. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Failure to Read Information: It is not error to fail to read the information, there being no statutory requirement for such procedure. St. v. Gall, 135 M 131, 337 P2d 932 (1959).

COUNTY ATTORNEY TO STATE CASE AND OFFER EVIDENCE

Prosecutor's Comments Characterizing Defendant as Gangster and Liar Not Warranting Mistrial: Dubois moved for a mistrial when the prosecutor described Dubois as a gangster when questioning a witness and when describing a statement by Dubois as a lie during closing arguments. Both mistrial motions were denied, and Dubois raised the issues again on appeal, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Given the substantial evidence regarding Dubois' violent behavior and use of drugs, use of the word "gangster" was unlikely to cause the jury to punish Dubois even if he had not been proved guilty. In addition, even though the Supreme Court has strongly disapproved of characterizing testimony as a lie, when the trial judge strikes improper statements from the record with an accompanying cautionary instruction to the jury, as occurred here, any error and prejudicial effect committed by its introduction are presumed cured. The mistrial motions were properly denied. St. v. Dubois, 2006 MT 89, 332 M 44, 134 P3d 82 (2006), following St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333 (1987).

Failure to Timely Object to Opening Statement — Waiver of Appeal: Paoni moved for a mistrial based on allegedly impermissible statements by the prosecutor during opening statements, but failed to timely object when the statements were made. The mistrial motion was denied, and Paoni appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant must make a timely objection to properly preserve an issue for appeal. Although unproved facts asserted in an opening statement may constitute grounds for a mistrial if there is a reasonable possibility that the unproved facts contributed to a conviction, in this case, even if the objection had been timely, the state later established a proper foundation for the statement, so denial of the motion for mistrial was proper, and Paoni's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), following St. v. Gardner, 2003 MT 338, 318 M 436, 80 P3d 1262 (2003), and followed, with regard to the necessity for timeliness of an objection to the prosecutor's statements, in St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

No Prosecutorial Misconduct in Eliciting Facts to Aid Witness Recollection, Disclosing Prior Witness Conversations, or Offering Statements in Rebuttal Based on Testimony: Defendant alleged several instances of prosecutorial misconduct in his trial for sexual intercourse without consent and incest with his daughter. The prosecutor had instructed the daughter that the assault occurred in Montana rather than Idaho, thereby avoiding Duffy's challenge to Montana's jurisdiction. However, the prosecutor was not prohibited from discovering facts to aid the daughter's recollection of where the incident occurred and doing so was not misconduct. Duffy also contended that the prosecutor's questioning of a detective about a telephone call to Duffy was misconduct because the prosecutor did not disclose the conversation, but the trial court cured any potential for violating Duffy's substantial rights by instructing the jury to disregard the testimony and by refusing to give the prosecution's flight instruction that was the basis for that line of inquiry. Lastly, Duffy claimed misconduct when the prosecutor elicited testimony from the daughter regarding her desire to see Duffy convicted and then later reiterated that testimony during rebuttal. However, Duffy's own counsel opened the door for the testimony, and the prosecutor was then free to reexamine the daughter for the purpose of discovering the daughter's motive; therefore, the prosecutor's subsequent comments were not construed as misconduct warranting a mistrial. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), followed in St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008). See also St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725 (1998), and St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 175, 979 P2d 206 (1999).

Evidence of Flight as Showing Guilt: Evidence of defendant's flight after an offense occurs may be admitted as a circumstance tending to show consciousness of guilt. Having found that the charged crimes occurred, the trial judge properly considered evidence of defendant's flight in reaching the conclusion that defendant was the one who committed the crimes. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Refusal to Characterize Other Witness as Liar: In his cross-examination of defendant, the County Attorney sought to have defendant characterize a prosecution witness as a liar; defendant refused to do so. In the absence of an answer to the question, the Supreme Court was unwilling to use it as grounds for reversal of defendant's conviction. The court restated its holding in St. v. Rhys, 40 M 131, 105 P 494 (1909), that when a defendant goes upon the witness stand in his own behalf and denies the commission of the crime with which he is charged, a very wide latitude of cross-examination is allowed. St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329, 47 St. Rep. 321 (1990), clarified, as to propriety of asking defendant if other witnesses lied, in St. v. Hart, 2000 MT 332, 303 M 71, 15 P3d 917, 57 St. Rep. 1398 (2000).

Prosecutor Comment on Homicide Victim's Family and Character: It was inappropriate for the prosecutor, in his opening and closing statements, to comment on the family of the victim and on the victim's outstanding personal characteristics. However, the record did not show denial of a substantial right, and a conviction necessarily followed from defendant's testimony, which established every element of the offenses with which he was charged. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987), followed in St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997).

Motion to Amend Complaint to Conform to Confession at Trial: During the state's questioning, defendant testified she possessed marijuana 2 or 3 weeks before the date contained in the information. The prosecutor stated he thought the defendant had just made a full confession and that he would change the time stated in the information and accept a guilty plea. The motion to amend the information was denied. The jury's hearing of the motion did not require that a mistrial be declared. St. v. Scheffelman, 225 M 408, 733 P2d 348, 44 St. Rep. 357 (1987).

Prosecution Comments on Witnesses in Opening and Closing — No Objection — No Effect on Substantial Rights: The prosecution in opening and closing made comments on the truthfulness and credibility of witnesses and other matters not related to the defendant's right not to testify. A lack of objection does not preclude consideration in the trial court of error that affects the defendant's substantial rights, but these matters were subject to free comment to the jury under the circumstances of this case and thus did not affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Actions of Prosecutor Based on Provocation by Defense Counsel — Personal Attack Upon Defense Counsel: Where, in a prosecution for deliberate homicide, the prosecuting attorney responded to certain evidentiary tactics of defense counsel by questioning him about his drinking habits, the court did not err in failing to caution the jury with respect to the alleged prejudicial comments of the prosecuting attorney. It has generally been held that an appellant may not predicate error upon the prosecuting attorney's actions where such were induced or provoked by the appellant's counsel. The defendant also failed to offer an appropriate cautionary instruction. Any irregularity did not affect the defendant's substantial rights. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981), cited in St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986), and followed in St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329, 47 St. Rep. 321 (1990). Close and Campbell were followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

Demonstrative Evidence — Admission Upheld: In a prosecution for deliberate homicide caused by blows struck with a pick handle inside an automobile, the court did not err in overruling the defendant's objection to demonstrative evidence consisting of two pieces of a wooden handle and parts of an automobile. Allowing demonstrative evidence is within the discretion of the trial court and will not be reversed except upon a showing of manifest abuse of discretion. The record of the case shows no such abuse but shows that the witnesses, attorneys, and trial judge made it clear that the evidence admitted was demonstrative only and was not the actual items used in commission of the crime. Defendant offered no cautionary instruction on this issue and therefore cannot claim error on appeal because none was given. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Difficulty in Locating Witness as Grounds for Reopening Case: Where the State had difficulty in locating an eyewitness, kept the trial court and the defendant informed of its difficulty, and the defendant was given full opportunity to rebut the witness's testimony, it was not error to allow the State to reopen its case in chief to receive the eyewitness testimony. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980), followed in St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Opinion Testimony Conditioned on Foundation — Discretionary: It is within the discretion of the trial court to allow opinion to be given, conditioned on the subsequent production and admission of evidence that forms the basis of the opinion. Since necessary evidence that served to complete the chain of possession was supplied, there was no prejudice to the defendant. St. v. McKenzie, 171 M 278, 557 P2d 1023 (1976).

Testimony by Prosecution: It was not prejudicial for the prosecution to offer testimony that it was the policy of the County Attorney's office to delay filing charges until the office felt it could prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt since the defendant opened the door for that testimony. St. v. Hensley, 171 M 38, 554 P2d 745 (1976).

Permitting Witness to Correct Testimony — Discretionary: The trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting a State's witness the opportunity to correct testimony made on direct examination under a former statute authorizing the court to permit the State to offer evidence upon its original case during the period reserved for rebuttal testimony. St. v. Crockett, 148 M 402, 421 P2d 722 (1966).

Evidence of Prior Felonies: It was not a denial of a fair trial when the jury was allowed to consider the proven and admitted fact that the defendant in a first degree assault case had been convicted of three prior felonies. Petition of Jones, 144 M 13, 393 P2d 780 (1964).

Opening Statement:

The County Attorney must refer to evidence the State intends to prove in his opening statement but is not required to state for what purpose he intends to produce certain evidence; hence, the trial court did not err in denying a request of the counsel for the defendant requiring him to do so. St. v. Keays, 97 M 404, 34 P2d 855 (1934).

A former provision requiring the County Attorney to make an opening statement in a criminal prosecution was merely directory. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

PRESENTATION OF DEFENSE

No Error in Ruling Given Party's Participation or Acquiescence: The trial court admitted a transcript of 9-1-1 calls involving the pursuit of Cybulski while she was driving on the wrong side of an interstate highway. Cybulski contended that admitting the transcript was error when the original tape was available and should have been played to the jury. The Supreme Court disagreed. Cybulski did not object to admission of the transcript during a pretrial evidentiary hearing and did not challenge the accuracy of the transcript. The state laid a foundation for admission of the transcript at trial, and the trial court stated that Cybulski could play the actual tape at trial if desired, but Cybulski declined. The Supreme Court will not put a trial court in error for a ruling or procedure in which a party acquiesced or participated, and it was disingenuous for Cybulski to argue on appeal that the trial court erred in not admitting the actual tape of the calls when Cybulski was afforded the opportunity to play the tape but failed to do so. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009). See also In re Pedersen, 261 M 284, 862 P2d 411 (1993), In re R.B.O., 277 M 272, 921 P2d 268 (1996), and St. v. Clay, 1998 MT 244, 291 M 147, 967 P2d 370 (1998).

Sufficient Evidence of Impairment to Support Negligent Homicide and DUI Conviction: Larson contended that evidence was insufficient to support a jury's determination of impairment by alcohol at the time of a fatal accident and that the inference of impairment resulting from Larson's blood alcohol concentration was rebutted by other evidence indicating that the accident was caused by a momentary lapse of attention while driving on a dangerous road. The state presented evidence that Larson drank a substantial amount of alcohol during the evening and morning hours prior to the accident; admitted that he had consumed a considerable amount of alcohol; drove his pickup at a high rate of speed off the shoulder of the highway, causing the vehicle to roll and eject the passengers; and tested for a blood alcohol concentration of 0.12 2 hours after the accident and 4 hours after he had stopped drinking. Although the Supreme Court could not discern precisely why the jury reached its decision to convict Larson, Larson fully presented his defense theory, and the jury rejected it. The evidence was sufficient to support the conviction, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

Failure to Object at Trial to Refusal to Allow Testimony of Additional Witnesses After Trial Commenced — No Interference With Constitutional Right to Present Defense: LaDue contended that failure to allow the testimony of two additional witnesses after the start of his trial on charges of attempted deliberate homicide interfered with his constitutional right to present a defense. However, LaDue did not raise the constitutional question at trial, thus failing to preserve the issue for appeal. Failure to raise the issue at trial constituted waiver of the right to appeal it. St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Trial Phase — Reasonable Trial Strategy: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the trial phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in: (1) agreeing to the procedure used to present the testimony of the state's key witness, which involved questioning of the witness by the guardian ad litem; (2) failing to corroborate the defense theory through examination of the witness; (3) failing to give an opening statement; (4) failing to object to guilt phase errors, including improper questions and comments by the state; (5) failing to obtain experts to testify regarding Dawson's drug ingestion, head injuries, and EEG tests; and (6) failing to give a closing argument. On the first point, counsel's decision to use a special procedure to examine the fragile witness was reasonable, and Dawson agreed to the procedure. On the second point, counsel's decision not to subject the witness to further questioning after her very emotional testimony was also reasonable when counsel believed that further questioning would have been more damaging to the defense than helpful. Third, waiver of an opening statement was a reasonable trial tactic under the circumstances, and that decision could not form a basis for an ineffective assistance claim (see U.S. v. Rodrigues-Ramirez, 777 F2d 454 (9th Cir. 1985), and U.S. v. Nersesian, 824 F2d 1294 (2nd Cir. 1987)). Fourth, counsel's failure to object to certain prosecutorial questions and comments was reasonable and within the wide range of permissible professional legal conduct (see U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)). Fifth, counsel's decision not to call experts did not amount to ineffective assistance. Sixth, the decision not to give a closing statement did not constitute ineffective assistance per se and was a reasonable trial strategy that did not fall below the standard of what a minimally competent defense attorney would have done in the same circumstances (see St. v. Lee, 689 P2d 153 (Ariz. 1984)). The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at trial. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Failure to Object to Testimony — Choice of Trial Tactics in Presentation of Evidence Held Not Ineffective Assistance as Matter of Law — Failure to Object to Prosecutor Comment on Credibility Held Not to Be Denial of Effective Assistance of Counsel: Hanson was convicted of sexual assault and deviate sexual conduct. He retained different counsel and appealed his conviction, alleging ineffective assistance of counsel because his trial counsel failed to object to the testimony of three witnesses. The Supreme Court held that Hanson's trial counsel may have failed to object as a matter of trial strategy because his strategy was to disprove the credibility of the witnesses' testimony through cross-examination or through the testimony of other witnesses. The Supreme Court also held that one comment by the prosecutor on the believability of the testimony of an expert witness may have been improper but, in this case, did not rise to the level of ineffective assistance of counsel. St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997).

Lack of Notice of Changed Testimony — Continuance Proper: It was not revealed to defendant until trial that the initial story of an alleged sexual assault victim had changed. Prior to the victim's in-court testimony, defendant was unaware that the victim had made more than one statement to the investigating officer. Nevertheless, on the grounds that the court's calendar was full and defendant should have subpoenaed the witnesses before trial, the trial court denied defendant's motion for continuance until other witnesses could be subpoenaed to test the victim's credibility. The Supreme Court noted that the credibility of a witness is of utmost importance between a sexual abuse victim and a denying defendant, often constituting the only defense available, and that a change in testimony goes to the credibility of the victim. A reasonable continuance would have satisfied defendant's constitutional rights with regard to compulsory process, due process, and fair trial, and denial of the motion was an abuse of discretion warranting reversal and a new trial. St. v. Timblin, 254 M 48, 834 P2d 927, 49 St. Rep. 617 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

Refusal to Allow Defense to Cease Cross-Examination and Recall Witness After Studying Evidence: Counsel for defendant asked to cease his cross-examination of a witness and to be able to recall her after he reviewed the evidence. The court did not err in refusing and in citing the time being taken by the trial. Copies of financial document exhibits relating to the witness's testimony were available to counsel before trial, and he had ample time to examine them. St. v. Korang, 237 M 390, 773 P2d 326, 46 St. Rep. 892 (1989).

Proper Restriction — Attorney Giving Instructions and Arguing Case: The judge interrupted defense counsel during her opening and closing statements and during voir dire. Although a judge should not interrupt the opening so as to prevent defendant from outlining his defense, the trial judge can stop counsel from giving instructions or arguing the case as was done here. Admonishing counsel's use of "law school questions" during voir dire is within the judge's latitude in controlling voir dire. The judge's conduct of the trial was meant to expedite and facilitate the trial, and the defendant is not entitled to a new trial. St. v. Lamere, 190 M 332, 621 P2d 462, 37 St. Rep. 1936 (1980).

Opening Statement of Defense:

Defense counsel, in his opening statement, attempted to review the elements of the crime of theft. His purpose was to show to the jury each of the items that they should look for and that if any of those items were missing they should take note of that fact. The District Court ruled that defense counsel was attempting to argue the case before the jury instead of telling the jury what he intended to prove. The Supreme Court found no error in the District Court's restrictions. St. v. Martinez, 188 M 271, 613 P2d 974 (1980).

The denial to the defendant of an opportunity to make an opening statement concerning insanity defense until after the presentation of the prosecution's case was an improper interference with the defendant's right to have the jury consider his defense. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

FINAL ARGUMENT

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Not Improper or Prejudicial — No Prosecutorial Misconduct in Referencing Defendant's Evidence: Dewitz contended that the prosecutor committed misconduct in closing arguments by referencing a plea agreement entered by an alleged accomplice. However, the plea agreement was entered into evidence by defense counsel in an effort to show that the alleged accomplice was not credible, so Dewitz could not complain of the prosecutor's reference to evidence that Dewitz introduced. Nor did Dewitz demonstrate how the comments could be considered improper or prejudicial. The prosecutor's comments were not so egregious as to deprive Dewitz of a fair trial, so no misconduct occurred. St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009).

Prosecutor's Closing Comments Regarding Witness's Credibility Not Improper: Green contended that the prosecutor improperly commented on the credibility of a witness during closing arguments at Green's homicide trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. During closing arguments, a prosecutor may comment on the gravity of the crime charged, the volume of evidence, credibility of witnesses, inferences to be drawn from the various phases of evidence, and legal principles involved. Although it is generally improper for a prosecutor to offer personal opinions regarding the credibility of the accused or witnesses, it is proper to comment on conflicts and contradictions in testimony, as well as to comment on the evidence and to suggest to the jury inferences that may be drawn from the evidence. Here, the prosecutor was reminding the jury of the inconsistency between the witness's statement to police after arrest and the witness's later testimony, and the prosecutor was allowed to point out the inconsistency and to question which version was the truth. St. v. Green, 2009 MT 114, 350 M 141, 205 P3d 798 (2009). See also St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643 (1991), and St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827 (1999).

Prosecutor's Comments on Contradictions in Testimony and Suggestions on Inferences From Evidence: It is improper for a prosecutor to comment on evidence that is not in the record or to offer a personal opinion regarding the credibility of witnesses, but a prosecutor may comment on contradictions in testimony and on the evidence presented and may suggest inferences that the jury may draw from the evidence. St. v. Makarchuk, 2009 MT 82, 349 M 507, 204 P3d 1213 (2009), following St. v. Daniels, 2003 MT 247, 317 M 331, 77 P3d 224 (2003), and St. v. Roubideaux, 2005 MT 324, 329 M 521, 125 P3d 1114 (2005).

Prosecutor's Comments on Credibility of Witnesses and Defendant's Failure to Present Evidence — Plain Error Review Declined: Lindberg claimed reversible error because the prosecutor, in closing arguments during Lindberg's trial on sex crimes, made personal comments regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence presented by the defense, which Lindberg asserted shifted the burden to Lindberg to prove his innocence and violated the right to a fair trial. Because defense counsel did not object to the comments, Lindberg contended that the rights violation was reviewable under the plain error doctrine. Although not condoning the prosecutor's comments, the Supreme Court nevertheless declined to apply the plain error doctrine because, given the totality of the circumstances, the comments did not rise to a level sufficient to invoke plain error. The comments did not unconstitutionally shift the burden of proof to Lindberg. Failure to review Lindberg's claims would not have resulted in a manifest miscarriage of justice, so plain error review was unwarranted. St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 M 76, 196 P3d 1252 (2008).

Prosecutor's Statements and Questions Regarding Witness Credibility Violative of Right to Fair Trial — Remand: At Hayden's trial, the prosecutor questioned a detective concerning the credibility of two other witnesses who had recanted their prior statements at trial, eliciting the detective's impressions of the credibility of the witness's initial statements following an assault. The detective responded that he thought the initial statements, rather than the trial statements, were true. The prosecutor also offered his own opinion as to the witness's testimony, stated that the jury could rely on the detective's testimony, and improperly testified during closing by vouching for the efficacy of the search of Hayden's residence and stating his opinion that a scale found during the search was used for drugs. The prosecutor's conduct invaded the role of the jury, creating a clear danger that jurors adopted the prosecutor's views instead of exercising their own independent judgment, and unfairly added the probative force of the prosecutor's personal, professional, and official influence to the testimony of the witnesses. The prosecutor's conduct undermined the fundamental fairness of the proceedings and Hayden's constitutional right to a fair trial, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008).

Closing Arguments Regarding Defendant's Failure to Present Evidence Contradicting Testimony of Prosecution Witnesses Not Warranting Mistrial: During closing arguments in Rodarte's incest trial, the prosecution referenced Rodarte's failure to present evidence that contradicted the testimony of prosecution witnesses. Citing U.S. v. Williams, 739 F2d 297 (7th Cir. 1984), and U.S. v. Viera, 819 F2d 498 (5th Cir. 1987), Rodarte contended that a mistrial should have been granted because it was error for the prosecution to draw inferences from defendant's failure to call a particular witness. The Supreme Court distinguished Rodarte's cited cases, noting that although it is improper for the prosecution to comment on the failure of a defendant to testify on the defendant's own behalf, the prosecution is permitted to point out facts at issue that could have been controverted by persons other than the defendant, but were not. St. v. Rodarte, 2002 MT 317, 313 M 131, 60 P3d 983 (2002). See also Lockett v. Ohio, 438 US 586 (1978).

Prosecutor's Comments Improper — References to Unrelated Cases, Attempting to Define Reasonable Doubt, and Personal Opinions Regarding Guilt and Appropriateness of Sentence: In closing arguments in a case in which defendant was charged with attempting to fraudulently obtain dangerous drugs by altering a prescription, the prosecutor attempted to define reasonable doubt by referring to a rape case that he tried several years earlier and by citing the need for a new county jail as evidence that the state proved reasonable doubt every day. The comments were not only irrelevant but also misrepresented the state's burden of proof. Arguments attempting to define reasonable doubt will cause reversible error. The prosecutor also told the jury that defendant's denials were so commonplace that prosecutors had named it the "some dude" defense, as in "Blame it on somebody, some dude, some dude sitting out there". The "some dude" remarks were essentially the prosecutor's personal opinion on the strength of the state's case, referred to matters outside the record and to the prosecutor's own experience, and were similar to a prosecutor commenting on the believability of a witness. Closing arguments that reflect the prosecutor's personal opinions as to guilt are improper. Lastly, the prosecutor assured the jury that even if it found defendant guilty, the judge had the authority to order treatment rather than jail time. The comments were meant to reassure the jury that a guilty verdict would not hurt defendant, but would actually be a benefit in the long run. However, sentencing is solely the duty of the trial court, and in a noncapital case, the verdict should not be influenced in any way by sentencing considerations. It is impermissible for a jury to give weight to possible punishment when reaching a verdict. Although the case was remanded on other grounds, the Supreme Court admonished the prosecution not to make such comments on retrial. St. v. Stewart, 2000 MT 379, 303 M 507, 16 P3d 391, 57 St. Rep. 1615 (2000).

No Prejudice From Alleged Ineffective Assistance of Counsel During Trial Phase — Reasonable Trial Strategy: Dawson was convicted of robbery, four counts of aggravated kidnapping, and three counts of deliberate homicide and sentenced to death for each of three counts of aggravated kidnapping that resulted in the death of the victim. His conviction was appealed and affirmed (St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352 (1988)). Dawson filed for postconviction relief, alleging 30 separate grounds for relief, but all except one claim, ineffective assistance of counsel, were dismissed. Dawson's appellate counsel withdrew, and Dawson filed an amended petition adding a 31st ground for relief, which was ineffective assistance of appellate counsel, but that petition was also denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered Dawson's claim of ineffective assistance of counsel during the trial phase. Dawson alleged that counsel was ineffective in: (1) agreeing to the procedure used to present the testimony of the state's key witness, which involved questioning of the witness by the guardian ad litem; (2) failing to corroborate the defense theory through examination of the witness; (3) failing to give an opening statement; (4) failing to object to guilt phase errors, including improper questions and comments by the state; (5) failing to obtain experts to testify regarding Dawson's drug ingestion, head injuries, and EEG tests; and (6) failing to give a closing argument. On the first point, counsel's decision to use a special procedure to examine the fragile witness was reasonable, and Dawson agreed to the procedure. On the second point, counsel's decision not to subject the witness to further questioning after her very emotional testimony was also reasonable when counsel believed that further questioning would have been more damaging to the defense than helpful. Third, waiver of an opening statement was a reasonable trial tactic under the circumstances, and that decision could not form a basis for an ineffective assistance claim (see U.S. v. Rodrigues-Ramirez, 777 F2d 454 (9th Cir. 1985), and U.S. v. Nersesian, 824 F2d 1294 (2nd Cir. 1987)). Fourth, counsel's failure to object to certain prosecutorial questions and comments was reasonable and within the wide range of permissible professional legal conduct (see U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)). Fifth, counsel's decision not to call experts did not amount to ineffective assistance. Sixth, the decision not to give a closing statement did not constitute ineffective assistance per se and was a reasonable trial strategy that did not fall below the standard of what a minimally competent defense attorney would have done in the same circumstances (see St. v. Lee, 689 P2d 153 (Ariz. 1984)). The District Court did not err when it found that Dawson did not receive ineffective assistance at trial. Dawson v. St., 2000 MT 219, 301 M 135, 10 P3d 49, 57 St. Rep. 883 (2000).

Prosecutor's Personal Opinion on Strength of Case Held Improper — "Invited Reply" Held Inapplicable — No Prejudice Found: At the trial of Gladue on charges stemming from Gladue's assault of his girlfriend, the County Attorney stated in final argument: (1) that it was his job to determine which cases "flew" and which didn't and that the case against Gladue "flew" to a greater extent than other cases brought by his office; and (2) that it was Gladue who "committed the crimes". After reviewing the standards and previous opinions, including St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606 (1987), St. v. Stuit, 268 M 176, 885 P2d 1290 (1994), and St. v. Stringer, 271 M 367, 897 P2d 1063 (1995), the Supreme Court held that the language used by the County Attorney was improper because it constituted the prosecutor's personal opinion that Gladue was guilty. Also, the Supreme Court rejected the applicability of the "invited reply" doctrine examined in U.S. v. Gwaltney, 790 F2d 1378 (9th Cir. 1986), because the defense counsel's statements were not sufficiently objectionable to justify the improper final argument by the County Attorney. Although it held the County Attorney's statements to be improper, the Supreme Court also held, principally because Gladue was acquitted of most of the charges against him, that there was no evidence that the County Attorney's statements were prejudicial to Gladue. St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

Prosecutor's Closing Statement Not Admitted Into Evidence — Cautionary Statement Sufficient to Cure Prejudicial Effect: In closing statements in a rape trial, the state prosecutor improperly commented on the fact that defendant made unfounded accusations as to the victim's alleged prostitution activities. Defendant alleged that the comments were grounds for mistrial because there was in fact evidence available that the victim was a prostitute, but the evidence had been found to be inadmissible under the rape shield law. However, evidence of prostitution did not establish a defense, nor did prostitution in and of itself show a lack of credibility on the part of the witness. The prosecutor's statement was not admitted into evidence, and the court's cautionary statement that the jury was not to consider such statements as evidence was sufficient to cure any prejudicial effect of the prosecutor's comment, precluding any reasonable possibility that the prosecutor's comment contributed to defendant's conviction. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998), following St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997).

Prosecutor's Comments on Guilt of Accused: County Attorney's remarks in his closing argument did not constitute reversible error when he stated that the inescapable conclusion from the evidence presented was that defendant was guilty. The County Attorney did not state his personal opinion that he believed defendant had committed the crimes, which would have been highly improper. His statements were based on his analysis of the evidence and were a matter on which he could properly argue. St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329, 47 St. Rep. 321 (1990). See also St. v. McColley, 247 M 524, 807 P2d 1358, 48 St. Rep. 290 (1991).

Prosecutor's References to Punishment During Closing Argument Nonprejudicial — Mistrial Denied: Defendant claimed that the prosecutor's references to punishment during rebuttal closing arguments warranted grant of a motion for mistrial. However, the references to differences in punishment were made to explain why the defendant had a motive to lie. Further, the prosecutor's action in calling defendant a liar was nothing more than an opinion based on the state's analysis of evidence and did not constitute an expression of personal opinion of guilt. The comments did not prejudice defendant in light of overwhelming evidence of criminal conduct and the judge's cautionary instruction admonishing the jury to disregard the references. The motion for mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Clawson, 239 M 413, 781 P2d 267, 46 St. Rep. 1792 (1989).

Prosecutor's Assertion of Personal Opinion — Motion for Mistrial Denied: Defendant moved for mistrial, asserting that the state's attorney's closing arguments constituted improper prosecutorial comment and misconduct. During closing, the state had argued that its office was too busy to prosecute innocent persons, stating: "We don't have time to do that, ladies and gentlemen. We do have 1,450 cases a year in the county attorney's office. We don't have time to spend chasing people that we believe are innocent or [have time] to frame people." The Supreme Court affirmed its disapproval of an attorney's assertion of a personal opinion and cautioned the state to refrain from such a tactic. However, since defendant had no evidence that these statements resulted in undue prejudice, the motion for mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987). See also St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Prosecutor Comment on Homicide Victim's Family and Character: It was inappropriate for the prosecutor, in his opening and closing statements, to comment on the family of the victim and on the victim's outstanding personal characteristics. However, the record did not show denial of a substantial right, and a conviction necessarily followed from defendant's testimony, which established every element of the offenses with which he was charged. St. v. Nichols, 225 M 438, 734 P2d 170, 44 St. Rep. 382 (1987), followed in St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997).

Prosecution Comments on Witnesses in Opening and Closing — No Objection — No Effect on Substantial Rights: The prosecution in opening and closing made comments on the truthfulness and credibility of witnesses and other matters not related to the defendant's right not to testify. A lack of objection does not preclude consideration in the trial court of error that affects the defendant's substantial rights, but these matters were subject to free comment to the jury under the circumstances of this case and thus did not affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984).

Conclusory Inferences by Prosecutor Proper: In an appeal alleging ineffective assistance of counsel, the defendant objected to the prosecution's conclusory inferences that the victims were wounded while attempting to flee from the defendant. Because there was substantial evidence to support the inferences, the prosecutor's comments were proper. St. v. Dupre, 200 M 165, 650 P2d 1381, 39 St. Rep. 1660 (1982).

Prejudicial Remarks by Prosecutor — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: Generally, prejudicial remarks made by a prosecutor to a jury in a state court trial are not cognizable in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. To constitute a proper ground for habeas corpus relief, the prosecutorial remarks must be so egregious as to render the trial fundamentally unfair. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Comments on Trial Evidence — Remarks to the Jury by Counsel — Limitations: This section allows an attorney to comment on the evidence of a case as long as there are facts to support such statements. Here, the prosecutor's version of the homicide was supported by the evidence. The defendant claimed that the prosecutor's closing remarks were made unfairly because the remarks were contrary to polygraph test results that the defendant unsuccessfully sought to have entered into evidence. This argument was rejected by the Supreme Court because the polygraph examinee (the defendant) was allowed to testify to the facts covered by the test and the defendant's version of the death also was given to the jury. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Improper to Characterize Witness as Liar: In most instances, it is highly improper for an attorney in final argument to characterize the testimony of a witness as a lie or the party or a witness himself as a liar. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978), followed in St. v. Stewart, 253 M 475, 833 P2d 1085, 49 St. Rep. 540 (1992), St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994), St. v. Stringer, 271 M 367, 897 P2d 1063, 52 St. Rep. 473 (1995), and St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999). Stringer was followed in St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997). Hanson was followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999). See also St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329, 47 St. Rep. 321 (1990), St. v. Houle, 1998 MT 235, 291 M 95, 966 P2d 147, 55 St. Rep. 989 (1998), and St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

JURY INSTRUCTIONS GENERALLY

Jury Instruction on Criminal Endangerment Not Prejudicial to Defendant — Additional Language Not Relevant to Case Properly Excluded From Instruction: At Cybulski's trial for DUI and criminal endangerment, the District Court gave the following jury instruction: "A person commits the offense of criminal endangerment if the person knowingly engages in conduct that creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury to another. A person acts knowingly when the person is aware there exists the high probability that the person's conduct will cause a specific result." Cybulski requested additional language from 45-5-207 regarding endangerment caused by tree spiking, but the request was denied. Cybulski also requested additional language regarding the definition of "knowingly", but that request was denied as well. On appeal, Cybulski contended that the District Court erred by not including the requested language in the jury instruction. The Supreme Court disagreed. The language regarding tree spiking had no application to Cybulski's case and was properly refused. The District Court's definition language was shorter and clearer and properly stated the law. Cybulski was not prejudiced by the jury instruction because she was still able to argue her defense theory that she was not aware that her conduct would cause a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury. The District Court was affirmed. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009).

No Abuse of Discretion in Denying Mistrial for Ordering Continued Jury Deliberations: Doyle moved for a mistrial after the trial court ordered the jury to continue deliberating after the jurors notified the court that they were at an impasse. Doyle contended that the trial court improperly pressured the jury to reach a decision and created the impression that the jury could return only a unanimous verdict rather than a hung jury and that the court failed to explain to the jurors that they should never give up their honest opinion concerning Doyle's guilt or innocence. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The transcript showed that the jury was in fact instructed that it should not surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of the evidence or the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The court sent the jury home the first day after 10 hours of deliberations when the jury informed the court that it could not reach a decision. At the end of the second day, the jury sent a note to the court informing the judge that the jury was at an impasse. The court asked the jury if it wished to go home or continue deliberations, and the jury opted to go home. The third day, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. Based on the transcript, the trial court never forced deliberations, and the court did not abuse its discretion in denying Doyle's mistrial motion. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

Standard of Review of Jury Instructions in Criminal Case: The Supreme Court reviews jury instructions in a criminal case to determine if the instructions fully and fairly instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case. A District Court has broad discretion in instructing a jury and will be reversed only if an instruction prejudicially affects the substantial rights of a defendant. St. v. Dubois, 2006 MT 89, 332 M 44, 134 P3d 82 (2006). See also St. v. Baker, 2004 MT 393, 325 M 229, 104 P3d 491 (2004).

Prosecutor's Improper Reference to Hearsay Statement in Opening Cured by Court's Instruction: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's reference to a hearsay statement by a person who did not testify at trial was prejudicial. Defendant did not move for mistrial based on the statement, but asserted on appeal that the improper reference should warrant reversal. The Supreme Court noted that a lawyer's statements are not evidence and held that it would be inappropriate to apply the abuse of discretion standard to an action or lack of action that defendant never requested the trial court to take. In this case, the quoting of hearsay was cured by the trial court's instruction that the jury disregard the prosecutor's statement, and the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. High Elk, 2006 MT 6, 330 M 259, 127 P3d 432 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), and St. v. Runs Above, 2003 MT 181, 316 M 421, 73 P3d 161 (2003).

Jury Instruction Regarding Witness Credibility Not Erroneous: Marble contended that the trial court erred in giving a jury instruction regarding witness credibility. The Supreme Court looked at the jury instructions as a whole and concluded that the instructions fully and fairly instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case and gave the jury adequate guidance on assessing and weighing the credibility of witnesses. Marble was not prejudiced by the jury instructions, and his conviction was affirmed. St. v. Marble, 2005 MT 208, 328 M 223, 119 P3d 88 (2005), following St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence of Attempted Obstruction of Peace Officer — Jury Properly Instructed Regarding Mental Standards of Offense: When she saw heavily armed officers approaching a neighbor's residence, Baker called the neighbor and left a recorded message that it would be in the neighbor's interests to peek out the window. The message was subsequently confiscated, and Baker was charged with and convicted of attempted obstruction of a police officer. On appeal, Baker challenged the use of evidence regarding the neighbor's history and arrest, the purpose and use of the high-risk unit in arresting the neighbor, and an officer's outrage at Baker's interference with the police, contending that the evidence was irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under the transaction rule set out in St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999), the trial court did not err in allowing the evidence because it enabled the jury to understand the circumstances surrounding the police activity and how Baker's interference could have affected the outcome. Baker also contested the jury instructions. Under 45-7-302, a person obstructs an officer when the person knowingly hinders the enforcement of the criminal law, so for a person to commit the offense of attempted obstruction, the person need only perform any act toward the commission of obstruction while aware of the fact that the person is performing the act. The instructions to the jury contained an explanation of the "knowingly" standard and multiple instructions on Baker's purpose for making the call and thus were a fair and full instruction on the law. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Baker, 2004 MT 393, 325 M 229, 104 P3d 491 (2004).

Jury Properly Instructed on Definition of Criminal Negligence — Mental State Not at Issue: In Larson's negligent homicide trial, the court instructed the jury that a person acts negligently when an act is done with a conscious disregard of the risk of death or when a person disregards a risk of causing death that the person should be aware that the result will occur or that the circumstance exists. Larson contended that the instruction erroneously omitted the word "consciously" before the word "disregards". The Supreme Court disagreed. Under St. v. Gould, 216 M 455, 704 P2d 20 (1985), mental state is not at issue in negligent homicide cases. Contrary to Larson's contention, the instruction did not effectively lower the standard of proof for proving negligence, but rather constituted a correct statutory definition. Larson had a full opportunity to argue his defense, and the jury was properly instructed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

Bailiff's Instructions to Split Jury to Continue Deliberations Not Reversible Error: Steele was charged with eight offenses and conceded guilt on all but one charge. During deliberations on the remaining charge, the jury became deadlocked and notified the bailiff. Outside the presence of the parties and without the court's approval, the bailiff told the jury that they needed to keep working on it and needed to find common ground. Steele contended that the bailiff's action denied the parties and counsel the opportunity to consult with the court in violation of 46-16-503 and moved for mistrial. The motion was denied, and Steele appealed. It is not the prerogative of any court officer except the trial judge to give instructions to the jury regarding deliberations. However, without condoning the bailiff's actions, the Supreme Court held that the bailiff's instructions did not misadvise the jury but merely asked the jury to continue deliberating, the same instruction that the District Court would have offered, so a mistrial was not warranted on those grounds. Further, the jury did not disagree as to any testimony received or desire any information regarding the law, so 46-16-503 was not triggered. Although not given or condoned by the trial judge, the bailiff's instructions did not attempt to pressure the jurors into reaching a verdict or assert to the minority jurors that their positions should change, as was the case in St. v. Randall, 137 M 534, 353 P2d 1054 (1960), so denial of the mistrial motion was proper. St. v. Steele, 2004 MT 275, 323 M 204, 99 P3d 210 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976). See also St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379 (1986).

Counsel Decision to Forego Certain Defense Considered Trial Strategy — Insufficient Record to Determine Effective Assistance of Counsel on Direct Appeal: On direct appeal, Hendricks contended that he was provided ineffective assistance of counsel in his assault trial because his attorney failed to raise the affirmative defense of justifiable use of force. However, in a disclosure statement filed prior to the omnibus hearing, Hendricks's counsel specifically noted that the defense of justifiable use of force would not be asserted. On the morning of trial, counsel stated that no jury instructions on the defense of justifiable use of force would be offered. Thus, the decision not to raise the defense was made consciously and was not the result of ignorance or neglect and was presumed to be sound trial strategy falling within the realm of reasonable professional conduct absent evidence to the contrary. Absent a sufficient record to address the issue of ineffective assistance, the direct appeal was dismissed, requiring Hendricks to raise the issue by a postconviction relief proceeding, if at all. The Supreme Court clarified that it will no longer use the approach in St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001), to determine effective assistance of counsel, but rather the procedure set out in St. v. Herrmann, 2003 MT 149, 316 M 198, 70 P3d 738 (2003), and St. v. Turnsplenty, 2003 MT 159, 316 M 275, 70 P3d 1234 (2003). St. v. Hendricks, 2003 MT 223, 317 M 177, 75 P3d 1268 (2003), followed in St. v. Webster, 2005 MT 38, 326 M 112, 107 P3d 500 (2005).

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Counsel, Defendant, and Court Reporter — Automatic Reversible Error Absent Recorded Waiver by Defendant of Constitutional Rights: On the second full day of jury deliberations in Tapson's trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated kidnapping, and attempted deliberate homicide, the trial judge met with counsel, on the record, to notify them that the jury had a verdict on one of the three counts, but was unable to reach a verdict on the other two counts. With Tapson present, the state suggested substituting the existing verdict form, which listed all three charges, with six verdict forms—one "guilty" form and one "not guilty" form for each of the three charges—to avoid the problem of the jury switching its current verdict on one charge for some sort of last minute compromise. The state also suggested that the judge take the forms into the jury room, rather than moving the jury and handling the matter in open court. Tapson's counsel stated that the defense did not have any objection to the proposition, so the judge took the forms into the jury room, without counsel or Tapson present, and returned 11 minutes later. There was no record of whether the judge spent the entire time with the jury, what the judge told the jury, whether the jury had any questions, or whether the judge gave any responses. Tapson was subsequently convicted of attempted deliberate homicide, although the jury could not reach a verdict on the other charges. Tapson was sentenced to life imprisonment, but appealed the conviction and sentence. The Supreme Court noted Tapson's fundamental constitutional right to be present and defend in person and by counsel, and the fundamental right to a public trial, which extends to the entire trial, including the judge's instructions to the jury. The state contended that defense counsel waived Tapson's right to be present, but the Supreme Court declined to engage in presumptions of waiver, holding that if a defendant chooses to waive these constitutional rights, the trial court must obtain an on-the-record personal waiver, by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently, and knowingly waives the rights. Thus, when there is some circumstance arguably making it necessary for a trial judge to enter the jury room while the jury is present, the court must contemporaneously explain to the defendant, on the record, the constitutional right to be present at all critical stages of the trial and the right to a public trial. The defendant may then choose to waive those rights. However, absent a contemporaneous, personal, knowing, voluntary, intelligent, on-the-record waiver by the defendant, if a judge enters a jury room while the jury is present and without counsel, the defendant, and the court reporter, reversal will be automatic. Tapson's constitutional rights were violated, so the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 US 422 (1978), and Commonwealth v. Patry, 722 NE 2d 979 (Mass. App. Ct. 2000), and distinguishing St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881 (1999), and St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Failure to Instruct Jury Regarding Need for Unanimous Verdict on Alternative Charges — Reversible Error: Hardaway was initially charged with burglary, and the information was amended to charge that Hardaway knowingly entered or remained unlawfully in an unoccupied structure with intent to commit theft or a sexual crime. Hardaway contended that the jury instructions were improperly given in the alternative, allowing the jury to convict even though some members believed that he intended theft, while others believed that he intended a sexual crime. The Supreme Court agreed. Article II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., requires a unanimous verdict in all criminal actions. Unanimity requires more than a conclusory agreement that the accused is guilty of some charged offense. The jury must agree as to the principal factual elements underlying a specified offense, so when an accused is charged in the alternative, the jury must be clearly instructed that it is required to reach a unanimous verdict as to each individual alternative. Absent such an instruction, Hardaway was denied his right to a unanimous verdict, constituting reversible error. St. v. Hardaway, 2001 MT 252, 307 M 139, 36 P3d 900 (2001).

Failure by State to Articulate Permissible Purpose for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes — Lack of Proof of Defendant's Knowledge of Fact of Consequence: During pretrial proceedings for Dobson's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated its intent to introduce evidence that Dobson had been previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The purported purpose was for proof of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident, establishing that Dobson knew that someone under 16 years of age could not legally consent to sexual intercourse. Instead of objecting, defense counsel offered to stipulate that Dobson did have knowledge of that fact. The state objected that Dobson should not be able to stipulate away its case, and urged that the jury instructions contain details of the prior charge. The trial court declined the specific instructions offered by both Dobson and the state and fashioned and gave its own instruction, advising the jury that Dobson was previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor and thus had knowledge of the law, but instructing that the evidence was not to be construed by the jury as evidence of Dobson's character, but only as evidence of Dobson's prior knowledge that such conduct was criminal. On appeal, Dobson contended that the instruction was erroneous. The Supreme Court agreed that the trial court abused its discretion in giving the instruction because it did not meet the third criteria of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)). Although it appeared at first blush that the state asserted permissible purposes of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident for the admission of other crimes evidence, merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if that purpose is not an issue in dispute (see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995)). Rather, as set out in U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982), the state must articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the other acts evidence, which in this case, the state did not do. Dobson's knowledge of the law that it is a felony offense to have sexual intercourse with someone under 16 years of age was not a fact of consequence to the action. Thus, admission of the evidence via the jury instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001). See also St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996).

Failure to Offer Alternative Jury Instruction on Aggravated Assault When Defendant Maintains Innocence on All Charges Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Despite a daunting evidentiary record of Aliff's commission of a rape and attempted murder, he maintained his innocence and claimed that he was home with his wife while the victim was fighting for her life. Aliff contended on appeal that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because no alternative jury instruction was offered regarding the offense of aggravated assault. However, Aliff never claimed that he intended only to assault the victim, but rather that he did not commit the crimes for which he was charged or any other offense in connection with the incident. Counsel did not provide inadequate assistance by failing to offer an instruction that was inconsistent with the defense. The instructions that were actually offered were based on trial strategy and did not stem from neglect or ignorance. Counsel's performance was not deficient in any way, and judgment was affirmed. St. v. Aliff, 2001 MT 52, 304 M 310, 21 P3d 624 (2001).

Duty to Object to Instructions:

Where the defendant in a prosecution for felony theft offered and was refused an instruction on the lesser included offense of misdemeanor theft, the defendant had no duty to object to the court's refusal of the instruction. No exceptions are necessary to the rulings of the court on the settlement of instructions. St. v. Young, 206 M 19, 669 P2d 239, 40 St. Rep. 1474 (1983).

Defendant contended that jury instructions given by the District Court were improper and that rejected instructions should have been given. No objection to the instructions was raised at trial. Instructions cannot be challenged for the first time on appeal. The errors asserted did not affect the substantial rights of the defendant and were disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery, the Supreme Court found that the defendant was precluded from raising certain alleged errors in the jury instructions that related to proof of knowledge and purpose as no objection had been made to those instructions in the trial court. The Supreme Court also found that the objections had no merit as the instructions objected to, or instructions substantially similar to them, had been approved in St. v. Coleman, 185 M 229, 605 P2d 1000 (1979). St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

When a defect in an instruction given was not pointed out specifically by the defendant at the settlement of the instructions, the Supreme Court on appeal may not, under a former section, consider an objection not so pointed out. St. v. Vallie, 82 M 456, 268 P 493 (1928); St. v. Cassill, 71 M 274, 229 P 716 (1924); St. v. Sawyer, 71 M 269, 229 P 734 (1924); St. v. Dougherty, 71 M 265, 229 P 735 (1924); St. v. Bolton, 65 M 74, 212 P 504 (1922).

When the defendant, through his attorney, at the settlement of the instructions stated that he had no objections to them, assignments based on alleged error in them cannot be considered on appeal. St. v. Evans, 60 M 367, 199 P 440 (1921); St. v. Chronopoulos, 60 M 329, 199 P 266 (1921).

The defendant in a criminal case is bound by instructions to which he does not object. St. v. Crean, 43 M 47, 114 P 603 (1911).

When the defendant fails to make an objection to any portion of the charge or to any action of the trial court in its settlement during trial, he will not on appeal be heard to complain of error therein or of any omission by the court to submit any special instruction. St. v. Stone, 40 M 88, 105 P 89 (1909).

Assault defendant who failed to object to or offer other instructions regarding the "no aggressor" rule contained in the court's self-defense instructions could not, on appeal, raise the issue of failure to instruct on exceptions to that rule. The issue would not be addressed under the common-law plain error rule because declining review did not rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, did not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial process. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

No Right to Instruction on Every Nuance of One's Argument: A defendant is entitled to have instructions on the defendant's theory of the case, but is not entitled to an instruction concerning every nuance of the argument. St. v. Gonzales, 278 M 525, 926 P2d 705, 53 St. Rep. 1015 (1996).

Court Admonition Not Required Each Time Prior Acts Evidence Received: Under St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), the trial court must properly admonish the jury prior to admitting evidence of a defendant's prior acts. In the present case, the court cautioned the jury prior to admitting evidence of a sexual abuse victim's many years of abuse and beatings but did not again admonish the jury prior to evidence of a specific incident of abuse. The Supreme Court followed the holding in St. v. Tecca, 220 M 168, 714 P2d 136 (1986), and St. v. Keefe, 232 M 258, 759 P2d 128 (1988), that Just does not require an admonition each time that prior acts evidence is received. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Duty to Submit an Instruction if Desired:

Defendant contended District Court error in refusing to give a cautionary instruction sua sponte after the introduction of evidence that defendant had previously been convicted of child molesting even though the conviction was actually for sexual abuse. However, the burden of drafting and offering the necessary instruction fell on defendant. The Supreme Court refused to consider the alleged error predicated on the lack of a cautionary instruction because the defendant had never offered the necessary instruction. St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565, 49 St. Rep. 95 (1992).

When the testimony of a physician touching a physical examination of the complaining witness was admitted solely for the purpose of showing that sexual intercourse might have taken place, and for none other, the failure of the defendant to offer an instruction on the subject of its limitation deprived him of the right to complain that such an instruction was not given. St. v. Richardson, 63 M 322, 207 P 124 (1922).

When the defendant failed to offer an instruction on circumstantial evidence, he is in no position to complain of the omission to instruct the jury on that point. St. v. Francis, 58 M 659, 194 P 304 (1920).

It is well settled in this state that if a party is not satisfied with an instruction proposed to be given, he must submit an instruction which more fully covers the particular matter or he cannot be heard to complain unless the instruction given is inherently wrong. St. v. Powell, 54 M 217, 169 P 46 (1917); St. v. Tracey, 35 M 552, 90 P 791 (1907); St. v. Gordon, 35 M 458, 90 P 173 (1907); St. v. Broadbent, 19 M 467, 48 P 775 (1897); Territory v. Manton, 8 M 95, 19 P 387 (1888); Territory v. Hart, 7 M 489, 17 P 718 (1888).

Failure to Raise Due Process Issue in Instructions as Waiver in Entrapment Case: Defendant argued that a due process instruction based on outrageous government conduct should have been given in an entrapment case but did not submit such an instruction for consideration by the trial court. By failing to offer a due process instruction, defendant waived his claim. St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989).

Improper Testimony Stricken With Accompanying Cautionary Instructions — Error Presumed Cured: A police officer improperly testified to other crimes of defendant. The testimony was stricken, and the trial court gave three cautionary instructions admonishing the jury to disregard the testimony. The Supreme Court restated the general rule that where the trial judge withdraws or strikes improper testimony from the record with an accompanying cautionary instruction to the jury, any error committed by its introduction is presumed cured. The court also cited its discussion in St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368 (1979), that a jury cannot be presumed to ignore its duties to respect the instructions of the court and to decide a case based only upon the evidence admitted. St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987), followed in St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989), and in St. v. Staat, 251 M 1, 822 P2d 643, 48 St. Rep. 1041 (1991). The general rule referred to in Brush was applied in St. v. West, 252 M 83, 826 P2d 940, 49 St. Rep. 170 (1992).

Failure to Object to Jury Instruction — No Show of Prejudice — No Reversible Error: Appellant failed to object at the time the court informed the parties that it would not give the omnibus instruction or reread the preliminary jury instructions and would instead send the preliminary instruction with the final instructions to the jury. Because of the failure to make a timely objection and failure upon appeal to show any prejudice affecting substantial rights, pursuant to 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2) by Code Commissioner, 1987), there was no reversible error. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Instruction on Every Issue or Theory in Evidence: A trial court judge's instructions must cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985), following St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976). See also St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988).

Quasi-Entrapment Theory — Refusal to Instruct Not Error: Defendant convicted of felony theft alleged on appeal that he was denied fundamental fairness by the District Court's refusal to instruct on his theory that if he did exert unauthorized control over the stolen trucks, he did so negligently rather than purposely and knowingly and therefore he was not guilty because he did not have the requisite mental state to commit the offense. The Supreme Court held that while the defendant was entitled to have instructions on his theory, he was not entitled to put his arguments in those instructions; therefore, the defendant was denied neither fundamental fairness nor the opportunity to present his theory to the jury. St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985), followed in St. v. Dahms, 252 M 1, 825 P2d 1214, 49 St. Rep. 106 (1992), and in St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Negligent Homicide Instruction When Deliberate Homicide Charged — Right to Instruction if any Evidence Supports Negligence: It was reversible error requiring a new trial when court in which appellant was charged with deliberate homicide and convicted of mitigated deliberate homicide refused to give a negligent homicide instruction, because there was conflicting evidence on what blows were inflicted upon victim, who died after a fight with appellant, and on the reasons for the blows and the exact cause of death. There was evidence to support a negligent homicide instruction, and it is a fundamental rule that the instructions should cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence. St. v. Sotelo, 209 M 86, 679 P2d 779, 41 St. Rep. 568 (1984).

Error to Give Instruction Not Required by Evidence: Where the defendant was charged with criminal sale of a dangerous drug and the defendant and his wife testified that the substance offered for sale was not cocaine but a prescription drug known as lidocaine, the District Court erred in giving a jury instruction that the defendant could be convicted if he believed the substance sold was a dangerous drug. There was no evidence that the defendant believed he was in fact offering cocaine for sale. As no evidence therefore existed in the record to warrant an instruction, it should not have been given by the court. St. v. Starr, 204 M 210, 664 P2d 893, 40 St. Rep. 796 (1983).

Instruction That Sentence Is Mandatory: District Court properly refused to give and avoided prejudicial error by refusing to give defendant's requested instruction that there is a mandatory 2-year sentence for each verdict of guilty of kidnapping which may not be suspended or deferred by the court. Sentencing is solely for the court, and the jury is not to consider possible punishment upon conviction. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Judge to Instruct Jury on Law — Testimony of Constitutional Expert Excluded: The interpretation and application of the U.S. Constitution was a question of law and not a fact in issue in a prosecution for failure to file proper state tax returns. It was a determination to be made by the trial judge within his statutory powers. Instructing the jury on the law necessary for the jury's rendering of a verdict in a criminal case is a duty within the exclusive province of the trial judge. It was proper to exclude the testimony of an expert on the U.S. Constitution. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698 (1980).

Review of Instruction Later Declared Unconstitutional in Other Case — Plain Error Rule: The giving of a jury instruction, without objection by the defendant, that was subsequently declared unconstitutional in another case did not justify the use of the plain error rule when the instruction did not go to the essence of the case and was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Hardy, 185 M 130, 604 P2d 792 (1980).

Consideration of Instructions as a Whole:

On appeal the Supreme Court reviews jury instructions as a whole. It is impossible to deliver the whole of the law in any one instruction, and for that reason, all instructions are considered as a whole and if they fairly tender the case to the jury, the fact that one instruction standing alone is not as full or accurate as it might be is not reversible error. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000 (1979).

The trial court need not deliver repetitive instructions. Instructions to the jury must be read as a whole, and if they fairly cover the issues and tender the case to the jury, they are sufficient. St. v. Azure, 181 M 47, 591 P2d 1125 (1979), followed in St. v. Webb, 252 M 248, 828 P2d 1351, 49 St. Rep. 236 (1992), Webb was followed in St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945, 52 St. Rep. 1204 (1995). See also St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

When jury instructions, as a whole, correctly state the law, prejudice is not created because of the refusal of a proposed instruction. St. v. Farnes, 171 M 368, 558 P2d 472 (1976).

A jury instruction that was not a complete statement of the law defining manslaughter was not reversible error as the whole of the law on a subject cannot be given in one instruction. In determining the effect of given instructions, all instructions must be considered as a whole to determine if they fairly tender the case to the jury. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389 (1975).

Instructions must be considered as a whole and, if they fairly tender the case to the jury, the fact that one or more of the instructions standing alone is not as full or accurate as it might have been is not reversible error. St. v. Watson, 144 M 576, 398 P2d 949 (1965).

In determining whether an instruction is erroneous, the charge as a whole must be considered. St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

Instruction Not Offered at Trial as Improper Issue on Appeal: Where error is alleged for failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of misdemeanor theft, the instruction must have been offered at the trial court level. The Supreme Court will not rule on issues not presented to the trial court. St. v. Harvey, 184 M 423, 603 P2d 661 (1979).

Objection to Instruction — Appeal: Defense counsel's failure to raise a specific objection alleged later on appeal precluded defendant from assigning error to an instruction objected to on another ground. St. v. Murphy, 174 M 307, 570 P2d 1103 (1977).

Inadequate Instructions: When the jury was inadequately instructed on the applicable law and returned inconsistent and legally unsupportable verdicts, the judgments of conviction were reversed and causes remanded for new trials. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 174 M 174, 569 P2d 383 (1977).

Withdrawal of Instruction: A court may withdraw an instruction after submission to the jury if the instruction is not a required instruction. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Instructions Coercive to Minority Members of Jury: A jury instruction instructing jurors of their duty to render a verdict was not objectionably coercive, did not mandate a minority juror to reexamine his views, and was not an instruction to continue deliberations until a unanimous verdict was reached. St. v. Cline, 170 M 520, 555 P2d 724 (1976). See also St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007).

Oral Instructions by Bailiff: When the jury was confused as to whether or not to sign three of the charges the jury had voted unanimously to acquit defendant of and requested the bailiff to convey a question to the judge for clarification, the oral instructions to the jury by the bailiff to sign only one of the charges not only violated the proscription against oral jury instructions but was patently prejudicial error as the defendant's attorney was not notified or present and had no way to protect his client from the jury's confusion. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976).

Requirement That Instructions Be Written:

The requirement that offered instructions be in writing is mandatory to preserve the issue for appeal; and, when the defendant failed to offer an instruction in writing, the appeal was lost. St. v. Radi, 168 M 320, 542 P2d 1206 (1975).

The court held that the explanations made were not instructions on the law of the case and that, therefore, prejudicial error was not committed in making them orally. St. v. Kennedy, 82 M 165, 266 P 386 (1928).

In the absence of a waiver by the parties, it is imperative that all instructions be submitted to the jury in writing. St. v. Tudor, 47 M 185, 131 P 632 (1913).

If a charge is not in writing when delivered to the jury, or is not read to the jury as written, it is an oral charge. St. v. Fisher, 23 M 540, 59 P 919 (1900).

A statute requiring written instructions in a criminal action is mandatory, and the violation thereof is reversible error. St. v. Fisher, 23 M 540, 59 P 919 (1900).

Mere silence of the accused or his counsel is not equivalent to a consent to the giving of oral instructions. St. v. Fisher, 23 M 540, 59 P 919 (1900).

Instructions When Facts Weak: The trial court was bound to instruct the jury on manslaughter despite the fact that the court may have considered the evidence in support of manslaughter weak and inconclusive since the weight to be given the evidence was a question for the jury. St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973).

Harmless Error — Inaccurate Instructions: Instructing the jury on assault by willfully inflicting grievous bodily harm when the defendant had been charged with assault with intent to prevent or resist his lawful detention or apprehension was harmless error because the evidence conclusively demonstrated the defendant's guilt of the offense charged. St. v. Jones, 161 M 117, 505 P2d 97 (1973).

Sufficiency of Objection:

An objection to an instruction cannot state merely that the instruction is not the law but must state specifically wherein the instruction is insufficient or what particular clause is objected to. St. v. Schleining, 146 M 1, 403 P2d 625 (1965).

When the defendant sought an appeal from his conviction for robbery on the ground that the instructions to the jury were incomplete, it was incumbent on the defendant to request more specific instructions at the time of trial and failure to do so did not furnish grounds for reversible error. St. v. Watson, 144 M 576, 398 P2d 949 (1965).

Any error in giving instructions is not available to appellants on appeal when the record shows no objections made by the appellants. St. v. Holt, 121 M 459, 194 P2d 651 (1948).

An objection to an instruction that "it is repetitious and not a correct statement of the law; it is not applicable to the facts in this case" did not comply with the predecessor section. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

An objection made at the settlement of the instructions in a criminal case that a certain paragraph thereof "is not applicable to the facts of this case" is insufficient to warrant review of the alleged errors. St. v. McClain, 76 M 351, 246 P 956 (1926).

Review of Instructions: Even though the Supreme Court may not review instructions which were not given, it may examine the instructions which were given for the purpose of determining whether or not the jury was properly instructed. Failure to instruct in certain particulars cannot be assigned as error when the trial court has properly covered the issues since, in the absence of request for instructions, there is no ruling to review. St. v. Watson, 144 M 576, 398 P2d 949 (1965).

Erroneous Instruction — No Prejudice: Erroneous instructions are not cause for reversal in the absence of any prejudice. St. v. Hay, 120 M 573, 194 P2d 232 (1948).

Duty of Court to Instruct: The defendant introduced testimony tending to show that "prior to the occasion in question" his reputation for "truth and veracity" in the community in which he lived was good, and his counsel offered an instruction on the subject. This the court refused, and it did not give any instruction on that phase of the case. Whether the trial court was of the opinion that the offered instruction was not good or that the defendant was not entitled to an instruction upon the subject, the record does not disclose. Upon the evidence introduced, the defendant was entitled upon his request to the benefit of a proper instruction upon the subject. The trial court is required to instruct a jury upon all matters of law necessary for its information in rendering a verdict. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Improper Oral Instructions: After retiring to the jury room to deliberate, the jury returned, asking the court whether two instructions given were conflicting. The court, in the absence of the defendant though in the presence of his attorney, orally instructed the jury to disregard one of them and withdrew it. The Supreme Court held that withdrawing the instruction and directing the jury to disregard it was instructing the jury orally, constituting reversible error. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Name of County Attorney on Instructions: Requested instructions are required to be signed merely for the purpose of identification, to be used by the court in making up its charge to the jury. It is an irregularity but not a reversible error for the court to permit the name and official title of the County Attorney to be placed on instructions requested by him and given to the jury. St. v. Martin, 29 M 273, 74 P 725 (1903).

REPETITIOUS INSTRUCTIONS

Instructions on Presumption of Innocence and Deliberation Properly Refused: The District Court properly refused defendant's instructions on presumption of innocence and deliberation because they were repetitive, conflicted with the instructions already approved by the court, and were redundant. St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992).

Repetitive Instruction on Burden of Proof Rejected — No Error: The District Court need not give repetitious instruction or instruct on every nuance of a theory of a defense. St. v. Van Haele, 207 M 162, 675 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1964 (1983).

Standard Self-Defense Instruction Given — Second Instruction Tailored to Facts Improper: In aggravated assault trial, the 9th instruction fully set forth the elements of self-defense and the 10th instruction related to self-defense by one assaulted with fists, as defendant claimed he had been. The 10th instruction was repetitious and may have placed undue emphasis on the requirements for self-defense. On remand following reversal on another issue, the court recommended that the repetitious instruction not be given. St. v. White, 202 M 491, 658 P2d 1111, 40 St. Rep. 235 (1983).

Substance of Offered Instruction Already Covered — No Error: Defendant contended it was error for the District Court to refuse to give a jury instruction he offered detailing factors the jury should consider in determining the reliability of his admissions. The substance of the refused instruction was adequately covered by another instruction. The court held that where the jury is adequately instructed, no error occurs for failure to give a party's proposed instruction which is already covered. St. v. Lapp, 202 M 327, 658 P2d 400, 40 St. Rep. 120 (1983).

Refusal of Instruction on Credibility of Eyewitness Identification — Subject Already Adequately Covered: In a prosecution for theft by accountability in which the defendant's conviction was based in part upon eyewitness identification, the trial court did not err in refusing the defendant's instruction offered on the credibility of eyewitness identifications. By another instruction, the jury was properly and adequately instructed on the credibility of all witnesses, including the eyewitness. Fingerprint evidence was also sufficiently supportive of the eyewitness' testimony to amply justify the refusal of the offered instruction. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981), followed in St. v. Hall, 244 M 161, 797 P2d 183, 47 St. Rep. 1501 (1990).

Refusal of Perjury Instruction Already Adequately Covered: Where the defendant was convicted of felony murder, aggravated kidnapping, and robbery partially upon the testimony of former felons, it was not prejudicial error for the trial court to refuse the defendant's instruction relating to perjury. The Supreme Court held citing St. v. Sullivan & DePue, 182 M 66, 595 P2d 372 (1979), that refusal to give an offered instruction on a subject already adequately covered by another instruction is not prejudicial error. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Several Instructions on Same Matter: The trial judge did not err in giving five instructions to the jury which were in part repetitious on the matter of conspiracy since the number of fact situations to be covered required them and, while fewer instructions possibly would have been sufficient, they might have been difficult for the jury to understand. St. v. Schleining, 146 M 1, 403 P2d 625 (1965).

INSTRUCTIONS ON INFERENCES AND PRESUMPTIONS

No Error in Refusal to Instruct Jury That Acquittal Required if Evidence Supportive of Either Guilt or Innocence: At Misner's deliberate homicide trial, Misner cited St. v. Sheriff, 188 M 26, 610 P2d 1157 (1980), in proposing a jury instruction stating that when a jury finds two interpretations of the evidence to be equally reasonable, one of which points to the defendant's guilt and the other to innocence, the jury must accept the interpretation that points to innocence. The trial court rejected the instruction, and on appeal, Misner asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Sheriff is no longer good law on this point. The correct rule, as set out in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005), is that when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one of which supports guilt and the other innocence, it is the function of the trier of fact to determine which is most reasonable. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007).

Failure to Give Defendant's Instruction on Testimony of Informants Not Erroneous: At a homicide trial, DuBray offered a jury instruction that would have required the jury to determine whether the testimony of each of several informants had been affected by the witness's self-interest, by any agreement with the state, by the witness's own interest in the outcome of the case, or by prejudice against DuBray, citing St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037 (1999). The trial court refused that cautionary instruction and gave one offered by the state instead, consistent with St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945 (1995), which adequately addressed the credibility of informants, "witness motive, bias or prejudice, and bad character for truthfulness". On appeal, DuBray contended that without his proposed instruction, the jury instructions were incomplete. The Supreme Court noted that Grimes and Long were not inconsistent and that the jury instruction that was given fully and fairly instructed the jury. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003).

Jury Instruction Regarding False Exculpatory Statements Not to Be Given — Fabrication Instruction Improper but Not Prejudicial: During Nelson's trial on five felony charges, the trial court gave the jury an instruction allowing consideration of any showing of fabrication by Nelson as a circumstance tending to prove a consciousness of guilt, although not proof of guilt itself. Nelson argued that the instruction allowed improper comment on his credibility by interjecting argument into the court's instructions. The Supreme Court agreed. Citing the Ninth Circuit Model Jury Instruction Committee's recommendation, the court held that an instruction concerning false exculpatory statements should not be given, and expressly disapproved the use of such instructions in future trials. If evidence permits an adverse inference on statements by a defendant, counsel should be allowed to make arguments accordingly. General instructions on credibility of witnesses should suffice in most instances, obviating the need for more specific instructions. Here, in addition to the fabrication instruction, the trial court also provided a general jury instruction regarding the credibility of witnesses. The jury was free to reject Nelson's story and was entitled to accept all or part of the other key witnesses' testimony, so Nelson was not prejudiced by the giving of the fabrication instruction. St. v. Nelson, 2002 MT 122, 310 M 71, 48 P3d 739 (2002). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999).

Ineffective Assistance Claims Denied — No Prejudice Shown Under Strickland Test: Applying the Strickland test for determining effectiveness of counsel, the Supreme Court dismissed defendant's claims that he was ineffectively represented at trial, during the penalty phase proceedings, and during the course of direct appeal, including claims based on: (1) failure to object to prosecutor's statements that defendant was intoxicated at the time of the crime, when that was in fact true, and to object to an intoxication instruction that was based on statutory language; (2) failure to object to closing arguments during which the prosecutor portrayed himself as the victim and narrated in the first person (following U.S. v. Necoechea, 986 F2d 1273 (9th Cir. 1993)); (3) failure to object to the lack of corroborating evidence regarding a witness's testimony when the objection lacked merit and would have been properly overruled (following St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028 (1993)); (4) failure to investigate and pursue a mental defect defense after defendant's own psychologist of choice found him capable of going to trial (see Harris v. Vasquez, 949 F2d 1497 (9th Cir. 1990)); (5) failure to move for a substitute judge when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed with another judge presiding; (6) failure to request a change of venue absent evidence of juror bias and failure to adequately voir dire the jury when there was no reasonable probability that the outcome of the trial would have differed had voir dire been conducted more thoroughly; (7) ineffectiveness in investigating a witness's background when counsel's investigation fell within the wide range of competent assistance; (8) failure to investigate defendant's suicide attempt; (9) failure to object to certain jury instructions allowing inference of the existence of the requisite mental state from the acts of the accused (following St. v. Cowan, 260 M 510, 861 P2d 884 (1993)); (10) failure to object to instructions setting out the elements of aggravated kidnapping when defendant did not specify which of the alternatives in the instruction were objectionable (following Schad v. Ariz., 501 US 624, 115 L Ed 2d 555, 111 S Ct 2491 (1991)); (11) failure to object to the absence of Native Americans on the jury when, given recent census data, counsel could not have demonstrated that Native Americans were underrepresented on the panel; and (12) failure to object to the presence of armed officers in the courtroom (following Holbrook v. Flynn, 475 US 560, 89 L Ed 2d 525, 106 S Ct 1340 (1986)). Kills On Top v. St., 273 M 32, 901 P2d 1368, 52 St. Rep. 608 (1995).

Reference to Name of Accomplice Unnecessary in Instruction on Accomplice Testimony: Defendant contended the jury instruction on accomplice testimony was inadequate because it did not identify by name the parties who were accomplices and whose testimony should be viewed with distrust. However, the Supreme Court found no requirement that an instruction on accomplice testimony refer by name to the accomplice, noting that whether a witness is an accomplice within the meaning of the law may be a factual question for the jury. St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Evidence of Flight Instruction Proper: Defendant failed to appear on the first day of his trial, but appeared the next day with an implausible story to explain his nonappearance. An evidence of flight instruction by the trial court was therefore proper. A jury is allowed to infer a consciousness of guilt from evidence of defendant's flight either to avoid arrest or prosecution (citing St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278, 44 St. Rep. 597 (1987)). Although mere failure to appear does not support the instruction, the failure to appear coupled with the implausible excuse does. St. v. Burk, 234 M 119, 761 P2d 825, 45 St. Rep. 1777 (1988), followed in St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993), Byers was overruled in part in St. v. Egelhoff, 272 M 114, 900 P2d 260, 52 St. Rep. 548 (1995).

Prior Inconsistent Statements: No error was committed by the District Court when it refused to add to a jury instruction that stated, "Every witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be repelled by the manner in which he testified, by the character of his testimony, or by evidence affecting his reputation for truth, honesty, integrity, or his motives or by contradictory evidence." the following redundant sentence: "Furthermore, this presumption may be rebutted by evidence that the witness has made, at other times, statements inconsistent with his present testimony." St. v. Sanderson, 214 M 437, 692 P2d 479, 42 St. Rep. 94 (1985).

Intent Disputed — Improper to Conclude Beyond Reasonable Doubt That Sandstrom Instruction Was Harmless Error: If intent was a disputed issue at trial, a reviewing court could not rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction was harmless error and could not have tainted a jury verdict, even if the evidence of intent was overwhelming. The appropriate inquiry is whether any reasonable juror could have given the presumption raised by the instruction persuasion-shifting or conclusive effect. [Annotator's Note: See McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981), apparently holding to the contrary.] In re Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Instruction on Acting "Knowingly" — Inference Permitted: In deliberate homicide case, the court instructed the jury that one acts knowingly with respect to conduct or a circumstance described by a statute defining an offense when he is aware of his conduct or that the circumstance exists and that he acts knowingly with respect to the result of conduct described by a statute defining an offense when he is aware that it is highly probable that such result will be caused by his conduct. The court also gave an instruction that if the jury found that defendant committed a homicide and that no circumstances of mitigation, excuse, or justification appeared, the jury could infer that the homicide was committed knowingly or purposely. Neither instruction had the effect of allocating to defendant some part of the State's burden of proof through use of a presumption or contained a conclusive presumption. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Sandstrom Instruction With Statement Presumption Disputable — Intent Contested: Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: "The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant's claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Jury Instruction With Permissive Inference Proper: The defendant was charged with burglary after kicking in the door of a bar at 3:00 a.m. The trial court instructed the jury ". . . if you find that the defendant was unlawfully in the Wagon Wheel Bar in the nighttime you may or may not infer, as you find the evidence to be, that he was there for the purpose of committing a theft." Because the instruction was clearly worded as a permissive inference, it was proper. St. v. Welling, 199 M 135, 647 P2d 852, 39 St. Rep. 1215 (1982).

"May Infer" Rather Than "Must Presume" Not a Sandstrom Instruction: A jury instruction that uses "may infer" rather than the "Sandstrom-like" language of "must presume" is not mandatory and does not shift the burden of proof to the defendant. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982), followed in St. v. Charlo, 226 M 213, 735 P2d 278, 44 St. Rep. 597 (1987).

Sandstrom Instruction — Nonmandatory Charge Not Shifting Burden: In defendant's trial on the charge of robbery, the jury was instructed substantially as follows: "in order to constitute the offense charged, it is necessary to prove the alleged intent. Intent need not be proved by direct and positive testimony but may be inferred from the evidence if there are any facts proved that satisfy the jury of its existence. The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This latter presumption is a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The court found that this instruction could not be interpreted by any juror to be mandatory in nature and did not shift the burden of going forward with the evidence or the burden of persuasion. Spurlock v. Risley, 520 F. Supp. 135, 38 St. Rep. 1339 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Sandstrom Instruction Allowing Permissive Inference — Not Conclusive Presumption: A "Sandstrom-type" instruction was given at petitioner's trial, which resulted in his conviction on seven counts of armed robbery and one count of assault. No objection to the instruction was made at the trial, but the Supreme Court reviewed the instruction under the "plain error" rule. Petitioner contended that the instruction either shifts the burden of proof on the issue of intent from the State to the defendant or constitutes a presumption against the defendant, either of which is constitutionally impermissible under Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979). The instruction given was a permissive inference and not a conclusive presumption. The questioned instruction was not a "naked" presumption as in Sandstrom; the instructions as a whole made it abundantly clear that the State bears the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every essential element of the crimes of which defendant was charged. The court found that the error, if any, was harmless. Parker v. Crist, 190 M 376, 621 P2d 484, 37 St. Rep. 2048 (1980).

Sandstrom Instruction — Not Harmless: Martinez was charged with theft of a stereo owned by Polotto. Polotto told the police that he had not given anyone permission to take his stereo. On cross-examination Polotto testified that he ratified the taking after he found out that the stereo was being sold to raise his bail money. There was also testimony that Martinez was selling the stereo for money to get out of town. The jury was given the Sandstrom instruction. The element of intent was one of the principal issues at trial and there was no overwhelming evidence of Martinez's intent. As a result, the use of the instruction cannot be considered harmless. Conviction was reversed and a new trial ordered. St. v. Martinez, 188 M 271, 613 P2d 974 (1980).

Sandstrom Instruction — Not Unconstitutional: An instruction, permissive in character, that the jury may infer that a "person ordinarily intends the natural and probable consequences of acts knowingly done, knowingly omitted, purposely done, or purposely omitted" from which it appears that the connection between the inference that the jury is permitted to draw and the proven facts upon which the inference must be based is both reasonable and logical is not unconstitutional under Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979), since the instruction does not invade the factfinding duty of the jury or allocate the burden of proof between the defendant and the state. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

"Sandstrom" Instruction as Not Violating Federal "Plain Error" Rule: The use of the instruction "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act", which was declared invalid in Sandstrom v. U.S., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979), did not violate the federal "plain error" rule since it was not highly probable that the error materially affected the verdict. The instructions given made it clear that the State was obligated to prove every material fact beyond a reasonable doubt. Also, the instruction had little relevance in this case since the defendant denied that he had voluntarily fired a rifle at the victim. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

"Sandstrom" Instruction — Presumption of Intent: The jury in a deliberate homicide case was instructed that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts". The U.S. Supreme Court determined that this instruction denied a defendant the constitutional right to a jury determination of proof beyond a reasonable doubt of all elements of the offense. The case was remanded to the Montana Supreme Court to determine if the instruction constituted harmless error. To find harmless error, the Supreme Court must be able to assert that the offensive instruction could not reasonably have contributed to the jury verdict. The court cannot make this assertion. The case is remanded to the District Court for retrial. St. v. Sandstrom, 184 M 391, 603 P2d 244 (1979).

LESSER INCLUDED OFFENSE INSTRUCTIONS

No Prejudice Arising From Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Reversal Unwarranted: Potter was charged with aggravated assault. At trial, the District Court included two lesser included offense instructions for attempted aggravated assault and assault, and Potter objected to including the attempted aggravated assault instruction. The jury returned a guilty verdict on the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, Potter contended that the court erred by instructing the jury on attempted aggravated assault because attempted aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. However, the jury never reached the question of whether Potter committed the lesser offense, so Potter was not prejudiced by inclusion of the attempted aggravated assault instruction. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Misdemeanor Assault Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Assault — Denial of Lesser Included Offense Instruction Not Error: In a sexual assault trial, Cameron requested a jury instruction that misdemeanor assault was a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The request was denied. On appeal, Cameron raised several arguments regarding the lesser included offense and claimed error in denial of the instruction. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. The court examined the elements of both offenses and concluded that the elements of misdemeanor assault and sexual assault are not similar and do not overlap. Thus, misdemeanor assault is not a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The jury was therefore properly instructed, and the sexual assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Cameron, 2005 MT 32, 326 M 51, 106 P3d 1189 (2005), followed in St. v. Gerstner, 2009 MT 303, 353 M 86, 219 P3d 866 (2009).

Improper Jury Instructions — Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Verdict Without First Finding Guilt of Deliberate Homicide — Reversible Error: Demontiney was charged with deliberate homicide. On the first morning of trial, counsel exchanged jury instructions, and neither party's instructions included mitigated deliberate homicide. Following 3 days of testimony, the state proposed an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide, arguing that evidence introduced at trial obligated the state to offer the instruction. The trial court agreed and stated that the jury would be instructed on mitigated deliberate homicide. Consistent with St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202 (2000), the state prepared instructions and a verdict form incorporating the "failure to agree" concept, directing the jury to consider all evidence relating to both the greater and lesser charges before considering the verdict on the greater charge. Nevertheless, the trial court's instructions and verdict form did not match those offered by either party. Rather, the trial court instructed the jury that it should first consider the deliberate homicide charge, and if it reached a not guilty verdict or was unable to reach a verdict on that charge, it was then to consider the mitigated deliberate homicide charge. The jury found Demontiney not guilty of deliberate homicide, but guilty of mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court found that the jury instructions were not a full and fair instruction on the applicable law. The District Court was bound by Scarborough, whether the court agreed with that decision or not. A finding of guilt on mitigated deliberate homicide requires a finding of every element of deliberate homicide, plus an additional finding of extreme mental or emotional stress. Thus, the jury's verdict was logically impossible, prejudicing Demontiney, and the jury instructions constituted reversible error. The verdict was vacated, and Demontiney was immediately discharged. (See 2003 amendment to 45-5-103.) Demontiney v. District Court, 2002 MT 161, 310 M 406, 51 P3d 476 (2002).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Offer "Failure to Agree" Instruction — Prejudice Warranting Remand for New Trial: At Rogers' trial for attempted sexual intercourse without consent and felony assault, the District Court provided jury instructions with misdemeanor sexual assault and misdemeanor assault as lesser included offenses. Rogers' attorney requested the "acquittal first" instruction, which provided that the jury was not to consider the lesser included offenses unless they first acquitted on the greater offenses. Rogers contended that the failure of the attorney to request the "failure to agree" instruction allowed under 46-16-607, which provides that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if it is unable to reach a verdict on the greater offense, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed. The "failure to agree" instruction was drafted to protect against the serious risk identified in U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984), which arises when jurors harboring a doubt as to defendant's guilt of the greater offense, but at the same time convinced that defendant had committed some offense, might wrongly yield to the majority and convict of the greater offense rather than not convict at all. The failure to offer this potentially beneficial instruction, when that failure is not part of counsel's trial strategy, is an error so serious that it falls outside the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases. Thus, when sufficient facts exist to support a conviction for a lesser included offense, defense counsel must offer the "failure to agree" instruction unless there is a tactical reason for not doing so, and failure to offer the instruction in such cases is prejudicial error. St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Failure to Offer Alternative Jury Instruction on Aggravated Assault When Defendant Maintains Innocence on All Charges Not Considered Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: Despite a daunting evidentiary record of Aliff's commission of a rape and attempted murder, he maintained his innocence and claimed that he was home with his wife while the victim was fighting for her life. Aliff contended on appeal that he received ineffective assistance of counsel because no alternative jury instruction was offered regarding the offense of aggravated assault. However, Aliff never claimed that he intended only to assault the victim, but rather that he did not commit the crimes for which he was charged or any other offense in connection with the incident. Counsel did not provide inadequate assistance by failing to offer an instruction that was inconsistent with the defense. The instructions that were actually offered were based on trial strategy and did not stem from neglect or ignorance. Counsel's performance was not deficient in any way, and judgment was affirmed. St. v. Aliff, 2001 MT 52, 304 M 310, 21 P3d 624 (2001).

Gopher Rule Relates to Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses, Not Alternative Offenses: Beavers was charged with criminal endangerment, but maintained that he was entitled to a jury instruction on reckless driving as an alternative theory under the rule in St. v. Gopher, 194 M 227, 633 P2d 1195, 38 St. Rep. 1521 (1981), that a defendant is entitled to an instruction to cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence. However, Gopher applies only to instructions on lesser included offenses, not alternative offenses. The rule of law applied to alternative offenses is that of prosecutorial discretion. When the facts support a possible charge of more than one crime, the crime charged is a matter of prosecutorial discretion. (See St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).) Beavers was properly disallowed arguing an alternative offense theory that involved an offense that was not a lesser included offense of the offense charged. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Lesser Included Offense Must Constitute Included Offense of Crime Charged: A criminal defendant is entitled to jury instructions that cover every issue or theory having support in the evidence, including an instruction on a lesser included offense when one of the parties requests it and when the record contains evidence from which the jury could rationally find defendant guilty of the lesser included offense and acquit of the greater. However, in order for the District Court to instruct the jury on a lesser included offense, the offense must actually constitute an included offense of the crime charged. To make the determination, the Supreme Court will apply the test in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), and consider the statutory definitions of the offenses involved, in light of the definitions in 46-1-202. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Reckless Driving Not Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Endangerment: Reckless driving is a distinct offense and not an included offense of criminal endangerment. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999), following Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932).

Assault Lesser Included Offense of Deliberate Homicide — Error to Refuse Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. At trial, the court refused the defendant's proposed jury instruction on the offense of assault. The Supreme Court determined that as a matter of law, under the express terms of 46-1-202, assault is an included offense of the crime of deliberate homicide. When there was some evidence supporting a defendant's theory that the defendant was guilty of assault but not murder, the District Court erred in refusing the proposed jury instruction on assault as a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide. St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688, 54 St. Rep. 1194 (1997).

Failure to Request Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Tactical Decision Supported by Defendant: The District Court properly denied a petition for postconviction relief based on claimed ineffective assistance of counsel in that counsel did not request an instruction that misdemeanor sexual assault was a lesser included offense of the charged offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Counsel's decision to not offer the instruction was a tactical one based on all the facts and on defendant's strident proclamations of innocence. Counsel stated that he believed that he had put on a strong defense and that he and defendant decided to force the jury to either convict or acquit on the charged offense. The courts will not second guess the tactical and strategic decisions of counsel. St. v. Sheppard, 270 M 122, 890 P2d 754, 52 St. Rep. 106 (1995).

Failure to State Specific Grounds for Objection to Instruction on Lesser Included Offense as Waiver of Appeal: At the settlement conference for jury instructions, the state proposed a series of instructions that sought to include sexual assault as a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. Defense counsel objected to the giving of the instruction but did not state specific reasons for the objection. The absence of a proper objection constituted waiver of the objection for appeal purposes, and thus the lesser included offense issue was not preserved for appeal. St. v. Ogle, 255 M 246, 841 P2d 1133, 49 St. Rep. 932 (1992).

Sua Sponte Instruction on Lesser Included Offense Not Required by Law or Due Process: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in not giving an instruction of its own accord on the lesser offense of misdemeanor sexual assault following his trial for felony sexual intercourse without consent when a request for the instruction was never made by the defense. Although a defendant has a right to a lesser included offense jury instruction if requested, mandatory instruction on lesser offenses on the judge's own accord is inconsistent with Montana law and the public policy of allowing trial counsel to conduct the case according to strategy and could result in unfair surprise to both the defense and the prosecution. Moreover, a District Court's failure to instruct the jury sua sponte on a lesser included offense does not constitute deprivation of a defendant's right to due process. St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370, 49 St. Rep. 382 (1992), followed in St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 87, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992), St. v. Leyba, 276 M 45, 915 P2d 794, 53 St. Rep. 7 (1996), and St. v. Gunderson, 282 M 183, 936 P2d 804, 54 St. Rep. 283 (1997).

Giving of "Acquittal First" Versus "Failure to Agree" Instruction: The defendant contended that if a defendant requests a "failure to agree" instruction, giving an "acquittal first" instruction is error. The Supreme Court adopted the view held by other jurisdictions that under the "failure to agree" instruction, the jury could convict a defendant of the lesser included offense without actually finding the defendant not guilty of the greater offense. In such a case, regardless of the jury's actual findings regarding the greater offense, the defendant would be found not guilty of its commission and a retrial on the greater offense would be barred under settled double jeopardy principles. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

No Evidence in Record to Warrant Jury Instruction on Mitigating Circumstances: Defendant contended District Court erred in refusing to give jury instructions on the lesser offense of mitigated deliberate homicide. On appeal, the Supreme Court found no error in refusing to instruct for two reasons: (1) the only potentially mitigating circumstance presented at trial concerned defendant's use of alcohol on the night in question; however, in St. v. White, 194 M 421, 632 P2d 1118, 38 St. Rep. 1417 (1981), the court held that voluntary intoxication alone was insufficient to show the extreme mental or emotional stress which would mitigate deliberate homicide charges; and (2) since defendant's main defense at trial was alibi, he was entitled either to an acquittal or to be found guilty, and if the jury believed his testimony, it would have been inconsistent with finding defendant guilty of mitigated deliberate homicide. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Aggravated Assault — Assault and Resisting Arrest Co-Equal Lesser Included Offenses Under the Facts: When a Department of Highways (now Department of Transportation) enforcement officer stopped a truck to weigh it, the passenger unloaded it against officer's orders, threatened the officer with a chain binder, and drove away after being told he was under arrest. In light of these facts, it was not reversible error to instruct the jury that if the defendant was not found guilty of aggravated assault he could be found guilty of the lesser offense of assault, instead of instructing the jury that he could be found guilty of the lesser included offense of resisting arrest. The instruction amply covered defendant's version of the event as well as the instruction he requested would have done. St. v. Thornton, 218 M 317, 708 P2d 273, 42 St. Rep. 1614 (1985).

Unsworn Falsification to Authorities — Not Lesser Included Offense of Criminal Mischief by Destroying Property to Defraud Insurer: In trial for criminal mischief for knowingly or purposely damaging or destroying property with the intent to defraud an insurer, it was not error to refuse to give defendant's requested instruction on the alleged lesser included offense of unsworn falsification to authorities. The elements of the two offenses were separate and distinct and had little in common, and the elements of unsworn falsification to authorities do not have to be proved to establish criminal mischief. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Value of Stolen Property at Issue — Error in Refusal of Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: Where the defendant had been charged with the felony theft of a guitar alleged to have a value of more than $150, the District Court erred in refusing an instruction requiring the jury to convict the defendant of the lesser included offense of misdemeanor theft if they found the value of the guitar to be less than $150 (raised to $300 by 1983 amendment). Under the rationale of St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973), the instruction should have been given because the weight of the evidence of value of the guitar was a question for the jury. St. v. Young, 206 M 19, 669 P2d 239, 40 St. Rep. 1474 (1983).

Failure to Instruct on Lesser Included Offense — Record to Contain Evidence of Lesser Included Offense: After a trial on a charge of deliberate homicide during which no evidence had been presented regarding the nature or extent of defendant's mental condition, the District Court refused defendant's request for an instruction to the jury on the charge of mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that while defendant was correct in his theory that if any evidence exists in the record which would permit the jury to find a defendant guilty of a lesser included offense and acquit him of a greater offense, then he is entitled to instruction on the lesser included offense; however, in this case, defendant's theory was not supported by the factual record. St. v. Norgaard, 201 M 165, 653 P2d 483, 39 St. Rep. 2028 (1982).

Failure to Instruct on Lesser Included Offense — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: Failure of the trial court to instruct the jury on the lesser included offenses of mitigated and negligent homicide does not present a federal question cognizable in a federal habeas corpus proceeding. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Resisting Arrest — Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Assault: It was reversible error to refuse an instruction that resisting arrest was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault (of a peace officer), since the facts satisfied the necessary elements of both offenses. St. v. Gopher, 194 M 227, 633 P2d 1195, 38 St. Rep. 1521 (1981).

Lesser Included Offenses — Test for Instructions:

Defendant, convicted of burglary and theft, alleged error in the failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of criminal trespass. The Supreme Court noted the fundamental rule that the defendant is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense if the evidence would enable the jury rationally to find him guilty of a lesser offense and to acquit him of the greater. However, if the evidence is such to show that the defendant is either guilty of the offense charged or entitled to an acquittal, the District Court does not err by refusing to instruct as to the lesser included offense. Once the determination was made that the mobile home was an occupied structure within the meaning of the statute, the evidence was not in dispute and the defendant was either guilty of burglary or entitled to an acquittal. Therefore, the judge acted correctly in not giving the instruction on the lesser included offense. St. v. Kyle, 189 M 38, 614 P2d 1059 (1980), followed in St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990).

Assuming arguendo that negligent homicide is a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide, the court considered whether or not an instruction on negligent homicide should have been given at trial. The rule is that an instruction on a lesser included offense is required where there is some evidence to support the lesser included offense; that is, any evidence which would permit the jury rationally to find him guilty of a lesser offense and acquit him of a greater. The court agreed with the trial court that, considering that death by manual strangulation takes 2 to 3 minutes (or longer if the victim struggles), it was inconceivable how the death could have occurred as a result of negligence. Therefore, the instruction was properly refused. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980).

Restricting Consideration of Lesser Offense: While under former law the offense of kidnapping included the minor offenses of false imprisonment and assault in the third degree, the trial court did not need to so formulate the charge that the jury could find the defendant guilty of a lower offense or of an included offense when the evidence was such as to show that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged or was entitled to an acquittal. St. v. McDonald, 51 M 1, 149 P 279 (1915).

Manslaughter Included in Murder: When under former law there was evidence tending to show that the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter, it was the duty of the trial court to instruct that a verdict for manslaughter could be returned since manslaughter was not a degree of murder. St. v. Shadwell, 26 M 52, 66 P 508 (1901).

INSTRUCTIONS ON ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE

Charge of Single Criminal Act — No Unanimity Instruction Required Absent Possibility of Jury Confusion: In Vernes' attempted deliberate homicide and attempted deliberate homicide by accountability trial, Vernes asserted that a unanimity instruction should have been given to the jury to prevent a conviction occurring as a result of different jurors concluding that Vernes committed different unlawful acts when a single count alleged more than one unlawful act, so that the jury would be required to agree unanimously on specific facts that constituted the elements of each offense. The trial court declined to give a unanimity instruction, and Vernes appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In St. v. Weaver, 1998 MT 167, 290 M 58, 964 P2d 713 (1998), the Supreme Court held that a specific unanimity instruction to the jury was required when different criminal acts were charged in one count. Although different jurors may generally be persuaded by different pieces of evidence, even when they agree on the bottom line, in this case, the state did not charge Vernes in the alternative, but rather brought two charges stemming from a single attack. Thus, jurors were free to determine that different pieces of evidence supported proof of a material step taken by Vernes to carry out the attacks, as long as the jurors unanimously agreed on the same set of facts, so a unanimity instruction was not required. St. v. Vernes, 2006 MT 32, 331 M 129, 130 P3d 169 (2006), followed in St. v. Russell, 2008 MT 417, 347 M 301, 198 P3d 271 (2008).

No Error in Denying and Modifying Jury Instructions on Elements of Theft by Deception: Field contended that the District Court erroneously modified one jury instruction and denied two of Field's requested instructions. The Supreme Court found no error. The amended instruction was covered in another instruction, and Field's proposed instructions regarding agency and the fungibility of money were unrelated to the charge of theft by deception, common scheme. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Field, 2005 MT 181, 328 M 26, 116 P3d 813 (2005).

Burden of Proof — General Jury Instructions on Entrapment: Citing U.S. v. Mkhsian, 5 F3d 1306 (9th Cir. 1993), the Supreme Court emphasized that once evidence of inducement is shown by the defendant, it is the government's burden to prove that the defendant was predisposed to violate the law before the government intervened. The court cautioned against an entrapment instruction containing the phrase "where a person already has the readiness and willingness to engage in a crime, the mere fact that law enforcement officers or their agents provided what appears to be a favorable opportunity is not entrapment". St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994).

Alleged Error in Instruction Given at Defendant's Request: The Supreme Court would not consider an alleged error in an instruction that was given at defendant's request. St. v. Courchene, 256 M 381, 847 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 1035 (1992).

Error to Refuse Instruction That One Cannot Conspire Solely With Government Agent: It is legally impossible for a person to conspire with an undercover government agent to commit a crime. There must be at least two nonagents conspiring between themselves and involved with the agent. It was error to refuse defendant's instruction to that effect. St. v. Shaw, 255 M 298, 843 P2d 316, 49 St. Rep. 1012 (1992).

Instructions on Required Proof of Lack of Consent — Statement of Law: In instructing the jury on the definition of "lack of consent", the District Court included language from 45-5-501, which defines "without consent", and general language from 45-5-511, which includes language applicable to sexual crimes. Defendant contended that the use of the general language improperly diluted the state's burden of proof. However, consistent with St. v. Thompson, 243 M 28, 792 P2d 1103 (1990), the element of force required to find a conviction was properly stated. Because the instruction was a direct statement of law and was consistent with prior case law, defendant was not prejudiced. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Specific Intent as Element of Crime: A defendant charged with deliberate homicide wanted a jury instruction stating that to be convicted, the jury had to find that he acted with the intent to cause death. The Supreme Court held that unless required by statutory language, it is not necessary to prove specific intent as part of the crime. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

Jury Instruction Concerning Elements of Felony Assault (Now Assault With a Weapon) Not Required: In conviction for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) the fact that victim is age 14 or younger and defendant is 18 or older is not an element of the crime but relates to sentencing only, determination of which is the exclusive province of the judge. No jury instruction distinguishing felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and misdemeanor assault is required. St. v. Probert, 221 M 476, 719 P2d 783, 43 St. Rep. 988 (1986).

Intent to Cause Death Instruction: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. On appeal he contended an instruction that said the State must prove defendant "purposely or knowingly performed the act or acts causing the death of Floyd Azure" allowed the jury to convict him if it found he intended to perform the act which caused death rather than intending death as the result of the act. The court held that although the requisite mental state attaches to the result in deliberate homicide cases, the instructions taken as a whole were proper and fairly and accurately presented the case to the jury. The jury could not have convicted defendant unless it found he had performed the act or acts causing Azure's death with the knowledge that he was causing or with the purpose to cause Azure's death. St. v. Weinberger, 204 M 278, 665 P2d 202, 40 St. Rep. 844 (1983), distinguished in In re R.L.S., 1999 MT 34, 293 M 288, 977 P2d 967, 56 St. Rep. 149 (1999).

Failure to Instruct on Elements of Crime — Plain Error: The jury was not instructed on the statutory elements of the crime. The jury's instructions on the defendant's civil remedy, an agister's lien, permitted the inference from his failure to pursue the civil remedy that he was guilty of theft. In granting a new trial, the Supreme Court noted that the issue of jury instructions not offered or objected to at trial, usually a nonappealable issue, was reviewed here to determine if the jury was properly instructed. The failure to instruct on the elements of the crime constituted "plain error". Instructing the jury that each element of the crime had to be proved was insufficient if the elements were not given to the jury as well. St. v. Lundblade, 191 M 526, 625 P2d 545, 38 St. Rep. 441 (1981).

Sufficiency of Instruction as to Offense Charged: The court did not err by not instructing the jury that the items alleged to be false in a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses and falsification of evidence were petitions for workers' compensation settlements filed by the defendant. The jury was adequately apprised of the nature and subject of the charges against the defendant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Instructions as Law of the Case: An instruction stating that in order to convict the defendant of obtaining money or property by false pretenses, the prosecution must prove that the accused received property became the "law of the case". Although the State argued that such proof was unnecessary, a failure to prove that element was a ground for reversal of the conviction. St. v. Cline, 170 M 520, 555 P2d 724 (1976).

INSTRUCTIONS ON DEFENSES

Jury Instruction Denying Intoxication Defense When Defendant Claims Justifiable Use of Force — No Error: Contesting a jury instruction based on 45-2-203 that intoxication was not a defense, McCaslin contended that it was fundamentally unfair for the state to introduce evidence of McCaslin's intoxicated condition to illustrate that McCaslin was too intoxicated to act reasonably in self-defense, rebutting McCaslin's justifiable use of force defense, while on the other hand prohibiting McCaslin from using the inebriated condition as a defense or for determining intent. However, the jury was instructed on: (1) the elements of each offense and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definitions of purposely and knowingly; (3) the ability to infer the existence of a mental state from the acts of an accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with an offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. As a whole, the jury instructions did not prejudicially affect McCaslin's substantial rights, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in giving the contested jury instruction. St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004). See also St. v. Grindheim, 2004 MT 311, 323 M 519, 101 P3d 267 (2004).

Defendant Entitled to Jury Instruction on Defense Theory but Not Stating Arguments of Defense: Bowman asserted District Court error in disallowing a jury instruction that purportedly gave Bowman's theory of his defense. However, Bowman's proposed instruction was a statement of Bowman's version of the facts, not law. A defendant is not entitled to an instruction detailing every nuance of the defense argument or to put defense arguments in jury instructions. Bowman's proposed instruction was properly disallowed. St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004).

Failure to Give Unsupported Accountability Jury Instruction Proper: Hall contended that the District Court erred in refusing to give an accountability instruction in Hall's trial for theft because certain evidence at the crime scene implicated that a witness was an accomplice in the crime, so the jury should have been instructed that the witness's testimony should be viewed with distrust. The Supreme Court disagreed. In this case, the accomplice instruction was inconsistent with Hall's theory of complete innocence, and the witness's testimony established no element of accountability. It is not proper to give an accountability instruction when it is not supported by the evidence and is inconsistent with a defendant's claim of innocence. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Voluntary Intoxication Instruction Not Prejudicial: Following Strauss's negligent homicide trial, the trial court instructed the jury about the scope of an intoxicated person's responsibilities, noting that voluntary intoxication is not a defense to a crime. Strauss asserted that the instruction was given in error and was confusing and prejudicial because Strauss had not claimed intoxication as a defense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Strauss did not raise a valid state constitutional challenge to the instruction, and the argument that the instruction was confusing was mere conjecture. A District Court has broad discretion when instructing a jury, and reversible error occurs only if the instructions prejudicially affect a defendant's substantial rights. Strauss established no prejudice, and the trial court did not err in giving the voluntary intoxication instruction. St. v. Strauss, 2003 MT 195, 317 M 1, 74 P3d 1052 (2003), followed in St. v. Gray, 2004 MT 347, 324 M 334, 102 P3d 1255 (2004). See also St. v. McLaughlin, 2009 MT 211, 351 M 282, 210 P3d 694 (2009), citing Strauss for the holding that a defendant does not necessarily have to raise intoxication as a defense in order for the intoxication instruction to be appropriate.

Adequate Instructions on Use of Force: Claric contended that the trial court erred in giving jury instructions on his defense of justifiable use of force. A defendant is not entitled to have the jury instructed on every nuance of the defendant's theory of the case. The court adequately instructed the jury that Claric was free to act upon his perceptions, if reasonable, even if mistaken, using the instruction previously approved in St. v. Stone, 266 M 345, 880 P2d 1296 (1994). Claric's proposed instruction regarding the defense was repetitious and thus unnecessary. Further, Claric's assertion of court error in not giving an instruction on the reasonable apprehension of harm when the assailant is larger and stronger was misplaced, given the presence of both parties in the court and the jury's ability to observe them, along with Claric's opportunity to argue the issue in closing. St. v. Claric, 271 M 141, 894 P2d 946, 52 St. Rep. 377 (1995). See also St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382 (1992), and St. v. Webb, 252 M 248, 828 P2d 1351 (1992).

Instruction on Proper Burden of Proof for Self-Defense as Cure for Misstatement During Voir Dire: Arlington contended that the prosecutor's misstatement of the law in voir dire as to the burden of proof for self-defense constituted prosecutorial misconduct. Citing St. v. West, 252 M 83, 826 P2d 940 (1992), the Supreme Court noted that any error by the prosecution had been cured by the District Court's admonishment of the jury and a reading of the applicable jury instruction giving correct information on the burden of proof for self-defense. St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Proposed Instruction Covered by Given Instruction: The defendant argued that the lower court erred in not giving the defendant's proposed instruction concerning the burden of proof in a burglary case. The Supreme Court ruled that it was not error to refuse to give the instruction because other instructions given by the court adequately covered the rejected instruction's legal theory. St. v. Floyd, 243 M 269, 790 P2d 475, 47 St. Rep. 720 (1990).

Instruction on Justifiable Use of Force Not Requested but Given — Supporting Evidence — No Error: Neither party requested an instruction on justifiable use of force or self-defense, but the District Court decided to give one. Defendant claimed the instruction lacked evidentiary support and confused the jury with conflicting theories of negligent homicide and self-defense. The Supreme Court found that defendant's testimony describing the victim's statements and his own actions could have led the jury to conclude defendant was not the aggressor. Because the theory was supported in the evidence, giving of the instruction was not error. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep 1901 (1988).

Self-Defense — Judge's Refusal to Give Instruction Without Testimony of Defendant — Not Contrary to Right Against Self-Incrimination: Defendant raised the affirmative defense of self-defense in his trial for homicide. There were no witnesses to the killing other than the defendant. The defendant argued that he could introduce evidence tending to show the decedent was the aggressor by showing his reputation and specific acts of turbulence or violence. It was not error for the District Court to require the defendant to testify as to his own fear or apprehension, based upon the deceased's reputation, to lay a foundation for other witnesses to testify as to the deceased's violence or risk being denied an instruction on self-defense. Neither at that point nor during the trial did defense counsel object to the ruling or assert his client could not be compelled to testify against himself, and it was never asserted, even at appellate argument, that defendant would not have testified except for that ruling. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Jury Instructions on Self-Defense — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: Jury instructions given in a state court trial involve questions of state law. It is only where the instructions rendered the trial fundamentally unfair that a federal question cognizable in a habeas corpus proceeding is presented. Where jury instructions on self-defense contained several phrases that could be read as a misstatement of the law, but when read in their entirety clearly informed the jury, no error of constitutional magnitude was committed. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Incorrect Self-Defense Instruction — Error Not Prejudicial: Although a jury instruction to the effect that absence of justifiable use of force is an element of the crime of deliberate homicide to be proved by the prosecutor is erroneous and the more correct statement of law, which should have been phrased in the jury instruction, is that justification for use of force is an affirmative defense that requires the defendant to produce sufficient evidence before justification for use of force is placed in issue, the District Court did not commit prejudicial error in giving the erroneous instruction since, viewing the instruction as a part of the whole body of instruction, the defendant was not limited from fairly presenting his theory of defense. Nor was omission of defendant's proposed instruction prejudicial error since defendant's instruction was merely repetitive. St. v. Graves, 191 M 81, 622 P2d 203, 38 St. Rep. 9 (1981). (J. Sheehy, specially concurring, sets out the elements, which would be contained in a jury instruction, to be considered by a jury in determining whether the use of force is justified. Additional instructions regarding justification in use of force are suggested.)

"Mere Presence at Scene" Instruction Not Required:

In appealing his conviction for robbery, the defendant claimed that he had been entitled to a jury instruction that "mere presence at or about the scene where a crime is committed does not make one a party to a crime" because his defense involved an admission of being at the scene of the crime but of not being involved except after the fact. The reviewing court concluded that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the trial court's refusal to give this instruction, noting that no authority was cited for this instruction, that the jury instruction fairly covered the issues raised, and that the charge of robbery as well as the jury instructions required the jury to find more than mere presence at the scene of the robbery. Thus, the jury was fully aware, even without the instruction, that mere presence at the scene of a crime was not sufficient to prove criminal involvement. The jury believed that the defendant committed the crime by holding the knife to the store clerk's throat, and the evidence was clearly sufficient to sustain this belief. St. v. Dahl, 190 M 207, 620 P2d 361, 37 St. Rep. 1852 (1980).

The trial court did not err in omitting an instruction to the effect that defendant's proximity to the crime did not, in and of itself, support a finding of guilt where the prosecution's case was based on evidence other than mere presence of the defendant at the scene of the crime. St. v. Sheriff, 190 M 131, 619 P2d 181, 37 St. Rep. 1793 (1980).

Assault — Instruction on Self-Defense: Defendant charged with mitigated deliberate homicide alleged as error the refusal of defendant's offered instruction on self-defense. The defendant argued that because of the expert testimony regarding the intimidating effects on defendant caused by his bizarre relationship with his mother, it was essential that the jury be instructed in terms of the apparent danger which he perceived and not the actual dangers which faced him. The court said that, where counsel is not limited under the instructions given from fairly presenting his defense to the jury, the defendant will not be heard to complain that the court failed to give the many different nuances on a theory of defense that might have been devised. It was therefore not reversible error to refuse the defendant's offered instruction. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121 (1980), following St. v. Reiner, 179 M 239, 587 P2d 950 (1978).

Restitution Not a Defense — Larceny by Bailee: Under former law, a jury instruction stating that in the crime of larceny by a bailee restitution is not a defense when the criminal intent existed at the time of the taking was proper. The crime is complete at the point of taking with the intent to permanently deprive, and restitution is only a defense when the defendant intended to return the property at the time it was taken. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Failure to Instruct Jury to Acquit on Finding of Self-Defense: Defendant charged with deliberate homicide and convicted of the lesser offense of mitigated deliberate homicide was not denied due process by the failure of the court to instruct the jury that if they found that the defendant had acted in self-defense they must acquit him. When viewed with the instructions as a whole, the failure to give the instruction did not render the trial so fundamentally unfair as to deny the defendant due process. United States ex rel. Collins v. Crist, 473 F. Supp. 1354 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Proper Refusal of Proposed Instruction on Accountability: The defendant's proposed instruction on accountability that stated: "You are instructed that some evidence has been introduced tending to show that a person other than the defendant, Alfred Owens, is responsible for the crimes here charged. If, after a consideration of all the evidence, there remains in your minds a reasonable doubt as to who is responsible for the crimes, then it is your duty to acquit." was an incorrect statement of the law. It created the distinct impression that the defendant could not be held responsible for the crimes charged if somebody else actually performed the offensive conduct and was therefore properly refused. The instruction given by the trial court in the language of 45-2-301 and 45-2-302 was a correct presentation of the law on accountability and a proper jury instruction. St. v. Owens, 182 M 338, 597 P2d 72 (1979).

Alibi Defense — Instruction Rejected: The court properly rejected an instruction concerning the defense of alibi since the defendant's case was not founded upon alibi and no notice of such a defense was given. St. v. McGuinn, 177 M 215, 581 P2d 417 (1978).

Instruction on Defense of Threat or Menace: When the defendant was convicted of robbery, the trial court did not commit reversible error in giving no instruction to the jury on the defense of threat or menace since the jury in considering the court's instructions found the allegations of willful commission of the crime proven beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Watson, 144 M 576, 398 P2d 949 (1965).

INSTRUCTIONS ON EVIDENCE AND BURDEN OF PROOF

Failure of Counsel to Request Instruction on Accomplice Testimony Constituting Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Failure of Court to Give Instruction Prejudicial: Kougl was convicted of operating an unlawful clandestine laboratory and subsequently appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel. The state's case was based largely on the testimony on three accomplices. At trial, both the prosecution and defense counsel pointed out to the jury in closing arguments that accomplice testimony should be viewed with suspicion because of the accomplices' criminal conduct and the deals that they cut with the state. However, Kougl's counsel did not request a jury instruction that accomplice testimony ought to be viewed with distrust and that it must be corroborated. Applying the Strickland test for effective assistance of counsel, the Supreme Court found that Kougl's counsel's failure to request the instructions constituted a failure to use the law to strike at the heart of the state's case, and because there was no plausible explanation for not asking for the instructions, counsel's performance was deficient and the first prong of Strickland was satisfied. Further, the trial court failed its duty to instruct the jury on the law, which is a duty that may not be delegated to counsel because what the court tells the jury carries the force of law, while counsel's comments do not. Thus, the second prong of Strickland requiring a showing of prejudice was also satisfied because if the jury had been properly instructed, there was a reasonable probability that it would have arrived at a different outcome. Therefore, Kougl received ineffective assistance of counsel, and Kougl's conviction was reversed. St. v. Kougl, 2004 MT 243, 323 M 6, 97 P3d 1095 (2004), following St. v. Rose, 1998 MT 342, 292 M 350, 972 P2d 321 (1998), and followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P3d 925 (2008).

Jury Instructions on Offense of Stalking Affirmed: Tichenor contended that two jury instructions confused the jury by including references to the fact that Tichenor had been ordered on two occasions to have no contact with the victim. The Supreme Court disagreed. The instructions did not diminish the state's burden of proving every element of the stalking offenses and, as a whole, fully and fairly instructed the jury on the applicable law without prejudicially affecting Tichenor's substantive rights. Tichenor's stalking convictions were affirmed. St. v. Tichenor, 2002 MT 311, 313 M 95, 60 P3d 454 (2002).

Prosecutor's Comments in Response to Defense Counsel's Opening Statement Not Prejudicial: Defense counsel told the jury in opening statements that a witness had made inconsistent statements, referring to a statement given to the investigator for the public defender's office. The investigator was never called, and the theory was not substantiated. The prosecutor referred to the theory in closing, noting that the defense had failed to present the evidence that defense counsel had referred to in opening. Although it is improper to comment on a criminal defendant's failure to testify, it is proper for a prosecutor to direct the jury's attention to facts in issue that could be controverted by persons other than the defendant. The prosecutor was entitled to comment on the theory suggested by defense counsel because the theory lacked evidentiary support. The District Court did not err in refusing to grant a mistrial on grounds of prosecutorial comments because the comments were plainly in response to defense counsel's opening statements. St. v. Soraich, 1999 MT 87, 294 M 173, 979 P2d 206, 56 St. Rep. 370 (1999).

Instruction on Admissions and Confessions Appropriate: At trial for robbery, the court allowed the statements made by the defendant to the investigating officer after the robbery that "I want it to be known that I did not have a gun" and that the defendant could not "make it" in the outside world. On appeal, the defendant asserted that the District Court improperly instructed the jury on admissions and confessions. The Supreme Court held that the instruction was a correct statement of the law and that the lower court did not err in instructing the jury on the law applicable to admissions. St. v. Craig, 274 M 140, 906 P2d 683, 52 St. Rep. 1158 (1995).

Instruction That Date of Offense Need Not Be Exact — Alibi Defense: The court instructed the jury that when the alleged victim of a sexual assault is a child, the state need not establish the date of the offense with exact precision and that proof that the offense occurred "on or about" a particular date is sufficient. Defendant contended that the instruction effectively amended the charge against him and impermissibly undermined his alibi defense. Upon review, the Supreme Court held that the instruction mirrored the information filed against defendant with regard to when the offense occurred and that, pursuant to St. v. Shaver, 233 M 438, 760 P2d 1230 (1988), a defendant cannot restrict the state's case by merely asserting intent to rely on an alibi defense for a limited period of time within which the crime could have occurred. The instruction was a correct statement of the law. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

Instruction on Circumstantial Evidence as Requiring Acquittal — Not Warranted in Light of Direct Evidence: Defendant's proffered jury instruction that jury must acquit if the circumstantial evidence gives rise to any reasonable interpretation in support of defendant's innocence is warranted only where the state's case rests substantially or entirely on circumstantial evidence. In light of direct evidence of statements by defendant and a coconspirator that connected defendant with the crime, the state's instruction was proper when it allowed the jury to find guilt even if defendant's theory of the case was reasonably supported by the circumstantial evidence. St. v. Stever, 225 M 336, 732 P2d 853, 44 St. Rep. 283 (1987).

Substantial Direct Evidence — Defendant's Circumstantial Evidence Instruction Denied: Where there was substantial direct evidence of defendant's guilt and the court instructed the jury on the definitions of direct and circumstantial evidence, it was not error to refuse to give defendant's following preferred instruction: "Acts may be proved by circumstantial evidence as well as by direct testimony of eye witnesses, but the facts and circumstances in evidence should be consistent with each other and with the guilt of the defendant, and inconsistent with any reasonable theory of the defendant's innocence. Both direct evidence and circumstantial evidence are acceptable as means of proof. Neither is entitled to greater weight than the other." St. v. Lewis, 220 M 418, 715 P2d 1064, 43 St. Rep. 492 (1986).

Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — "Easy to Charge but Difficult to Defend" Instruction Improper: The cautionary jury instruction providing that sexual intercourse without consent is an easy charge to make but is difficult to defend is an improper instruction. The Supreme Court, in holding that the instruction is an unwarranted and improper comment on the evidence which is not required by law or public policy, specifically overruled St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 583 (1980). St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Planted Evidence Instruction Not Warranted: There was insufficient evidence to support a logical inference that evidence was planted and therefore insufficient evidence to support an instruction on that theory where defendant in an assault case claimed at trial that certain evidence was planted, victim testified she had not planted it, police had not been able to find the evidence at first because victim gave them the wrong location of where she claimed it was, and victim had later found it herself a block away and notified the police. St. v. Howard, 195 M 400, 637 P2d 15, 38 St. Rep. 1980 (1981).

Refusal of Instruction That Sexual Assault Is Easy to Charge and Difficult to Defend:

The defendant, convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault, alleged error on appeal in the refusal of the trial court to give some of his offered jury instructions. One refused instruction was that the charge against the defendant was one easily made and difficult to defend against. The Supreme Court indicated that the instruction was incorrect as offered because, as to two of the witnesses against the defendant, there was no evidence showing any personal enmity toward the defendant. As to a third witness, there was sufficient basis in the evidence for this type of instruction under the Smith case, but the defendant failed to limit the instruction to advising the jury to look with caution only at the testimony of the third witness, whose enmity toward the defendant was in evidence. Accordingly, the instruction was correctly refused in its offered form. St. v. Camitsch, 192 M 124, 626 P2d 1250, 38 St. Rep. 563 (1981), following St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 583 (1980). St. v. Smith was overruled as to the propriety of the easy to charge-difficult to defend instruction. See St. v. Liddell casenote above.

When the defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and offered the defense of consent of the victim, the trial court did not err in refusing to give the jury instruction approved in St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696 (1980), that "the accusation of rape . . . is easy to make, but hard to defend against". The Supreme Court held in St. v. Pecora, 190 M 115, 619 P2d 173 (1980), that such an instruction is applicable only if the evidence presented at trial shows personal enmity between the defendant and the victim and that corroborating evidence supporting the victim does not exist. The record in this case does not satisfy these requirements. St. v. Mackie, 191 M 138, 622 P2d 673, 38 St. Rep. 86 (1981). St. v. Smith was overruled as to the propriety of the easy to charge-difficult to defend instruction. See St. v. Liddell casenote above.

Instruction to Distrust Weaker Evidence — No Adverse Effect on Presumption of Innocence: It was not reversible error for the trial court to instruct the jury to view weaker evidence with distrust when it appeared stronger evidence was available. It did not adversely affect the presumption of innocence and did not allow the jury to draw an inference from defendant's failure to take the stand. St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980).

Instruction on Effect of Possession of Stolen Property: The District Court did not err in giving the instruction that "one who is found in the possession of property that was stolen from burglarized premises is bound to explain such possession in order to remove the effect of that fact as a circumstance to be considered with all other evidence pointing to his guilt". St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Instruction as to Date Crime Was Committed: When an instruction is given that when the crime charged is alleged to have been committed on or about a certain date, it is not necessary to prove the precise date but is sufficient that the proof shows commission of the crime prior to the filing of the information. The jury should be apprised of the date the information was filed; however, in the absence of prejudice, failure to do so is not reversible error. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Instructions as to Evidence of Other Crimes Not Charged: It was not improper for the court to instruct the jury as to the purposes for which the jury could consider evidence of other crimes not charged. The instruction benefited the defendant, not the State, by narrowly restricting the consideration which may be given such evidence. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974 (1979).

Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is stricter than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 184 M 111, 601 P2d 1194 (1979).

Instruction on Uncorroborated Testimony Properly Refused: In a trial of the defendant for sexual intercourse without consent, it was not error for the trial court to refuse cautionary instruction on the uncorroborated nature of the prosecutrix's testimony as the law does not require corroboration, some corroborating evidence was presented, and there was nothing in the record to suggest malice by the prosecutrix. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979).

Possession as Prima Facie Evidence: A jury instruction taken verbatim from 45-6-304 (now repealed) that stated that possession of recently stolen livestock is prima facie evidence of guilt of larceny did not constitute reversible error since, even though the State has the burden of proof in criminal cases, the burden of evidence may shift to the defendant. St. v. Gloyne, 156 M 94, 476 P2d 511 (1970).

Instruction Placing Burden to Explain on Defendant:

An instruction that mere unexplained possession of stolen property was not sufficient to justify conviction but that one found in possession of property that may have been stolen must explain such possession in order to remove the effect of that fact as a circumstance to be considered with other evidence pointing to guilt did not deprive the defendant of the presumption of innocence. St. v. Gray, 152 M 145, 447 P2d 475 (1968).

In a prosecution for grand larceny, an instruction that had the effect of placing a burden on the defendant to explain his possession of stolen property was erroneous. Such a burden deprives the defendant of his cloak of innocence and forces him to testify. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Cautionary Instruction — Victim's Testimony in Rape Case: In a rape trial, when there was no inconsistency, contradictory evidence, or proof of falsity shown in the prosecutrix's testimony and no showing of malice or desire for revenge against the accused, it was not error for the court to refuse to give a cautionary instruction. St. v. Lagge, 143 M 289, 388 P2d 792 (1964).

Instruction Defining "Reasonable Doubt":

An instruction on "reasonable doubt" not strictly adhering to the one given by Chief Justice Shaw in Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850), and generally followed by courts, but adding inter alia that the jury is "not at liberty to disbelieve as jurors if you believe as men; your oath imposes upon you no obligation to doubt where no doubt would exist if no oath had been administered", was held not erroneous, the court being of the opinion that the decision holding that the term "reasonable doubt" defines itself is the most logical of a large number of authorities reviewed. St. v. Curtiss, 114 M 232, 135 P2d 361 (1943); St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

The trial court, in giving the definition of "reasonable doubt" in an instruction on the subject repeatedly approved by the Supreme Court, did not commit reversible error by prefacing it thus: "You are instructed that a doubt which a juror is allowed to retain in his mind and under the influence of which he should form a verdict of not guilty, must always be a reasonable one", and the contention of the appellant that the phrase in effect did away with the presumption of innocence declared by a former section was not sustained. St. v. Zorn, 99 M 63, 41 P2d 513 (1935).

While the court has frequently approved as correct and sufficient to meet all requirements the instruction taken from Commonwealth v. Webster, 59 Mass. (5 Cush.) 295, 52 Am. Dec. 711 (1850) (Territory v. McAndrews, 3 M 158 (1878); St. v. Martin, 29 M 273, 74 P 725 (1903); St. v. DeLea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1907)), error was not committed in submitting the following instruction: "The term reasonable doubt best defines itself. In a legal sense, however, a reasonable doubt is a doubt which has some reason for its basis; a doubt for which there exists in the minds of the jurors a reason, and not a doubt arising from mere caprice or groundless conjecture." (Chief Justice Brantly). St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916).

Technical Error in Instruction: On an appeal from a judgment of conviction for forgery, while it was error to advise the jury, in an instruction as to the purpose for which testimony of other like acts had been admitted, that testimony had been admitted relating to certain "forgeries", since whether or not a forgery had been committed was the fact to be determined by the jury, in view of other portions of the charge carefully safeguarding the rights of the defendant, the inadvertent use of the term "forgeries" could not have worked to his prejudice. St. v. Daems, 97 M 486, 37 P2d 322 (1934).

Retiring jury: propriety and prejudicial effect of sending written instructions with retiring jury in criminal case. 91 ALR 3d 382.

Prejudicial effect of prosecutor's argument giving jury impression that judge believes defendant guilty. 90 ALR 3d 822.

Evidence of guilt: propriety and prejudicial effect of prosecutor's argument to jury indicating that he has additional evidence of defendant's guilt which he did not deem necessary to present. 90 ALR 3d 646.

Propriety and prejudicial effect of prosecutor's argument giving jury impression that defense counsel believes accused guilty. 89 ALR 3d 263.

Self-incrimination: instruction allowing presumption of inference of guilt from possession of recently stolen property as violation of defendant's privilege against self-incrimination. 88 ALR 3d 1178.

Propriety and prejudicial effect of prosecutor's argument to jury indicating his belief or knowledge as to guilt of accused—modern cases. 88 ALR 3d 449.

Polygraph test: propriety and prejudicial effect of informing jury that accused has taken polygraph test, where results of test would be inadmissible in evidence. 88 ALR 3d 227.

Propriety of trial court's declaration of mistrial or discharge of jury, without accused's consent, on ground of prosecution's disclosure of prejudicial material, or making prejudicial remarks in presence of jury. 77 ALR 3d 1143.

Dismissal of prosecution: power of trial court to dismiss prosecution or direct acquittal on basis of prosecutor's opening statement. 75 ALR 3d 649.

Sympathy to accused as appropriate factor in jury consideration. 72 ALR 3d 842.

Propriety and prejudicial effect of instructions on credibility of alibi witnesses. 72 ALR 3d 617.

Duty of court, in absence of specific request, to instruct on subject of alibi. 72 ALR 3d 547.

Drugs and narcotics: validity and construction of statutes creating presumption or inference of intent to sell from possession of specified quantity of illegal drugs. 60 ALR 3d 1128.

Homosexual acts: prejudicial effect of prosecutor's reference in argument to homosexual acts or tendencies of accused which are not material to his commission of offense charged. 54 ALR 3d 897.

Felony-murder doctrine: what felonies are inherently or foreseeably dangerous to human life for purposes of felony-murder doctrine. 50 ALR 3d 397.

God: propriety of reference, in instruction in criminal case, to juror's duty to God. 39 ALR 3d 1445.

Privileged testimony: propriety and prejudicial effect of comment by counsel as to refusal to permit introduction of privileged testimony. 32 ALR 3d 906.

Propriety and prejudicial effect of prosecuting attorney acquiring new matter or points in closing summation in criminal case. 26 ALR 3d 1409.

Unrequested instruction: propriety under Griffin v. California and prejudicial effect of unrequested instruction that no inferences against accused should be drawn from his failure to testify. 18 ALR 3d 1335.

Pardon: prejudicial effect of statement of prosecutor as to possibility of pardon or parole. 16 ALR 3d 1137.

Comment or argument by court or counsel that prosecution evidence is uncontradicted as amounting to improper reference to accused's failure to testify. 14 ALR 3d 723.

Pardon or parole: prejudicial effect of statement or instruction of court as to possibility of parole or pardon. 12 ALR 3d 832.

Propriety of specific jury instructions as to credibility of accomplices. 4 ALR 3d 351.

Comment on accused's failure to testify, by counsel for codefendant. 1 ALR 3d 989.

46-16-402. When order may be departed from.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute establishes a general provision intended to provide the same practices as 1987 MCA 46-16-402. The statute, however, does not expressly recognize that the "state of the pleading" may require a departure from the stated order. The statute generally recognizes that the court may depart from the stated order when good cause is shown.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7202.

No change.

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "For good cause shown" for "When the state of the pleading requires it or in any other case for good reasons".

Case Notes

Discretion of Court to Reopen Case in Chief — Admissibility of Surprise Defense Testimony: The District Court allowed the state to reopen its case in chief after defense testimony at trial revealed that a defense witness had fabricated evidence and that a previously unknown witness, who had also fabricated physical evidence, was involved. These facts constituted good cause sufficient to allow the court to exercise its discretion to depart from the usual order of trial and allow examination of the witnesses and the relevance of the fabricated evidence. Further, introduction of the surprise testimony was relevant, and its probative value far outweighed any danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Snaric, 262 M 62, 862 P2d 1175, 50 St. Rep. 1443 (1993).

Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes Prior to Case in Chief — Court Discretion to Allow Chronological Presentation of Evidence: Defendant claimed the District Court improperly allowed introduction of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, and acts before the prosecution presented evidence of the crime charged. The state gave sufficient notice that it intended to introduce evidence of five burglaries or attempted burglaries, in chronological order, attributed to defendant. To cure any defect, the state filed a sealed affidavit with the court 1 week before trial, setting out what this evidence would prove. The court carefully apprised the jury of what crime was charged and admonished the jury as to the limited purposes of the prior crimes and acts evidence. The Just rules for admissibility having been met and an offer of proof having been received by the court for the chronological presentation of evidence, it was within the court's discretion to allow the sequence and order of presentation. St. v. Keefe, 232 M 258, 759 P2d 128, 45 St. Rep. 1034 (1988).

Preliminary Instructions:

Presentation of preliminary jury instructions before the evidence, especially when some of the offenses charged were complex and difficult to understand, was for good reason. It allowed the jury to have some understanding of the complex circumstantial evidence to be presented. A less complex case not based only on circumstantial evidence might not require such preliminary instructions, and in such a case there might not be good reasons for varying the usual trial order. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

The defendant's contention that extensive preliminary instructions given by the trial court were erroneous was rejected by the Supreme Court when it concluded that the language was not inflammatory but as neutral as language detailing the charges involved could be, even though the instructions were given prior to the introduction of evidence. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Requiring Out-of-Order Presentation by Defendant:

Opinion testimony was allowed as to evidence the witnesses had examined but which had not yet been admitted into evidence because a portion of the chain of possession had not been established in testimony. The missing links in the chain of possession were later supplied by testimony. It was within the discretion of the trial court to allow opinion to be given, conditioned on the subsequent production and admission of the evidence which formed the basis of the opinion. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980).

The trial court did not err in requiring the defendant to make an out-of-order presentation of his case in chief during the state's case in chief because certain prosecution witnesses were under time constraints that the defendant failed to overcome with "good reasons" why they should be required to stay several days to testify during the defendant's case in chief. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

The judge's reading a cautionary instruction in substantially standard language prior to the introduction of evidence was not error. St. v. Armstrong, 172 M 296, 562 P2d 1129 (1977).

Difficulty in Locating Witness as Grounds for Reopening Case: Where the State had difficulty in locating an eyewitness, kept the trial court and the defendant informed of its difficulty, and the defendant was given full opportunity to rebut the witness's testimony, it was not error to allow the State to reopen its case in chief to receive the eyewitness testimony. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980), followed in St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Amendment of Witness List During Trial:

The trial court did not err in permitting the endorsement of an x-ray by a radiologist as a witness added in midtrial by the prosecution when the defense counsel knew of the existence of the x-ray prior to trial and nothing indicated an intentional or deliberate withholding of evidence by the State or lack of good cause. St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Allowing the amendment of the witness list requested because of evidentiary matters developed during presentation of the State's case was not an abuse of discretion on the part of the trial judge when the court offered the accused a continuance and there was no objection to the witnesses based on surprise by the defendant. St. v. Klein, 169 M 350, 547 P2d 75 (1976).

Good Cause for Continuance: If a defendant wishes to protect himself from alleged prejudice incurred by the use of an approximate date in charging an offense and the proof offered at trial, he can move for a continuance under this section. St. v. Hall, 171 M 33, 554 P2d 755 (1976).

Defendant Wrongfully Denied Opening Statement: The denial to the defendant of opportunity to make an opening statement concerning insanity defense until after the presentation of the prosecution's case was an improper interference with the defendant's right to have the jury consider his defense. St. v. Olson, 156 M 339, 480 P2d 822 (1971).

46-16-403. Evidence insufficient to go to jury.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is primarily a restatement of 1987 MCA 46-16-403. The final sentence has been amended to clarify that a case may be reopened only prior to dismissal. The statute otherwise preserves established procedure.

1991 Amendment: Near beginning of first sentence substituted "prosecution's" for "state's" and near beginning of second sentence inserted "prior to dismissal".

Case Notes

Criminal Endangerment — Sufficient Proof of Mental State and Jurisdiction: Cybulski contended that the state failed to prove criminal endangerment because there was insufficient proof that Cybulski acted knowingly or that the alleged offense occurred in Custer County. The Supreme Court disagreed with both arguments. Under 45-2-103, the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and the facts and circumstances connected with the offense. Here, Cybulski drove at a high rate of speed for nearly 50 miles on the wrong side of the interstate while intoxicated. A rational trier of fact could conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that Cybulski either was aware of her conduct and the risk it was creating or was unaware solely because of her intoxicated condition, so the element of knowingly was proven. Under 46-3-112, if two or more acts are requisite to the commission of an offense, the charge may be filed in any county in which any of the acts occurred. Cybulski admitted that she drove on the wrong side of the interstate in Custer County and made no objection to charges being filed in Custer County, so venue in Custer County was proper. St. v. Cybulski, 2009 MT 70, 349 M 429, 204 P3d 7 (2009).

Failure to Prove Unconstitutionality of Municipal Ordinance Prohibiting Storage of Salvage: Albert was charged in City Court with two counts of unlawful storage of salvage pursuant to a Billings municipal ordinance. Albert moved to dismiss, asserting that the ordinance was unconstitutionally vague because substantive terms in the ordinance were not defined, so the ordinance failed to provide actual notice of what conduct was proscribed and minimal guidelines sufficient to govern city code enforcement officers. Albert's motion was denied and Albert appealed. The Supreme Court applied the test for vagueness from St. v. Dixon, 2000 MT 82, 299 M 165, 998 P2d 544 (2000), which requires that actual notice be given to citizens and that the statute contain minimal guidelines sufficient to govern law enforcement. The first element was met because Albert received multiple warnings before being cited, was told specifically what items had to be removed from his yard, and was even offered assistance in removal efforts; thus Albert was clearly on notice of a potential violation. The second element was also met inasmuch as the enforcement process did not encourage arbitrary and discriminatory enforcement because enforcement was generated only by citizen complaints, and officers were entitled to exercise a certain degree of subjective judgment in enforcement efforts. Therefore, Albert failed to show that the ordinance was vague and the dismissal motion was properly denied. There was sufficient evidence to show that Albert failed to move the salvage within 5 days as required by the ordinance, so Albert's conviction was affirmed. Billings v. Albert, 2009 MT 63, 349 M 400, 203 P3d 828 (2009). See also Kolender v. Lawson, 461 US 352 (1983).

Sufficient Evidence of Common-Law Marriage to Allow Conviction for Incest With Stepchild: Following conviction for incest with his stepdaughter, Bullman asserted that the state failed to prove sufficient evidence that Bullman was married to the victim's mother, so the victim was not Bullman's stepdaughter and Bullman could not be convicted of incest. However, the jury concluded that a common-law marriage existed based on facts that: (1) Bullman and the victim's mother lived together as husband and wife for many years and had children together; (2) Bullman supported the mother and her children, including the victim; (3) Bullman purchased a house and the mother was "on the deed"; (4) the mother filed joint tax returns while Bullman was incarcerated; (5) the mother testified that Bullman sometimes referred to her as his wife in front of others; (6) the victim testified that Bullman assumed a father-daughter relationship and asked her to call him "Dad"; and (7) the mother had obtained a divorce decree that was filed over Bullman's objection. The evidence of a common-law marriage, although circumstantial, was sufficient for the jury to conclude that Bullman and the victim's mother were married at the time the sexual contact occurred. St. v. Bullman, 2009 MT 37, 349 M 228, 203 P3d 768 (2009).

No Error in Denying Motion to Dismiss Felony Indecent Exposure Charge for Insufficient Evidence: Defendant's actions coupled with facts and circumstances constituted sufficient evidence for the jury to find the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Ommundson, 2008 MT 340, 346 M 263, 194 P3d 672, (2008).

Waiver of Right to Raise Issue of Unreasonable Delay — Failure to Move Court for Ruling at or Before Omnibus Hearing: Approximately 4 hours after Kummerfeldt was involved in a single-vehicle accident, his blood was drawn for a BAC test, which produced a 0.14% result. At trial, he moved for a judgment of acquittal on the DUI per se charge, based on the state's failure to prove his BAC result was 0.08 or greater at the time he was driving and because under St. v. McGowan, 2006 MT 163, 332 M 490, 139 P3d 841 (2006), 4 hours was an unreasonable delay between the driving and the drawing of blood. However, not only did Kummerfeldt fail to raise this objection at the omnibus hearing, he also entered into a pretrial stipulation as to the admissibility of the BAC report. Therefore, Kummerfeldt waived his arguments. St. v. Kummerfeldt, 2008 MT 333, 346 M 187, 194 P3d 662, (2008).

Conviction Based on Victim's Uncorroborated Testimony — Evidence Sufficient to Go to Jury: At Swenson's trial for sexual assault, Swenson asserted that the evidence was insufficient to go to the jury because the victim testified that she did not hear or see anything during the alleged incident, and her minor cousin who was present at the time testified that he saw Swenson simply wake the victim and then leave the room. However, the victim testified at trial that she kept her eyes closed and pretended to sleep during the touching, then pretended to wake up and saw Swenson standing over her. A conviction for a sex offense may be based entirely on the uncorroborated testimony of the victim, and the victim's testimony, combined with both circumstantial and direct evidence, was sufficient to submit the issue to the jury and to support a conviction. St. v. Swenson, 2008 MT 308, 346 M 34, 194 P3d 625 (2008). See also St. v. Maetche, 2008 MT 184, 343 M 464, 185 P3d 980 (2008).

No Error on Lower Court's Part for Not Dismissing Drug Case on Argument of Insufficient Evidence to Prove Defendant Knew Vial Contained Drugs: Wood argued that the lower court erred in not dismissing his case on the basis that insufficient evidence existed to show that he knew that the vial in his possession contained drugs. The Supreme Court stated that the trial transcript showed that the police officers testifying for the state gave credible testimony that the behavior of the defendant was consistent with that of a person under the influence of drugs. Based on the testimony of the officers, the Supreme Court ruled that the trial court had properly submitted the case to the jury to determine the credibility and weight of conflicting testimony and that there was sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that Wood knowingly possessed the drugs. St. v. Wood, 2008 MT 298, 345 M 487, 191 P3d 463 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence of Felony Criminal Mischief by Accountability — Denial of Directed Verdict Proper: Maetche had a rental contract for a mobile home and gave the owner 2 weeks' notice of the intent to move out. During that 2-week period, the home sustained over $11,000 in damages. Maetche's husband confessed to causing the damage, but Maetche was charged with felony criminal mischief by accountability. At the close of the state's case, Maetche moved for a directed verdict, asserting that the state failed to present any evidence that, either before or during the damage, Maetche had "solicited, aided, abetted, agreed, or attempted to aid" in committing the damage and thus could not be held legally accountable. The District Court denied the motion and found Maetche guilty, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Circumstantial evidence placed Maetche at the crime scene while the damage was occurring, and an eyewitness observed Maetche removing a washer and dryer from the home, thereby contributing to the damage. This evidence, combined with direct evidence of the purposeful nature of the destruction, was sufficient to permit a rational trier of fact to conclude that Maetche was criminally accountable for other destruction to the home and thus guilty of criminal mischief beyond a reasonable doubt and provided a circumstantial basis for a determination that Maetche was also involved in destruction of other parts of the home as well. St. v. Maetche, 2008 MT 184, 343 M 464, 185 P3d 980 (2008), distinguishing St. v. Johnston, 267 M 474, 885 P2d 402 (1994), and St. v. Cochran, 1998 MT 138, 290 M 1, 964 P2d 707 (1998).

Sufficient Evidence of Sexual Assault to Submit Case to Jury: Bomar was charged with sexual intercourse without consent or alternatively with sexual assault. Following presentation of the state's case, Bomar contended that there was insufficient evidence to send the case to the jury. The trial court disagreed, and the jury found Bomar guilty of sexual assault. On appeal, Bomar reasserted his claim of insufficient evidence, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Despite some inconsistencies in the testimony of the child victim regarding whether penetration occurred, the evidence was sufficient to show that Bomar had sexual contact with the child and to send the case to the jury on the sexual assault charge. St. v. Bomar, 2008 MT 91, 342 M 281, 182 P3d 47 (2008), following St. v. York, 2003 MT 349, 318 M 511, 81 P3d 1277 (2003).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Show Essential Elements of Deliberate Homicide, Burglary, and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Jury Consideration: At the close of the state's case, Rosling moved for dismissal of deliberate homicide, burglary, and evidence tampering charges on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to send the case to the jury. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Rosling was with the victim the night of her death and was apparently the last person to see the victim alive. The victim was murdered at home, and a neighbor saw Rosling's car and a person matching Rosling's description at the home around the time of the murder. Footprints found at the home matched Rosling's shoes. The victim's father found the victim and discovered burning magazines beneath the victim, apparently left in an attempt to cover up the crime. A spot of the victim's blood was found on Rosling's coat, and other blood stains on the coat could not be ruled out as belonging to the victim. Rosling was unable to account for his whereabouts at the time of the murder and gave police inconsistent statements concerning his actions the night before and day of the murder. Although the evidence was circumstantial, it was sufficient the send the case to the jury, and the trial court did not err in denying Rosling's motion to dismiss on grounds of insufficient evidence. St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence of Issuing Bad Checks to Warrant Submission to Jury: At the close of the state's evidence in McWilliams' trial for issuing bad checks, McWilliams moved to dismiss for lack of sufficient evidence. The trial court denied the motion, and McWilliams appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Evidence showed that McWilliams issued checks upon a real depository but that the checks were not honored either because of insufficient funds or because McWilliams stopped payment. Viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, there was sufficient evidence that McWilliams issued bad checks to warrant submitting the issue to the jury, and the trial court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss. St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

De Novo Standard of Review of Denial of Motion for Directed Verdict Not Abuse of Discretion: Prior to the present case, case law incorrectly assumed that use of the word "may" in this section left the determination of whether there was sufficient evidence to send the matter to the jury within the sound discretion of the trial court. However, when "may" is used in statute to confer power upon a court and the public has an interest in the exercise of power, then the exercise of the power becomes imperative. A trial court's conclusion as to whether sufficient evidence exists to convict is ultimately an analysis and application of the law to the facts. There either is, or is not, sufficient evidence to convict, and that determination is not a matter of discretion. Thus, the proper standard of review of denial of a motion for a directed verdict is de novo. St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007), following St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), overruling any prior cases to the extent that they stood for a different standard of review, and followed in St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sufficient Evidence of Criminal Accountability — Motion for Directed Verdict on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence to Go to Jury Properly Denied: High Elk contended that there was insufficient evidence of accountability for assault with a weapon to send the case to the jury and moved for a directed verdict. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal, the Supreme Court considered the record and affirmed. Evidence showed that High Elk was angry with the victim and argued with and punched the victim, preventing the victim's exit from a vehicle, at which time a friend of High Elk undisputedly stabbed the victim several times from the back seat of the vehicle, after which High Elk asked, "Did you get him?" A rational trier of fact could have found High Elk guilty of the elements of accountability, and the District Court did not err in allowing the case to go to the jury. St. v. High Elk, 2006 MT 6, 330 M 259, 127 P3d 432 (2006).

Sufficient Evidence to Submit Homicide Case to Jury — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: In a deliberate homicide trial, Smith asserted that the state failed to prove that he purposely and knowingly caused the death of another and that although the evidence may have established negligent homicide, there was an absence of proof that it was Smith's conscious object to cause the death, so Smith's motion for a directed verdict should have been granted. The evidence was conflicting, and some evidence was circumstantial but substantiated. However, without a complete absence of evidence to justify not sending the case to the jury, the trial court correctly declined to invade the province of the jury by directing the verdict. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), followed in Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Motion for Directed Verdict Following State's Case in Chief — Preservation of Issue for Appeal: Following the state's case in chief in McGarvey's deliberate homicide trial, McGarvey moved for a directed verdict based on insufficiency of the evidence because the two witnesses who testified regarding McGarvey's extrajudicial confession were patently unreliable, so corroboration should have been required to uphold their testimony. On appeal, the state contended that McGarvey failed to preserve the issue for appeal because he never raised the claim that the witnesses ought to be held unworthy of credit as a matter of law. The Supreme Court disagreed. By moving for a directed verdict on insufficiency of the evidence after the state concluded its case in chief, McGarvey preserved the issue for appeal. St. v. McGarvey, 2005 MT 308, 329 M 439, 124 P3d 1131 (2005).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Assault Convictions — Motion to Dismiss for Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: Following the close of the state's case against McCaslin for aggravated assault and assault with a weapon, McCaslin moved to dismiss both counts on grounds of insufficient evidence, asserting that the state failed to prove that he purposely or knowingly caused bodily harm to another and that because he was not the aggressor, a self-defense argument was justified. The motion was denied, and the jury subsequently convicted McCaslin on both counts. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the record and concluded that, with deference to the jury and in a light most favorable to the prosecution, a reasonable trier of fact could have found the essential elements of both crimes beyond a reasonable doubt. McCaslin's convictions were affirmed. St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004).

Conflicting Evidence Regarding Falsification of Prison Payroll Records — Denial of Directed Verdict Proper: Struble was charged with falsifying payroll records at the state prison where he was employed. After the state presented its case, Struble moved for a directed verdict on grounds that: (1) no evidence was presented to show that he was not entitled to the payroll and benefits that he received; (2) there was no direct evidence linking him to the offense; (3) no witnesses testified that he was not working or engaged in employment at the times reported on his time cards; and (4) the logbooks on which the state relied were inaccurate, untrustworthy, and unreliable. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. A directed verdict is proper only if reasonable persons could not conclude from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Here, the jury had considerable evidence that was susceptible to differing interpretations, and it was within the province of the jury to decide which interpretation would prevail, so the standard for granting a directed verdict was not satisfied. St. v. Struble, 2004 MT 107, 321 M 89, 90 P3d 971 (2004).

Circumstantial Evidence Supporting Conclusion That Victim Sustained Reasonable Apprehension of Bodily Injury: Defendant contended that a directed verdict motion should have been granted requesting dismissal of a partner or family member assault charge because no evidence was presented that the victim had sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, which the state had to prove in order to meet its burden of proof. The standard for determining whether a person sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury is that of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Direct evidence is not necessary to establish the elements of the offense. A conviction may be based entirely on circumstantial evidence, and direct proof of other facts may give rise to an inference that a victim sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury. In this case, the victim: (1) fled from her apartment with her dog over concern about defendant's past behavior; (2) locked herself in a neighbor's bathroom; (3) heard defendant scream that he was going to kill her; (4) observed knife holes that defendant was making in her apartment door; and (5) ultimately fled the building. From these facts a jury could find that the victim sustained reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, and denial of defendant's directed verdict motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003).

Substantial Evidence of Proof of Speeding in Construction Zone — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: Mathis was charged with speeding in a construction zone and, following submission of the state's case, moved for a directed verdict on grounds that the state failed to provide sufficient proof of the crime. The motion was denied, and Mathis appealed. The Supreme Court found sufficient proof that the elements of the crime had been proved. Administrative authority was properly granted to appropriate entities to set the applicable speed limit, and the proper requisite action was taken by the entities to establish a speed limit in accordance with state uniform traffic control guidelines and to adequately post the construction zone. A reasonable person could conclude that the state proved the elements of the offense; thus, Mathis's motion for a directed verdict was properly denied. St. v. Mathis, 2003 MT 112, 315 M 378, 68 P3d 756 (2003).

Criminal Cases — Directed Verdict Proper Only When No Evidence Supports Guilty Verdict — Sufficient Evidence of Mitigation Element of Mitigated Deliberate Homicide to Preclude Directed Verdict: After the state presented its evidence in Lamere's mitigated deliberate homicide trial, Lamere moved for a directed verdict, asserting that the state failed to prove the mitigation element of the crime. The District Court denied the motion on grounds that the state cannot be required to prove a mitigating factor and that sufficient evidence of mitigation had been presented to defeat the motion for directed verdict. Lamere appealed. On the first issue, the Supreme Court decided that the District Court erred, because when the state charges the offense of mitigated deliberate homicide, the state must prove every element of the crime, including the mitigation element, beyond a reasonable doubt. In contrast, when a defendant asserts mitigating circumstances as an affirmative defense, the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that mitigating factors exist. On the second issue, the Supreme Court noted that a District Court should grant a directed verdict of acquittal only when there is no evidence whatsoever to support a guilty verdict and if a reasonable person could not conclude from the evidence that, taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution, guilt has not been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Whether the trial court or a reviewing court would have viewed the evidence or found the facts differently from the jury is not the appropriate inquiry; rather, what is dispositive is the existence of evidence from which the jury could have found the mitigation element proved beyond a reasonable doubt, and if the evidence is properly before the jury, then resolving conflicts in the evidence, judging the credibility of witnesses, and finding the facts are acts uniquely within the province of the jury and the verdict will not be disturbed on appeal unless there is no evidence whatsoever to support the verdict. In Lamere's case, a reasonable trier of fact could have found that a person engaged in a fight and subjected to a threat from another person who is wielding a gun or knife may experience and act under extreme mental or emotional stress for which there is a reasonable explanation or excuse. Thus, the mitigation element was proved and the denial of the directed verdict motion on grounds of insufficient evidence of mitigation was affirmed. The Supreme Court applied the same standard as in civil cases to this criminal case—that unless there is an absence of any credible evidence in support of a verdict, a motion for a directed verdict is inappropriate. St. v. Lamere, 2003 MT 49, 314 M 326, 67 P3d 192 (2003).

Denial of Motion for Directed Verdict on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence — Standard of Review: A denial of a motion for a directed verdict is within the sound discretion of the trial court. Denial of a motion to dismiss based on insufficient evidence is reviewed for an abuse of discretion. In reviewing the sufficiency of evidence, the court determines whether, upon viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Lamere, 2003 MT 49, 314 M 326, 67 P3d 192 (2003), followed in St. v. Hausauer, 2006 MT 336, 335 M 137, 149 P3d 895 (2006). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721 (1998).

Possibility That Statements Made During Custodial Interrogation, After Lawyer Requested, Contributed to Conviction — New Trial Warranted: Spang was charged in connection with a double homicide. He made statements to police after being read his rights at arrest and again 2 days later after requesting a lawyer. Spang moved to suppress the statements, but the motion was denied on grounds that Spang waived the right to counsel after voluntarily answering interrogators' questions on both occasions. Transcripts of the interrogations were made available to the jury, and Spang was subsequently convicted on two counts of intimidation by accountability, but appealed based on insufficiency of evidence. The Supreme Court reviewed the denial of the suppression motion to determine whether the trial court's findings of fact were clearly erroneous and whether they were correctly applied as a matter of law. Here, Spang's request for counsel was neither ambiguous nor equivocal, so cessation of questioning was required until Spang either reinitiated conversation with the officers or was provided an attorney. Because neither event occurred, the trial court erred when it denied Spang's motion to suppress the statements. To determine whether the error was prejudicial, the Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), determining in this case that the error was trial error, because it occurred during presentation of the case to the jury and was amenable to qualitative assessment for prejudicial impact relative to other evidence introduced at trial. Under the cumulative evidence test, the state was required to show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence. Although there was other sufficient evidence tending to prove that Spang committed intimidation by accountability, qualitatively there existed a reasonable possibility that the statements that Spang made during the second interrogation contributed to his conviction because of the strong emphasis placed on those statements during trial. Therefore, the District Court committed reversible error when it admitted the statements during the state's case in chief. The case was remanded for a new trial, and the District Court was directed not to admit the statements made during the second interrogation. Statements from the first interrogation were admissible, however, because Spang had waived the right to counsel. Spang's argument that the first interrogation statements also be suppressed on unnecessary delay grounds failed, absent evidence that the delay between arrest and initial appearance influenced the voluntariness of those statements. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974 (1979), and overruled, to the extent that the right to counsel for self-incrimination purposes may be invoked in custodial interrogation, in St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Proper Denial of Directed Verdict on Charges of Intimidation by Accountability: Spang moved for a directed verdict on charges of intimidation by accountability, contending that there was insufficient evidence to establish his accountability because there was no evidence to show that he aided in communicating any threat to the crime victims. The state asserted that the evidence was sufficient because it showed that Spang was not only present at the crime scene, but also took actions prior to and during the intimidation that aided in the commission of the crimes. The District Court denied a directed verdict, Spang appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Although mere presence at a crime scene is not enough to establish accountability, an accused need not take an active part in any overt criminal acts to be adjudged criminally liable for the acts. Further, although mere presence and the failure to disapprove or oppose another's commission of an offense are insufficient to sustain an accountability charge, those factors may be considered along with other circumstances that might indicate that the accused in some way aided or abetted the principal in the commission of the crime. Here, Spang was not only associated with the principal prior to commission of a double homicide and present at the scene of the crime, but he also unloaded and reloaded a rifle used to intimidate the victims, helped collect items from the victim's garage, pulled telephone wires from the victim's wall, and failed to oppose or disapprove commission of the crimes—sufficient evidence upon which a rational trier of fact could find beyond a reasonable doubt the Spang committed two offenses of intimidation by accountability. St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002). See also St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21 (1981), and St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275 (1988).

Evidence of Flight Unacceptable as Sole Corroboration of Inconsistent Statement: After Giant's conviction of aggravated assault for attacking his wife in her home, he moved for dismissal on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to convict him as a matter of law because evidence of flight was the only corroboration of the prior inconsistent statements of the victim identifying him as the assailant. The victim initially identified Giant as the assailant in pretrial statements, but at trial, she identified her son as the attacker. No forensic testing was performed on evidence seized from the home, and there was no other testimony to corroborate either statement. The state argued, and the trial court agreed, that undisputed testimony of Giant's flight behavior was sufficient to corroborate the victim's prior inconsistent statements and that evidence seized from the home matched her statements. When considering a motion for a directed verdict to determine whether any rational trier of fact could find the elements of a crime satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, the Supreme Court will consider trial testimony and the evidence properly admitted and before the jury according to the criminal rules of evidence, but will not consider potential unintroduced evidence or other evidence outside the trial setting. A criminal conviction cannot be sustained when the only evidence of some essential element of a crime is a prior inconsistent statement. In Montana, all prior inconsistent statements are admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10); however, prior inconsistent statements admitted as substantive evidence of guilt must be corroborated in order to sustain a conviction. Evidence of flight is not sufficient in itself to prove guilt or to support a conviction as a matter of law because evidence of flight by itself is as consistent with innocence as it is with guilt. Therefore, evidence of flight cannot be the sole corroboration of a prior inconsistent statement admitted as substantive evidence of guilt. Here, the physical evidence recovered from the home and photographs of the victim's injury, which would normally be sufficient corroborating evidence, were insufficient because they did not corroborate the essential element of identity because the victim identified another possible assailant. Further, the victim's prior inconsistent statements alone were insufficient as a matter of law to support Giant's conviction, in light of evidence that the victim stopped cooperating with the County Attorney's office when Giant was released on bail and asked that the case be dismissed after her divorce proceedings against Giant were voluntarily dismissed—actions that affected the reliability of the prior inconsistent statements but did not independently corroborate the statements. Giant's conviction was reversed. St. v. Giant, 2001 MT 245, 307 M 74, 37 P3d 49 (2001). See also St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636 (1981).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Deliberate Homicide — Motion for Directed Verdict Properly Denied: At the end of the state's case in chief in Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, Clausell moved for a directed verdict on grounds that the state failed to introduce evidence upon which the jury could conclude that Clausell knowingly or purposely caused his girlfriend's death. The District Court denied the motion, which Clausell contended on appeal was an abuse of discretion because gunshot residue tests failed to establish who was holding the gun when it discharged, there was no other evidence that Clausell was the shooter, there was no well-established motive to prove intent, and there was no evidence of flight. The Supreme Court agreed with the state that there was sufficient circumstantial evidence from which any rational trier of fact could infer that Clausell was holding the gun and that he acted knowingly or purposely. The court also noted that neither motive nor flight is an element of deliberate homicide. Clausell recounted at least eight different versions of the facts that were inconsistent with each other and with the physical evidence. When viewed in the light most favorable to the state, the record showed ample circumstantial evidence that Clausell committed the crime, and denial of the motion for a directed verdict was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358 (1998).

No Abuse of Discretion in Failure to Dismiss Case on Court's Own Motion for Insufficient Evidence: Brady was charged with DUI, fourth or subsequent offense, arising from circumstances surrounding a single-vehicle accident in which Brady swerved off the highway, hit a rock wall, and rolled the vehicle. After the state's case in chief, Brady moved for a directed verdict of acquittal, but the motion was denied. Brady was subsequently convicted and contended on appeal that the trial court erred when it did not dismiss the case on its own motion because the evidence was far from overwhelming, arguing that taken as a whole, the evidence was insufficient to submit to the jury because there was no direct or even circumstantial evidence that he had anything to drink, much less was intoxicated, at the time of the accident. However, there was circumstantial evidence of conduct before and after the accident that could have led the jury to believe Brady had been drinking. When circumstantial evidence is susceptible to differing interpretations, it is within the province of the jury to decide which will prevail. The jury apparently did not believe that the wreck happened because Brady's car malfunctioned, that his injuries accounted for his drunken behavior, or that his apparent intoxication when officers tracked him down at home after the accident was the consequence of a single beer that he drank after the accident. Taken in a light most favorable to the state, a reasonable juror could have found Brady guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and it was not error for the trial court to allow the evidence to go to the jury. St. v. Brady, 2000 MT 282, 302 M 174, 13 P3d 941, 57 St. Rep. 1178 (2000). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Motion to Dismiss Based on Insufficient Evidence of Negligent Homicide Properly Denied — Deviation From Reasonableness Standard Sufficient to Support Finding of Negligent Conduct: After consuming at least five shots of brandy and four beers at a tavern, Davis hit and killed a pedestrian on the way home, then left the accident scene. Upon arriving home, he told his girlfriend that he had hit a deer. He then ate dinner and went to bed. Davis was later charged with negligent homicide and failure to remain at the scene of an accident that resulted in death or personal injuries. Following presentation of the state's case, Davis moved for dismissal based on insufficient evidence, which was denied. Davis was convicted and appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that a rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of negligent homicide beyond a reasonable doubt based on evidence that Davis consciously disregarded the risk posed by his driving under the influence of alcohol (even though blood alcohol content could not be tested because he left the scene) and that Davis's conduct immediately before, during, and after the accident revealed a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable person not under the influence of alcohol would have observed. St. v. Davis, 2000 MT 199, 300 M 458, 5 P3d 547, 57 St. Rep. 773 (2000), followed in St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: When it was clear from the record that a reasonable juror could have concluded from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt on several counts was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict of acquittal, and further prosecution was not barred on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140 (1993), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Justify Aggravated Assault Charge — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: At the conclusion of the state's evidence on Hall's aggravated assault charge, Hall moved for a directed verdict of acquittal based on the contention that because only circumstantial evidence had been offered, under this section, the action should have been dismissed. Under this section, dismissal of an action based on insufficient evidence is within the discretion of the court. After examining the trial transcript, the Supreme Court found that the evidence, although circumstantial, when viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution, was sufficient for any rational trier of fact to find that Hall committed the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. The trial court did not err in denying Hall's motion for directed verdict. St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999), following St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216, 52 St. Rep. 1133 (1995). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Identity of Perpetrator — Hearsay Testimony of Child Held Sufficient: Heen became suspicious that his 33-month-old granddaughter, Cassie, had been sexually abused by her stepfather, Osborne, Heen's son-in-law. Heen and his daughter, Jamie, Cassie's mother, talked to Cassie, who said or indicated to either or both Heen and Jamie that she had played with "daddy's rubber duck" and that the rubber duck was Osborne's genitalia. Cassie also gave information tending to implicate Heen, whom she called "Papa", as opposed to Osborne, whom she called "Daddy". Cassie's hearsay testimony was also that "Daddy is yucky" and to the effect that Cassie was afraid of Osborne. A medical examination showed that Cassie had physical injuries consistent with sexual abuse. The District Court interviewed Cassie and found her unable to testify because she was extremely shy and was intimidated by the courtroom. The state relied upon the hearsay testimony by Heen and Jamie, and based upon that hearsay evidence, Osborne was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent. The Supreme Court held that when the evidence is viewed in a light most favorable to the state, there was sufficient evidence from which a rational jury could have found beyond a reasonable doubt that Osborne was the perpetrator of the offense, even though there was no direct physical evidence connecting Osborne with the crime. Concerning Osborne's objection that the evidence did not conclusively show that Osborne had penetrated Cassie with his penis, the Supreme Court held that under the language of the statute, penetration by a different object made no difference. St. v. Osborne, 1999 MT 149, 295 M 54, 982 P2d 1045, 56 St. Rep. 589 (1999).

"Repeatedly" Means "More Than Once" in Stalking Statute: McCarthy was convicted of stalking and, while incarcerated, twice tried to contact the victim by letter, but the victim did not read the letters. He was charged with stalking, second offense. At trial, he moved to dismiss on grounds that two instances of attempted contact by letter were insufficient to support a stalking conviction. Legislative intent and the common definition of "repeatedly" persuaded the Supreme Court that the state need demonstrate only more than one instance of harassment, intimidation, or threat. The motion to dismiss was properly denied. St. v. McCarthy, 1999 MT 99, 294 M 270, 980 P2d 629, 56 St. Rep. 418 (1999).

Circumstantial Evidence of Assault Insufficient — Motion for Directed Verdict Granted: The victim denied that his girlfriend, Cochran, had stabbed him with a pair of scissors. The state offered circumstantial evidence showing a likelihood that Cochran had been the perpetrator and that the victim's story was not supported by any physical evidence. The Supreme Court held that the trial court had erred in not granting the defendant's motion for dismissal because the state's evidence was not conclusive in showing that no one but the defendant could have committed the crime. St. v. Cochran, 1998 MT 138, 290 M 1, 964 P2d 707, 55 St. Rep. 551 (1998).

Mere Proximity Insufficient to Establish Connection Between Common Items and Illegal Drug Activity — Burden of Proof Required in Criminal Forfeiture Proceedings: Before the state may criminally convict a citizen and deprive that citizen of property by forfeiture under 45-9-206, the state must establish, by direct or circumstantial evidence, a more substantial connection between common household items and illegal drug activity than merely their proximity to one another in a residence. The state must prove not only that the property has the required statutory connection to illegal drug activity, but also that each specific item seized is subject to forfeiture. Criminal forfeiture based on nothing more than a justifiable suspicion cannot be affirmed, nor is a suggestion of guilt by association sufficient to establish beyond a reasonable doubt that a statutory connection exists between the property and the drug activity. The kind and amount of circumstantial evidence offered in the present case were insufficient as a matter of law to warrant the jury's finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Therefore, defendant's motion to dismiss, on grounds of insufficient evidence that the property was subject to forfeiture, should have been granted. St. v. Hegg, 1998 MT 100, 288 M 254, 956 P2d 754, 55 St. Rep. 391 (1998).

Driver Asleep at Wheel of Pickup Not Running — Sufficiency of Evidence: Testimony of a peace officer that when he shook awake a driver slumped over the wheel of a parked pickup that was not running, the driver started the engine and of the driver's wife that when she left the truck after an argument, she threw him keys belonging to her son and that they contained a worn key that could fit defendant's pickup (she had parked the pickup and took the keys with her when she started to leave) was sufficient for the jury to find that defendant was in actual physical control of the pickup and to convict him of DUI. St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994, 54 St. Rep. 542 (1997).

DNA and Other Evidence Held Sufficient to Convict on Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based upon DNA evidence and testimony of the stepdaughter. That evidence showed that Weeks had intercourse with the stepdaughter, the stepdaughter did not have intercourse with anyone else, the stepdaughter had a baby, and Weeks was up to 1.9 million times more likely to be the baby's father than any other randomly chosen male. The District Court was therefore correct in refusing to grant a directed verdict of acquittal. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Circumstantial Evidence of Child Abuse — Motion for Directed Verdict Properly Denied: Mergenthaler was charged with negligent homicide of Ashley, a 13-month-old female. The state's evidence showed that Ashley suffered injuries to her skull and brain that were attributed by all of the state's medical experts to "whiplash shaken infant syndrome" and not to a fall from a couch, as claimed by Mergenthaler. Citing St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542 (1992), the Supreme Court held that a directed verdict was appropriate only when there was no evidence to support a guilty verdict and that in this case, there was strong circumstantial evidence that Mergenthaler's conduct was the cause of Ashley's death. St. v. Mergenthaler, 263 M 198, 868 P2d 560, 51 St. Rep. 13 (1994).

Evidence of Possession and Circumstances Sufficient to Support Burglary Conviction: The defendant moved for a directed verdict at the close of the state's case against him on burglary charges. The Supreme Court held that although evidence of possession alone was not sufficient to support a burglary conviction, there was sufficiently strong circumstantial evidence of guilt to justify submitting the case to the jury. St. v. Floyd, 243 M 269, 790 P2d 475, 47 St. Rep. 720 (1990).

Sufficient Evidence of Speeding and Reckless Driving — Motion for Acquittal Denied: Defendant contended his motion for acquittal on charges of speeding and reckless driving should have been granted because the officer in pursuit did not use his siren and because defendant never saw the officer's flashing lights. The motion was properly denied on evidence that another officer saw the flashing lights from 2 miles away, occupants in defendant's car were aware of the pursuit and of defendant's speeding, and use of the siren was not mandatory. St. v. Keil, 231 M 187, 751 P2d 680, 45 St. Rep. 532 (1988).

Use of Weapon in Aggravated Assault Case as Sufficient Evidence to Preclude Dismissal: In a case of aggravated assault, evidence that a weapon was used in conjunction with threats was sufficient to preclude dismissal at the close of the state's case. St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987), distinguished in St. v. Clemo, 1999 MT 323, 297 M 316, 992 P2d 1263, 56 St. Rep. 1292 (1999).

Prima Facie Showing of Knowledge of Insufficient Funds in Checking Account: Sufficient evidence was presented in the prosecution's case in chief to indicate that defendant was aware that it was highly probable that his checks would not be paid by the banks upon which they were written. This evidence included bank statements showing significant negative balances, numerous overdraft notices mailed to the defendant, numerous certified letters sent to defendant notifying him of the overdrafts and requesting payment, and the fact that numerous checks remained unpaid at the time of the trial. St. v. McHugh, 215 M 296, 697 P2d 466, 42 St. Rep. 371 (1985).

Oral Statement by Judge Not a Finding of Fact: At the close of evidence in a misdemeanor assault nonjury trial, the court made an oral statement that the defendant could have and did hit the victim. The court then requested briefs on the issue of justification. A month later the court vacated its factual finding and dismissed the charge. Because the court was still in the process of its judicial determination of facts and law when it made the oral statement, it could properly vacate its statement. St. v. Nicholls, 200 M 144, 649 P2d 1346, 39 St. Rep. 1635 (1982).

Dismissal Discretionary: Defendant moved for a dismissal of a rape charge due to insufficient evidence. The general rule in Montana is that a directed verdict of acquittal is appropriate in criminal cases only where the State fails to prove its case and there is no evidence upon which a jury could base its verdict. The decision whether to dismiss the charge or direct a verdict of acquittal lies within the sound discretion of the trial court and will be disturbed on appeal only when abuse is shown. St. v. Goltz, 197 M 361, 642 P2d 1079, 39 St. Rep. 613 (1982), and St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696 (1980), following St. v. Yoss, 146 M 508, 409 P2d 452 (1965), and St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), and followed in St. v. Graves, 241 M 533, 788 P2d 311, 47 St. Rep. 483 (1990). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007). See also St. v. Romannose, 281 M 84, 931 P2d 1304, 54 St. Rep. 72 (1997), and St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721, 55 St. Rep. 719 (1998).

Guilt Based Solely on Unreliable Prior Inconsistent Statement: An unreliable prior inconsistent statement of a witness should not be the sole substantive evidence upon which a jury is allowed to base guilt, and a conviction supported only by a prior inconsistent statement should not be allowed to stand. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981), clarified in St. v. Giant, 2001 MT 245, 307 M 74, 37 P3d 49 (2001), which required that prior inconsistent statements admitted as substantive evidence of guilt be corroborated in order to sustain a conviction.

Standards for Deciding Directed Verdict Motion: A directed verdict for defendant should be granted only where there is no evidence upon which a jury could base a verdict; that is, the defendant is entitled to an acquittal if reasonable men could not conclude from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. The ruling on the motion will be disturbed on appeal only when abuse of trial court's sound discretion to decide the motion is shown. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981), followed in St. v. Howie, 228 M 497, 744 P2d 156, 44 St. Rep. 1711 (1987), and St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Statutory Rape Not Proven Solely by Unreliable Prior Inconsistent Statement: Charge of sexual intercourse without consent was properly dismissed at the end of the State's presentation of its case where the only evidence upon which conviction could be based was an unreliable prior statement of the alleged victim that was inconsistent with her testimony at trial in which she repudiated the statement. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981).

Substantial Circumstantial Evidence to Infer Burglary: Even though the evidence concerning a burglary by the defendant was circumstantial, the evidence was substantial enough to support the crime of burglary. Further, the quality of the state's evidence was sufficient to meet its burden of proof. The question, following Jackson v. Va., 443 US 307, 61 L Ed 2d 560, 99 S Ct 2781 (1979), is whether after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Roberts, 194 M 189, 633 P2d 1214, 38 St. Rep. 1551 (1981), cited in St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Sexual Assault Erroneously Dismissed — "Sexual Contact" Construed: The Supreme Court reversed the District Court's decision to grant defendant's motion for dismissal under this section of a sexual assault charge and held that the sexual contact proscribed by 45-5-502 is not limited to a touching of the anal or genital area of a male or female or the breast of a female. Looking to the purpose of the statute, the court found that the definition of "sexual contact" encompasses the rubbing of the belly and chest of a prepubescent female child because of the societal concern for such impositions and their resultant outrage, disgust, or shame in the victim. St. v. Weese, 189 M 464, 616 P2d 371, 37 St. Rep. 1620 (1980).

Sufficient Evidence of Rape: It was not reversible error for the lower court to deny the defendant's motion for a directed verdict on the grounds that there was not sufficient evidence to support the charge of sexual intercourse without consent. There was no question that a rape occurred, and numerous items of evidence adduced at trial tended to prove that the defendant committed the crime. St. v. Pendergrass, 189 M 127, 615 P2d 201 (1980).

Circumstantial Evidence: Circumstantial evidence is not always inferior in quality nor is it necessarily relegated to a second-class status in the consideration to be given it. The fact that it is circumstantial is not a sufficient allegation to justify a reversal of the judgment, for such evidence may be and frequently is most convincing and satisfactory. In determining the sufficiency of circumstantial evidence to make a case for the jury and to sustain a conviction, all of the facts and circumstances must be taken into consideration collectively. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343 (1980).

Sufficient Evidence of Theft: In a theft proceeding, if the evidence shows that defendant was in possession of recently stolen property, either singly or jointly with others, an inference of guilt is warranted. Evidence of exclusiveness of possession by the defendant is not rebutted merely by showing another's presence. Where this evidence is presented, there is sufficient evidence to send the case to the jury, and the trial court may properly reject a motion to dismiss for failure to establish a prima facie case and the verdict, supported by substantial evidence, will be upheld on appeal. St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980).

Motion to Dismiss — Province of Jury and Court: It is within the province of the jury, not the court, to weigh the evidence. The decision upon a motion to dismiss is within the discretion of the court. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976). The abuse of discretion standard of review of a motion for a directed verdict was replaced by the de novo standard of review in St. v. Swann, 2007 MT 126, 337 M 326, 160 P3d 511 (2007).

Corroborated Admission of Guilt: The court properly denied the defendant's motion for an acquittal for the failure of the State to present sufficient evidence because the defendant admitted shooting the victim and witnesses testified that the defendant, after quarreling with the victim, had driven home to get a gun in order to accomplish the slaying. St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).

Utter Lack of Proof by State: When there is an utter failure or lack of evidence to establish the state's case, the court may direct the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. St. v. Widdicombe, 130 M 325, 301 P2d 1116 (1956).

46-16-410. Settlement of jury instructions.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute consolidates several provisions into one statute concerning the settlement of instructions. The statute contains elements from both the 1987 code and the federal rule. Compare 1987 MCA 46-16-401, Rule 30, Fed. R. Crim. P., and this statute. While some changes in established procedure may be anticipated, the prevailing practice is adopted by this statute.

Case Notes

Defendant's Presence Not Required During Settling of Jury Instructions: This section specifically allows for a defendant's absence during the settling of jury instructions without the need for the trial court to obtain the defendant's voluntary, intelligent, and knowing waiver of the right to be present during this critical stage of the proceedings. St. v. Roedel, 2007 MT 291, 339 M 489, 171 P3d 694 (2007).

Sufficient Evidence to Submit Homicide Case to Jury — Directed Verdict Properly Denied: In a deliberate homicide trial, Smith asserted that the state failed to prove that he purposely and knowingly caused the death of another and that although the evidence may have established negligent homicide, there was an absence of proof that it was Smith's conscious object to cause the death, so Smith's motion for a directed verdict should have been granted. The evidence was conflicting, and some evidence was circumstantial but substantiated. However, without a complete absence of evidence to justify not sending the case to the jury, the trial court correctly declined to invade the province of the jury by directing the verdict. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), followed in Adams v. St., 2007 MT 35, 336 M 63, 153 P3d 601 (2007).

Failure to Raise Double Jeopardy Objection at Settling of Jury Instructions or to Object to Verdict Form in Which Offenses Listed as Separate Counts — Appeal Precluded: Minez was convicted of both criminal possession and criminal production of dangerous drugs. On appeal, Minez argued that conviction of both offenses, which arose out of the same transaction, constituted double jeopardy. However, at trial, Minez abandoned a request for jury instructions on double jeopardy and never returned to the issue, failed to raise a double jeopardy objection at the settling of jury instructions, and did not object to the verdict form in which both offenses were listed as independent counts. Having abandoned the constitutional double jeopardy objections at trial, Minez was precluded from raising the issue on appeal, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Minez, 2004 MT 115, 321 M 148, 89 P3d 966 (2004).

Failure to Give Defendant's Instruction on Testimony of Informants Not Erroneous: At a homicide trial, DuBray offered a jury instruction that would have required the jury to determine whether the testimony of each of several informants had been affected by the witness's self-interest, by any agreement with the state, by the witness's own interest in the outcome of the case, or by prejudice against DuBray, citing St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037 (1999). The trial court refused that cautionary instruction and gave one offered by the state instead, consistent with St. v. Long, 274 M 228, 907 P2d 945 (1995), which adequately addressed the credibility of informants, "witness motive, bias or prejudice, and bad character for truthfulness". On appeal, DuBray contended that without his proposed instruction, the jury instructions were incomplete. The Supreme Court noted that Grimes and Long were not inconsistent and that the jury instruction that was given fully and fairly instructed the jury. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003).

Failure by State to Articulate Permissible Purpose for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes — Lack of Proof of Defendant's Knowledge of Fact of Consequence: During pretrial proceedings for Dobson's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated its intent to introduce evidence that Dobson had been previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The purported purpose was for proof of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident, establishing that Dobson knew that someone under 16 years of age could not legally consent to sexual intercourse. Instead of objecting, defense counsel offered to stipulate that Dobson did have knowledge of that fact. The state objected that Dobson should not be able to stipulate away its case, and urged that the jury instructions contain details of the prior charge. The trial court declined the specific instructions offered by both Dobson and the state and fashioned and gave its own instruction, advising the jury that Dobson was previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor and thus had knowledge of the law, but instructing that the evidence was not to be construed by the jury as evidence of Dobson's character, but only as evidence of Dobson's prior knowledge that such conduct was criminal. On appeal, Dobson contended that the instruction was erroneous. The Supreme Court agreed that the trial court abused its discretion in giving the instruction because it did not meet the third criteria of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)). Although it appeared at first blush that the state asserted permissible purposes of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident for the admission of other crimes evidence, merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if that purpose is not an issue in dispute (see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995)). Rather, as set out in U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982), the state must articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the other acts evidence, which in this case, the state did not do. Dobson's knowledge of the law that it is a felony offense to have sexual intercourse with someone under 16 years of age was not a fact of consequence to the action. Thus, admission of the evidence via the jury instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001). See also St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Offer "Failure to Agree" Instruction — Prejudice Warranting Remand for New Trial: At Rogers' trial for attempted sexual intercourse without consent and felony assault, the District Court provided jury instructions with misdemeanor sexual assault and misdemeanor assault as lesser included offenses. Rogers' attorney requested the "acquittal first" instruction, which provided that the jury was not to consider the lesser included offenses unless they first acquitted on the greater offenses. Rogers contended that the failure of the attorney to request the "failure to agree" instruction allowed under 46-16-607, which provides that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if it is unable to reach a verdict on the greater offense, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed. The "failure to agree" instruction was drafted to protect against the serious risk identified in U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984), which arises when jurors harboring a doubt as to defendant's guilt of the greater offense, but at the same time convinced that defendant had committed some offense, might wrongly yield to the majority and convict of the greater offense rather than not convict at all. The failure to offer this potentially beneficial instruction, when that failure is not part of counsel's trial strategy, is an error so serious that it falls outside the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases. Thus, when sufficient facts exist to support a conviction for a lesser included offense, defense counsel must offer the "failure to agree" instruction unless there is a tactical reason for not doing so, and failure to offer the instruction in such cases is prejudicial error. St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

Jury Instruction Disallowing Evidence of Intoxication in Determining State of Mind Not Error — Full and Fair Instructions on Law: Following Raugust's criminal trial, the court instructed the jury that it could not consider evidence of intoxication for any purpose, pursuant to 45-2-203. Raugust maintained on appeal that the instruction was in error because depriving him of the ability to admit intoxication evidence lessened the state's burden of proof and confused the jury, in violation of his due process rights. However, the error urged on appeal was not contained in the objection made to the instruction during the final settling of jury instructions, constituting waiver of the argument on appeal. Moreover, the plain error doctrine did not apply because review under that doctrine was requested for the first time on appeal. Here, the jury was instructed regarding: (1) the elements of each offense charged and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definition of the applicable mental states—purposely and knowingly; (3) the fact that the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with the offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. Read as a whole, these instructions fairly and fully instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case, and giving the instruction disallowing the defense of intoxication was not erroneous. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994 (1997).

Jury Instruction Proposed but Rejected — No Further Objection Required: Objections to jury instructions proposed by the opposing party serve the same function as evidentiary objections. When a party proposes a jury instruction and the trial court refuses to give the instruction, the court knows that an issue of law has been raised by the party seeking the instruction and, from the nature of the proposed instruction, knows the nature of the party's contentions. Thus, that party has made a sufficient objection for purposes of this section and has no duty to make a further objection for the record. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), followed in St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001).

Refusal of Proposed Cautionary Instruction — Standard of Prejudice: When a trial court refuses a proposed cautionary instruction, the standard of prejudice is whether the testimony is crucial to the state's case in light of other evidence. In the present case, an informant with apparent personal motivation offered testimony about Grimes's crimes, but no cautionary instruction was given, which Grimes contended constituted reversible error. However, in light of other overwhelming evidence linking Grimes to the crime, the informant's testimony was not crucial to the state's case, so failure to give a cautionary instruction was harmless and not prejudicial to Grimes. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), following Guam v. Dela Rosa, 644 F2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1981).

Testimony by Government Agent Motivated by Personal Gain — Cautionary Instruction Prudent: When a government agent motivated by personal gain rather than an independent law enforcement purpose provides testimony, a cautionary instruction is prudent. St. v. Grimes, 1999 MT 145, 295 M 22, 982 P2d 1037, 56 St. Rep. 571 (1999), following Guam v. Dela Rosa, 644 F2d 1257 (9th Cir. 1981).

"Failure to Agree" Instruction — When Corrective Instruction Required: Generally, when a claimed error concerns jury instructions that were not objected to at the time that the instructions were settled, the alleged error may not be raised for the first time on appeal; however, the Supreme Court will review jury instructions in certain circumstances even in the absence of an objection to determine whether the jury was properly instructed. In the present case, there was significant confusion among the court, the prosecutor, and the defense counsel concerning the correct procedural sequence for the jury to consider greater and lesser offenses during deliberations, given a timely request by defendant. If a judge is of the opinion that instructions already given fully advise the jury on the procedures that it is to follow in deliberations, the judge's refusal to answer a jury's question already answered in the instruction is not error. However, when the instruction fails to fully advise, the judge should provide a corrective instruction. The withdrawal of defendant's timely request for an instruction at settlement was due to the mistaken representation of the court and the prosecutor that the law did not allow an instruction that the jury may consider a lesser offense if it fails to agree on a verdict for the greater offense, so the Supreme Court chose to review defendant's claim of error in a jury instruction. Under 46-16-607(3), as long as a criminal defendant requests a "failure to agree" instruction at the settling of jury instructions, a District Court must instruct the jury that it may consider the lesser offense without first reaching a unanimous verdict on the greater offense. St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), following U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Failure to Record Jury Question and Court Response — No Prejudice: Defendant contended that the trial court's failure to respond in writing or to create a record regarding a question asked by the jury after being retired for deliberation constituted prejudicial error requiring a new trial. Although this section requires a record to be made at the settlement of instructions, a jury's question asked during deliberations does not constitute the period of trial relating to settlement of instructions; thus, this section does not apply. Given the court's response to rely on the instructions already given, there was no prejudice to defendant, and any error in failing to make a record was harmless and not reversible. St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995).

Use of Information and Surplus Language in Instructions Not Error: Mummey was found not guilty on the first count against him of aggravated assault against Miller. He was found guilty of the second count of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) against Darling. Mummey argued that he could not be found guilty of the second charge because it was inconsistent in its language in that it described the assault as having been perpetrated by the use of the same footwear worn in the assault of which he had been found innocent. The Supreme Court held that there was no error in incorporating the information into the jury instructions when they did not redefine the elements of the crime and that in view of all the instructions, the surplus language in the second count did not invalidate the verdict. St. v. Mummey, 264 M 272, 871 P2d 868, 51 St. Rep. 198 (1994).

Error to Refuse Instruction That One Cannot Conspire Solely With Government Agent: It is legally impossible for a person to conspire with an undercover government agent to commit a crime. There must be at least two nonagents conspiring between themselves and involved with the agent. It was error to refuse defendant's instruction to that effect. St. v. Shaw, 255 M 298, 843 P2d 316, 49 St. Rep. 1012 (1992).

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence after "time", deleted "before the submission of the case" and after "separate or be" substituted "ordered to remain sequestered" for "kept" and at beginning of second sentence inserted "If sequestered", after "together" deleted "until the next meeting of the court", and at end substituted "as directed" for "at the next meeting thereof"; in (3) deleted reference to subsection (a) of subsection (2); and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

Absence of Defendant From Critical Trial Proceeding Violative of Fundamental Right to Appear and Defend in Person — No Error Given Curative Action of Trial Court: During Kennedy's criminal trial, a juror communicated with one of the state's witnesses. The trial judge then met with the juror in chambers without Kennedy or any counsel present, and the juror admitted the conversation, but denied mentioning anything about it to the jury. The court then met with counsel in chambers, replaced the juror with an alternate, excluded the witness from testifying, and went on with the trial. Defense counsel moved for mistrial and dismissal with prejudice, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that excluding Kennedy from the conversation with the juror violated Kennedy's fundamental right to be present at all critical stages of trial to defend in person. Further, any waiver by defense counsel by failing to object was ineffective because Kennedy was never told that he had a right to be present or that the juror questioning was about to occur. However, Kennedy was not prejudiced or deprived of a fair trial by the error in light of the District Court's corrective actions. Thus, denial of a mistrial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Kennedy, 2004 MT 53, 320 M 161, 85 P3d 1279 (2004), followed in St. v. Godfrey, 2009 MT 60, 349 M 335, 203 P3d 834 (2009).

Juror Outburst — Court's Removal of Child Witness From Stand — No Prejudice to Defendant: A juror's request to be dismissed when defense counsel persisted in questioning a 9-year-old witness who repeatedly broke down in tears at a certain point in questioning and the court's removal of the witness from the stand did not warrant a mistrial. There was no showing that the juror's outburst resulted in prejudice to defendant, and removal of the witness did not deprive defendant of the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses when the court gave defense counsel the option to resume questioning at a later time. St. v. McNatt, 257 M 468, 849 P2d 1050, 50 St. Rep. 365 (1993), followed in St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993), and cited in St. v. Brandon, 264 M 231, 870 P2d 734, 51 St. Rep. 244 (1994).

Distinction Between Brief Encounter and Intimate Association: In a case in which the defendant claimed that two jurors spoke briefly to one another about the defendant and his witnesses, there was no initial showing of prejudice against the defendant. No juror affidavits were presented to the court to support defendant's claim. The statements, if made, were brief and do not support the claim they injured the defense because they do not reflect on intimate association but are merely indicative of a brief encounter. There is a distinction between a brief encounter and an intimate association as it pertains to either the relationship among jurors or between jurors and witnesses. St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988).

Attempt by Jury Foreman to Convey Information on Defendant's Criminal Record to Jury — Remand for New Trial: The jury foreman heard in a third-party conversation that "defendant had a criminal record as long as your arm" and attempted to convey the information to the rest of the jury. Although the jury declined to hear the offered information, the injury to defendant had already occurred when the foreman heard the prejudicial comments and informed the remaining jurors that he had reliable information from the Sheriff's office. The District Court denied a motion for mistrial after examining three jurors, but the Supreme Court would not assume that the entire panel was safeguarded from contamination. In remanding for a new trial, the Supreme Court held that the presumption of prejudice that was created when uncontroverted evidence established that prejudicial statements reached one or more jurors was not rebutted when no evidence existed to rebut the presumption other than testimony of three of the jurors. St. v. DeGraw, 235 M 53, 764 P2d 1290, 45 St. Rep. 2154 (1988), distinguishing St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245 (1984), and St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544 (1983).

Mistrial Denied Despite Juror Misconduct — No Error: A juror disregarded trial court instructions by talking with a County Attorney, who assisted in the prosecution, about the propriety of allowing evidence of child abuse in open court. Another juror was seen entering Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) offices after evidence was allowed showing the agency was peripherally involved in the case, and there was evidence the juror discussed the defendant and her children during a conversation at a restaurant. Arguably, the jury misconduct tended to injure the defendant, and therefore prejudice should be presumed; however, the trial judge could determine that there was sufficient evidence to rebut the presumption. Since there was not clear and convincing evidence of error in denying a motion for mistrial, the ruling was affirmed. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), followed in St. v. Salois, 235 M 276, 766 P2d 1306, 45 St. Rep. 2382 (1988).

Mistrial Following Hung Jury — Bailiff Misconduct — Original Jeopardy Not Terminated: Following mistrial because of a jury deadlock, defendant petitioned for a Writ of Supervisory Control, claiming double jeopardy. He contended that misconduct on the part of the bailiff was chargeable to the State in the same manner as misconduct committed by a prosecutor or judge. The Supreme Court refused the petition, but proceeded to declare that in Montana a mistrial following a hung jury does not terminate the original jeopardy. If governmental conduct giving rise to a motion for mistrial was intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial, then retrial might properly be prohibited. However, the court held that comments by the bailiff were not intended to provoke defendant into moving for mistrial. State ex rel. Forsyth v. District Court, 216 M 480, 701 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 965 (1985), overruled in Keating v. Sherlock, 278 M 218, 924 P2d 1297, 53 St. Rep. 855 (1996).

Defendant to Show Prejudice From Media Reports: Defendant was tried and convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. After the verdict, defense counsel polled the jury and discovered that a juror had read an entire newspaper article summarizing the case. The juror stated that this had not affected her opinions or deliberations. The District Court denied a motion for a mistrial. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the burden is on the defendant to show that: (1) the juror was specifically exposed to media reports; and (2) the reports were prejudicial to the defendant. Mere proof that a juror was exposed to a factual account of the trial did not meet this burden of proof. St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544, 40 St. Rep. 1576 (1983).

Jury Misconduct Not Grounds for New Trial Unless Material: A new trial will be ordered because of alleged jury misconduct only if the alleged misconduct affects a material matter in dispute and prejudices the complaining party. St. v. Maxwell, 198 M 498, 647 P2d 348, 39 St. Rep. 1149 (1982), followed in St. v. Sor-Lokken, 247 M 343, 805 P2d 1367, 48 St. Rep. 142 (1991).

Bailiff Telling Jury of Problem in Arranging Sleeping Quarters: During the evening, while the jurors were deliberating, the bailiff told them that he was having difficulty finding a place for them to stay overnight. However, shortly afterward, the bailiff told them that he had found a place. Additionally, the jurors had told him that despite the lateness of the hour, they wished to continue their deliberations. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had not been prejudiced by the bailiff's conduct. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Juror Facing Witness and Moving Mouth: Allegation that members of the jury were seen facing prosecution witnesses and moving their mouths was not proof that communication sufficient to warrant a new trial had taken place. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982), followed in St. v. Hedrick, 229 M 145, 745 P2d 355, 44 St. Rep. 1849 (1987); St. v. Counts, 209 M 242, 679 P2d 1245, 41 St. Rep. 681 (1984).

Nonprejudicial News Story During Trial: Defendant was tried and convicted of felony theft. Prior to trial several continuances were granted to avoid prejudice from articles about the defendant that were appearing in the local press. On the second day of trial, an article concerning the trial appeared in the local newspaper and defendant moved for a mistrial. The judge denied the motion and admonished the jury to refrain from reading the paper and listening to news broadcasts. Defendant appealed the denial of his motion, contending that the judge should have at least interrogated the jurors. The Supreme Court held that absent any indication on the record of prejudice to appellant so grave as to deny him a fair trial, the District Court properly exercised its discretion in denying the motion. The admonition to the jury was sufficient to correct any damaging influence from the news article. St. v. Weaver, 195 M 481, 637 P2d 23, 38 St. Rep. 2050 (1981).

Juror Misconduct — Presumption of Prejudice: The District Court failed to remove any prejudicial effect occasioned by statements by a juror in a public place which disqualified him as a juror. The court did not inquire into an alleged statement by the juror that "half of the jury is Hanson's friends" nor did it act properly in allowing the juror to sit until the end of the day on which the court determined his misconduct before substituting an alternate. The presumption of prejudice remained because the members of the jury were not interrogated to determine if they had been contaminated. St. v. Eagen, 178 M 67, 582 P2d 1195 (1978).

Invitation to Juror to Participate in Experiment: The prosecuting attorney's invitation to a juror to participate in an experiment not supported by the evidence was harmless error because the juror did not participate and the court immediately sustained the defendant's objection. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Admonition to Jury: When a jury was completed on the afternoon of the sixth of the month and an adjournment was then taken until the seventh and at noon on the seventh a recess was taken until 1:30 p.m. of that day, a new trial was not granted because of the failure of the court to give to the jury the full statutory admonition since the jury was properly admonished, as required by the former section, at each adjournment taken after the noon recess on the seventh. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

Showing of Compliance With Statute: The record on appeal in a criminal case which disclosed that when an adjournment was taken "the jury was admonished by the court and placed in charge of the sheriff" was sufficient to disclose compliance with a former statute, imported verity, and could not be impeached by affidavit. St. v. Hall, 55 M 182, 175 P 267 (1918).

GENERAL

Jurors' Unauthorized View of Crime Scene — No Prejudice to Defendant: The defendant was not prejudiced by the improper view taken by two jurors of the crime scene. The state successfully rebutted the presumption that defendant was prejudiced by the unauthorized view. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Visits to Scene — Purpose: In considering a motion to suppress evidence discovered during a search of the defendant's motel room, the trial judge visited the room under circumstances allegedly similar to those on the night of the search. In expressing its disapproval of the trial court's participation in the recreation of the scene, the Supreme Court stated that visits to the scene should be designed for the trier of fact to view the scene, not for the trier of fact to place himself in the shoes of one of the parties. St. v. Wilson, 218 M 359, 708 P2d 270, 42 St. Rep. 1647 (1985).

Experimenting With Exhibit: The jury may have the privilege of examining a dangerous instrument provided that the jury does not use it in any different manner than that involved in the testimony and that no new fact is discovered from its experiment which is hurtful to the defendant. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Failure to Object to Jury View: By failing to object to an order of the trial court, made in its discretion and at the close of the testimony in a prosecution for murder, permitting the jury to view an automobile in which the shooting occurred, the defendant waived his right to secure a review of the propriety of the order. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

DISCRETION OF COURT

Jury View of Crime Scene Denied — Other Evidence:

The defendant's testimony as to how the gun fired was, with or without corroboration, sufficient credible evidence for the jury to find guilt of negligent homicide. Hence, the court's denial of a jury view was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Bier, 181 M 27, 591 P2d 1115 (1979).

The trial court did not abuse its discretion in denying a jury view of the crime scene since there was extensive testimony describing the scene of the shooting, a 45-mile trip one way under zero-degree weather conditions would have diminished the jurors' ability to perceive and appreciate the subtleties the defendant suggests inhered in the scene, and there was a significant danger that the jury might be misled by the view. St. v. Gone, 179 M 271, 587 P2d 1291 (1978).

Condition of Premises: The facts that the premises to be viewed had accumulated dirt which had been hastily swept away, doors had been replaced, and the view was bleak and morbid furnished no ground for interfering with an order permitting a view of the premises. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

Permitting Jury to View Premises: Permitting the jury to view the premises rests entirely in the discretion of the trial court, which will not be interfered with except in cases of manifest abuse. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

Permitting Jury to View Cattle: Permitting the jury to view cattle charged to have been stolen by the defendant and recaptured was within the discretion of the trial court. St. v. Arnold, 84 M 348, 275 P 757 (1929).

DEFENDANT'S RIGHT TO BE PRESENT

Defendant's Right to Be Present at Jury View: A defendant's constitutional right to be present at all stages of the trial and to meet the witnesses against him face to face includes the right to be present at a jury view. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978).

Limitation on Waiver by Defendant: A waiver by the defendant through his counsel of his right to be present during the view by the jury did not include such a waiver as to a proceeding occurring at the jury view which amounted to a taking of testimony, unsworn testimony at that, in the absence of the defendant. St. v. Musgrove, 178 M 162, 582 P2d 1246 (1978).

Waiver of Defendant's Right to Be Present: Since the only purpose of a view by the jury of the place where a homicide was committed is to enable the jurors better to understand the evidence heard by them at the trial and testimony may not be taken there for any purpose, the defendant may waive his right to be present at the viewing, and when he did not make a request for permission to be present at the view of an automobile in and near which the shooting occurred, he will be held to have waived his right in that behalf. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute retains the substance of 1987 MCA 46-16-503. Subsection (2) has been rewritten for clarity and to reflect established procedure. The court has discretion to offer such information after consultation with the parties. The 1987 code appeared to require any additional information requested by the jury to be given to them in open court. The statute does not retain that requirement and is intended to reflect the prevailing practice.

1991 Amendment: In (2), at end of first sentence, substituted "shall notify the officer appointed to keep them together, who shall then notify the court" for "must require the officer to conduct them into court", at beginning of second sentence deleted "When the jurors are brought into court" and at end inserted "after consultation with the parties", and deleted former last sentence that read: "If such information is given, it must be given in the presence of the county attorney and the defendant and his counsel".

Case Notes

Video Equipment Supplied by Bailiff in Jury Room Without Court Approval — Harmless Error: After the jury retired for deliberations and while the presiding judge was unavailable, the jury asked the bailiff for video equipment to watch a patrol car DVD that had been entered into evidence. Rather than following protocol and obtaining permission of the judge, the bailiff took the requested equipment into the jury room and cued up one of the DVDs. Within minutes, the judge ordered the DVD and equipment removed. Hart moved for a mistrial on grounds that the jury's access to the evidence placed an undue emphasis on it in violation of due process. The motion was denied, and Hart appealed. Applying the analysis in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), the Supreme Court concluded that the state established that any error was harmless. The DVDs could not have contributed to Hart's conviction because other evidence was introduced to establish the same facts, and the DVDs actually supported both the state's and Hart's case theories and were used by both sides at trial. Thus, although the bailiff erred in supplying the video equipment without court approval, the error did not contribute to Hart's conviction and was harmless. Denial of the mistrial motion was affirmed. St. v. Hart, 2009 MT 268, 352 M 92, 214 P3d 1273 (2009).

No Abuse of Discretion in Denying Mistrial for Ordering Continued Jury Deliberations: Doyle moved for a mistrial after the trial court ordered the jury to continue deliberating after the jurors notified the court that they were at an impasse. Doyle contended that the trial court improperly pressured the jury to reach a decision and created the impression that the jury could return only a unanimous verdict rather than a hung jury and that the court failed to explain to the jurors that they should never give up their honest opinion concerning Doyle's guilt or innocence. The motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The transcript showed that the jury was in fact instructed that it should not surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of the evidence or the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The court sent the jury home the first day after 10 hours of deliberations when the jury informed the court that it could not reach a decision. At the end of the second day, the jury sent a note to the court informing the judge that the jury was at an impasse. The court asked the jury if it wished to go home or continue deliberations, and the jury opted to go home. The third day, the jury returned a unanimous guilty verdict. Based on the transcript, the trial court never forced deliberations, and the court did not abuse its discretion in denying Doyle's mistrial motion. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

Bailiff's Instructions to Split Jury to Continue Deliberations Not Reversible Error: Steele was charged with eight offenses and conceded guilt on all but one charge. During deliberations on the remaining charge, the jury became deadlocked and notified the bailiff. Outside the presence of the parties and without the court's approval, the bailiff told the jury that they needed to keep working on it and needed to find common ground. Steele contended that the bailiff's action denied the parties and counsel the opportunity to consult with the court in violation of this section and moved for mistrial. The motion was denied, and Steele appealed. It is not the prerogative of any court officer except the trial judge to give instructions to the jury regarding deliberations. However, without condoning the bailiff's actions, the Supreme Court held that the bailiff's instructions did not misadvise the jury but merely asked the jury to continue deliberating, the same instruction that the District Court would have offered, so a mistrial was not warranted on those grounds. Further, the jury did not disagree as to any testimony received or desire any information regarding the law, so this section was not triggered. Although not given or condoned by the trial judge, the bailiff's instructions did not attempt to pressure the jurors into reaching a verdict or assert to the minority jurors that their positions should change, as was the case in St. v. Randall, 137 M 534, 353 P2d 1054 (1960), so denial of the mistrial motion was proper. St. v. Steele, 2004 MT 275, 323 M 204, 99 P3d 210 (2004), distinguishing St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976). See also St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379 (1986).

Original Jury Instruction Constituting Law of Case Absent Objection — Erroneous Supplemental Jury Instruction Allowing Finding of Guilt When Only Portion of Property Subject to Forfeiture Composed of Drug Sale Proceeds — Abuse of Discretion in Allowing Conviction Based on Lesser Amount Than Charged: The state charged and prosecuted Crawford for possession of $1,025 in proceeds from an illegal drug sale, thus assuming the burden of proving that Crawford possessed approximately that amount and that it came from drug sales and refuting Crawford's alleged legitimate sources for any portion of that amount. At no time did the state offer evidence that only a portion of the amount came from drug sales or accept that possibility in its closing remarks. In jury instructions, the District Court informed the jury that the state had to prove the elements charged, that Crawford possessed $1,025 derived from drug sales, and that Crawford acted knowingly. During deliberations, the jury became confused as to how the instruction should be applied and sought clarification as to whether Crawford could still be convicted if the jury found that only a portion of the money came from drug sales. The District Court provided a supplemental instruction stating that Crawford could still be convicted on a lesser amount and supplied the jury with a special interrogatory allowing the jury to state the portion of the amount that was considered to be drug proceeds. The jury found that $225 of the $1,025 derived from drug sales, and Crawford was convicted. On appeal, Crawford argued that once given, the initial instruction became the law of the case absent objection and that giving the supplemental instruction was therefore an abuse of discretion. Crawford further contended that allowing the jury to find that only a portion of the amount charged was considered to be drug proceeds constituted an amendment to the information, which prejudiced Crawford by disallowing an adjustment to his defense strategy to rebut the state's reduced burden of proof. The Supreme Court agreed. When the state fails to object to a jury instruction, the instruction becomes the law of the case, whether it includes an unnecessary element or not, and the jury is accordingly bound by it. A supplemental instruction that allowed deviation from the original instruction requiring a finding that Crawford possessed $1,025 in drug sale proceeds was therefore an abuse of discretion. Further, because the jury found that only $225 was attributable to drug sales, the state failed to prove the monetary element of the offense as defined by the original jury instruction, so Crawford's conviction on the count of possession of property subject to forfeiture was reversed. St. v. Crawford, 2002 MT 117, 310 M 18, 48 P3d 706 (2002). See also St. v. Cline, 170 M 520, 555 P2d 724 (1976), and St. v. Hickman, 954 P2d 900 (Wash. 1998).

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Counsel, Defendant, and Court Reporter — Automatic Reversible Error Absent Recorded Waiver by Defendant of Constitutional Rights: On the second full day of jury deliberations in Tapson's trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated kidnapping, and attempted deliberate homicide, the trial judge met with counsel, on the record, to notify them that the jury had a verdict on one of the three counts, but was unable to reach a verdict on the other two counts. With Tapson present, the state suggested substituting the existing verdict form, which listed all three charges, with six verdict forms—one "guilty" form and one "not guilty" form for each of the three charges—to avoid the problem of the jury switching its current verdict on one charge for some sort of last minute compromise. The state also suggested that the judge take the forms into the jury room, rather than moving the jury and handling the matter in open court. Tapson's counsel stated that the defense did not have any objection to the proposition, so the judge took the forms into the jury room, without counsel or Tapson present, and returned 11 minutes later. There was no record of whether the judge spent the entire time with the jury, what the judge told the jury, whether the jury had any questions, or whether the judge gave any responses. Tapson was subsequently convicted of attempted deliberate homicide, although the jury could not reach a verdict on the other charges. Tapson was sentenced to life imprisonment, but appealed the conviction and sentence. The Supreme Court noted Tapson's fundamental constitutional right to be present and defend in person and by counsel, and the fundamental right to a public trial, which extends to the entire trial, including the judge's instructions to the jury. The state contended that defense counsel waived Tapson's right to be present, but the Supreme Court declined to engage in presumptions of waiver, holding that if a defendant chooses to waive these constitutional rights, the trial court must obtain an on-the-record personal waiver, by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently, and knowingly waives the rights. Thus, when there is some circumstance arguably making it necessary for a trial judge to enter the jury room while the jury is present, the court must contemporaneously explain to the defendant, on the record, the constitutional right to be present at all critical stages of the trial and the right to a public trial. The defendant may then choose to waive those rights. However, absent a contemporaneous, personal, knowing, voluntary, intelligent, on-the-record waiver by the defendant, if a judge enters a jury room while the jury is present and without counsel, the defendant, and the court reporter, reversal will be automatic. Tapson's constitutional rights were violated, so the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 US 422 (1978), and Commonwealth v. Patry, 722 NE 2d 979 (Mass. App. Ct. 2000), and distinguishing St. v. Harris, 1999 MT 115, 294 M 397, 983 P2d 881 (1999), and St. v. LaDue, 2001 MT 47, 304 M 288, 20 P3d 775 (2001).

Discretion of Trial Court to Allow Testimony to Be Read to Jury After Deliberations Begun — No Error: During deliberations in Thompson's trial on charges of sexually assaulting his child, the jury requested a copy of the child's testimony. The trial judge denied the request, explaining that the court could not repeat the testimony after deliberations had begun because it would place undue emphasis on the testimony. The jury explained that the child had spoken so softly during the hearing that several jury members were unable to hear the testimony. The judge reconsidered, determining that the child's testimony was both exculpatory and inculpatory, and discussed the jury's request with counsel for both parties. No objections were made, and after cautioning the jury not to give more weight to the child's testimony than any other testimony, the court allowed the child's testimony to be read to the jury. Thompson was convicted and appealed on grounds that allowing the testimony after jury deliberations had begun violated this section. The Supreme Court noted that it is within the discretion of the trial court whether to allow a jury to rehear testimony. In this case, the jury could not hear the child in the courtroom, and the child's testimony was an essential part of the case and included evidence favorable to both parties, so the trial court did not err in allowing the jury to hear the testimony during deliberations. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001). See also St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, 46-16-504 applied, rather than this section. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), and St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993).

Court's Refusal to Replay Testimony to Jury — Not Error: The District Court did not err in denying the jury's request to review testimony when the court recognized the danger of emphasizing the testimony of one witness over another as well as the danger of repeating portions of testimony out of context. St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995).

Jury Request for Replay of Partial Testimony — Failure to Give Harris Instruction Not Prejudicial to Defendant: Henrich was charged with various crimes resulting from sexual assault upon his daughters. The jury requested that it be allowed to hear a recording of certain testimony, whereupon the District Court determined the relevant portion of the testimony and allowed part of a victim's testimony to be played to the jury during its deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that it was error for the District Court not to give the instruction required by St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991). However, the Supreme Court held that because the only testimony as to the issues concerned in the recording was given by the witness and the defendant, the jury's need to balance the statements in the recording against the defendant's denial of committing the offense was obvious and therefore the need for the Harris instruction was minimal. The Supreme Court therefore held that the defendant was not prejudiced by the playing of the recording. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Replay of Testimony as Prejudicial Reversible Error: In a case decided prior to the decision in St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), the District Court committed reversible error when it allowed the jury to rehear the entire testimony of two witnesses who interviewed the child victim of alleged sexual abuse. Relying on the Harris standard, the Supreme Court remanded this case for a new trial on the issue because the playing of the recorded testimony unduly emphasized the testimony of the alleged victims to the exclusion of the testimony of other witnesses. St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Reading Entire Testimony at Jury's Request Improper:

Acting on the jury's written request to review a child abuse victim's testimony, the District Court overruled defendant's objection, escorted jury into the courtroom, and read victim's testimony in its entirety. In ruling that the District Court abused its discretion, the Supreme Court held that the reading of the testimony prejudiced the defendant by placing undue emphasis on the statement of the alleged victim to the exclusion of the testimony of other witnesses. St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), followed in St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Shortly after the jury retired for deliberations, a request was made to the court regarding verification of conflicting testimony. Defense counsel requested that certain testimony be read back to the jury. The court refused, noting that: (1) it was unclear exactly which information the jury wanted; (2) counsel would not be allowed to decide which testimony to read back; and (3) the jury had heard the evidence and would have to resolve it. The refusal by the trial court was a proper exercise of its discretion in providing the jury with trial testimony. St. v. Ulstad, 246 M 102, 802 P2d 1260, 47 St. Rep. 2278 (1990).

Court Delay in Responding to Jury Question — No Error: Although the jury was not brought into court after a note from the jury was delivered to the judge by the bailiff inquiring whether a hung jury was possible in the case, there was no error in the manner in which the court responded to the inquiry during deliberations. A response was prepared by the court and approved by defendant and all counsel, but by the time the response was delivered to the jury, it had reached a verdict. St. v. Pambrun, 240 M 62, 783 P2d 374, 46 St. Rep. 1944 (1989).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992).

Alternate Juror — Conversation After Jury Retires: A jury alternate returned to the jury room with the jury after the case had been submitted for decision, which defendant contended was reversible error, since 46-16-503 requires an officer of the court to prevent conversations between the jurors and others after the jury retires. The Supreme Court held that an alternate, although excluded from deliberating and voting, is in every other respect a juror; therefore, an alternate does not fall within the statutory ban against conversations with others. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Verdict Not Invalid Per Se Because of Jurors' Drinking: An insurer maintained that the jury verdict was invalid per se because of "drinking by a jury after deliberations have begun". The Supreme Court, noting its decision in Wibaux Realty Co. v. N. Pac. Ry. Co., 101 M 126, 54 P2d 1175 (1935), held that unless a party litigant is culpable, the consumption of alcoholic beverages by a juror during deliberations, which consumption is not excessive and which is not shown to have led to a miscarriage of justice, is not grounds for reversal of a jury verdict. While cautioning judges and bailiffs that no persons serving on a jury should be allowed alcoholic beverages during deliberations, particularly at county expense, the court declined to adopt a per se rule invalidating jury verdicts on the record presented here. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Amendment of Instruction: The trial court's action constituted a material amendment of the information that substantially prejudiced the rights of the defendants when it amended a jury instruction in response to a question from the jury but did so in the absence of counsel. St. v. Bretz, 180 M 307, 590 P2d 614 (1979).

Court's Answer Proper: There was no abuse of discretion when the trial court answered a jury request after the matter was submitted to the jury. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 284, 573 P2d 1138 (1977).

Jury Misconduct — Police Report Not in Evidence: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading a police report that had not been admitted, to the material prejudice of the defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of the trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Withdrawal of Instruction — Effect: A court may withdraw an instruction after submission to the jury if the instruction is not a required instruction. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

Oral Instructions by Bailiff: When the jury was confused as to whether or not to sign three of the charges the jury had voted unanimously to acquit defendant of and requested the bailiff to convey a question to the judge for clarification, the oral instructions to the jury by the bailiff to sign only one of the charges not only violated the proscription against oral jury instructions but was patently prejudicial error as the defendant's attorney was not notified or present and had no way to protect his client from the jury's confusion. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976).

Use of Juror Affidavits to Show Misconduct: When the jury failed to reach a verdict and juror affidavits showed that, because of outside influences on the jury during its deliberations, a verdict of acquittal on three of the charges was actually rendered by the jury but not returned to the court due to confusion over jury instructions, justice compelled the use of the juror affidavits to prove what actually occurred and the rule that juror affidavits cannot be used to impeach jury verdicts did not apply as the jury did not return a verdict of any kind. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976).

Refusal of Further Instructions: When the attorneys objected to the answering of written questions submitted by the jury after retirement, the court properly informed the jury that the answers to the questions were contained in the instructions previously given and that the court could make no further instructions. St. v. Hawkins, 165 M 456, 529 P2d 1377 (1974), followed in St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995), and St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005).

Rereading Testimony at Jury's Request: It is within the trial court's discretionary power to grant a jury's request to reread parts of the testimony, and such procedure was authorized by the former statute. St. v. Armstrong, 149 M 470, 428 P2d 611 (1967).

Improper Oral Instructions: After retiring to the jury room to deliberate, the jury returned, asking the court whether two instructions given were conflicting. The court, in the absence of the defendant though in the presence of his attorney, orally instructed the jury to disregard one of them and withdrew it. The Supreme Court held that withdrawing the instruction and directing the jury to disregard it was instructing the jury orally, constituting reversible error. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930), distinguished in St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995).

Oral Advice Not Improper: When the jury was returned into court for information which had been excluded from the evidence and an affidavit which was admitted and the court orally advised them that the information had been excluded and that as to the affidavit they would have to determine for themselves, its action in not going further and instructing them orally as to what weight should be given the affidavit was proper since instructions, in the absence of a waiver by the parties, must be delivered in writing. St. v. Duncan, 82 M 170, 266 P 400 (1928).

1991 Amendment: Substituted present language concerning taking written instructions, notes, and exhibits for deliberations for former text that read: "Upon retiring for deliberation, the jury may take with them all papers which have been received as evidence in the cause, except depositions or copies of such papers as ought not, in the opinion of the court, to be taken from the person having them in his possession. The jury may also take with them any exhibits which the court may deem proper and notes of the proceedings taken by themselves".

Case Notes

Videotape of Interview With Defendant Allowed Into Jury Room — No Error: The day after a murder, police interviewed Giddings twice. At trial, the District Court allowed an edited version of the tape into evidence, and the jury watched the tape aided by a corresponding transcript during the state's case. The court advised the jury that they would not have the transcript in the jury room, but the court did allow the tape to accompany the jury during deliberations after determining that the tape was not testimonial in nature and simply constituted Giddings' voluntary statements the day after the homicide. Following conviction, Giddings appealed on grounds that allowing the tape into the jury room violated due process by unduly emphasizing his demeanor and statements to the exclusion of other witness testimony. The Supreme Court disagreed. The tape had limited evidentiary value due to its poor quality, and any evidentiary value that the jury derived from the tape came from watching the tape with the aid of the transcript during trial. Giddings was not prejudiced because his statements and demeanor on the tape did not conflict with testimony given by other witnesses at trial, nor was the tape critical to the state's case. Under the totality of the circumstances, the tape was at worst cumulative of other evidence, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the tape into the jury room. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009). See also St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17 (1999).

Improper Extrinsic Evidence Delivered to Jury — Evidentiary Error Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses Warranting New Trial: At Parker's trial for assault with a weapon, the state introduced a tape of interviews with Parker's children containing the children's observations of the events in question. Unbeknownst to Parker, the tape also contained an interview with another party that implicated Parker. The tape was submitted to the jury during deliberations. Following conviction, Parker contended on appeal that the jury's exposure to the extrinsic evidence, which was never entered into evidence, violated Parker's right to confrontation. The Supreme Court agreed. The interview was of sufficient quality to prejudice Parker's defense and contribute to the conviction, so Parker's right to confront the witness against him was violated when the tape was delivered to the jury. The court remanded for a new trial. St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006).

Taped Evidence Not Admitted at Trial Submitted to Jury — No Burden on Defendant to Object to Unknown Evidence: At Parker's trial for assault with a weapon, the state introduced a tape of interviews with Parker's children containing the children's observations of the events in question. Unbeknownst to Parker, the tape also contained an interview with another party that implicated Parker. The tape was submitted to the jury during deliberations. Following conviction, Parker contended on appeal that the jury's exposure to the extrinsic evidence, which was never entered into evidence, violated Parker's right to confrontation. The state asserted that Parker failed to preserve the issue for direct appeal because Parker did not object to delivery of the tape to the jury, that Parker could not establish that the jury actually heard the unintroduced interview and should pursue the claim through postconviction proceedings, and that delivery of the interview to the jury was harmless error, cumulative to other admissible evidence, and did not contribute to Parker's conviction. The Supreme Court disagreed. Parker could not object to evidence that he did not know existed, and it was illogical to saddle Parker with the burden of proving prejudice. Rather, when extrinsic evidence reaches a jury, the burden of disproving prejudice rests with the state. Parker's appeal was properly before the Supreme Court, and the state's invitation to dismiss the claim was declined. St. v. Parker, 2006 MT 258, 334 M 129, 144 P3d 831 (2006), distinguished in St. v. Wing, 2008 MT 218, 344 M 243, 188 P3d 999 (2008).

Discretion of Trial Court to Determine Whether Items May Be Taken Into Jury Room: It is within the sound discretion of the District Court to determine whether particular items of physical evidence that have been properly admitted and that are not proscribed by statute may be taken into the jury room during deliberations. In the present case, the District Court did not err in allowing into the jury room an exhibit containing three bindles, only one of which had been tested as containing dangerous drugs, in light of the fact that the jury was instructed not to speculate that the untested bindles also contained dangerous drugs. St. v. Long, 2005 MT 130, 327 M 238, 113 P3d 290 (2005). See also St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303 (1991).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, this section applied, rather than 46-16-503. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), and St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993).

Discretion of Court to Prohibit Jury From Taking Notes During Trial — Instruction Outside Presence of Counsel Not Error: Hage was convicted of deliberate homicide. During Hage's trial, the District Court Judge informed the jury members outside the presence of defendant and counsel that the jury would not be allowed to take notes during the trial. The Supreme Court held this section inapplicable because it concerns only the issue of whether notes that are taken by jury members may be taken with them for deliberations. Whether the taking of notes may be prohibited by the court in the first place is a matter left to the discretion of the court. The Supreme Court also held that it was not error for the District Court to give the instruction outside the presence of counsel because the subject of the judge's remarks was a matter within the discretion of the judge and no remark was made about any facts in evidence. St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993).

Jury Allowed to Take Tape Recordings Into Deliberations: It was within the discretion of the District Court to allow the jury to take tape recordings into the jury room during deliberations. The tapes had been admitted into evidence, and the jury was properly instructed as to the weight to be given the tapes. St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), followed in St. v. Christenson, 250 M 351, 820 P2d 1303, 48 St. Rep. 1034 (1991), and distinguished, and overruled to the extent that it is inconsistent with St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453, 48 St. Rep. 62 (1991), regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury, in St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999).

Jury Misconduct — Police Report Not in Evidence: When jury deliberations were tainted by reading a police report that had not been admitted, to the material prejudice of the defendant's right to an impartial jury, to confront witnesses, and to assistance of counsel at every critical stage of the trial, a new trial was required. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Experimenting With Exhibit: The jury may have the privilege of examining a dangerous instrument provided that the jury does not use it in any different manner than that involved in the testimony and that no new fact is discovered from its experiment which is hurtful to the defendant. St. v. Thompson, 164 M 415, 524 P2d 1115 (1974).

Taking Photographs to Jury Room: In a criminal prosecution for involuntary manslaughter, photographs of the scene of the accident are "all papers" within the meaning of that phrase as it appears in the statute. Thus, the trial court properly sent the photographs along with the jury when they retired to the jury room for deliberations. St. v. Medicine Bull, 152 M 34, 445 P2d 916 (1968).

Taking Depositions to Jury Room: It was error for the trial court to send to the jury room as an exhibit an alleged confession headed "Affidavit", which to all intents and purposes was a deposition, in view of a former section which expressly prohibited the jury from taking depositions to the jury room for consideration during its deliberations. St. v. Crighton, 97 M 387, 34 P2d 511 (1934).

No Presumption of Prejudice: When exhibits consisting of photographs that had been admitted in evidence without objection by the defendant were taken to the jury room at the close of the trial, apparently without the affirmative consent of the defendant and without an order of the court permitting it to be done, but there was no showing that by the procedure the jury was given any other information than that obtained at the trial, it may not be presumed that the procedure resulted in prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Cates, 97 M 173, 33 P2d 578 (1934).

Consent to Taking Exhibits to Jury Room:

After the jury members had retired to the jury room for deliberation of their verdict, they requested certain exhibits be sent to them. While the defendant was not present in the courtroom, his counsel gave his consent. The Supreme Court held that the proceeding did not constitute a part of the trial and therefore the defendant's presence was not required. St. v. Olson, 87 M 389, 287 P 938 (1930).

Exhibits introduced in evidence in a prosecution for murder which are sent to the jury during its retirement will not be considered as having been received out of court when it is found on a motion for a new trial that counsel for the defendant consented to their being taken to the jury room during the jury's retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Waiver of Objection: When on a motion for a new trial it is found that the counsel for the defendant consented to the taking of certain exhibits to the jury room previously admitted in evidence on a prosecution for murder, such consent constitutes a waiver of any objection to the sending of the exhibits to the jury during retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Taking Newspapers to Jury Room:

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has received any evidence, papers, or documents, not authorized by the court", the word "papers" referred to such written instruments as might be competent testimony when inspected by the court and found to be competent under the Rules of Evidence and does not include newspapers; and the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the case does not in itself vitiate the verdict. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has been separated without leave of court, or been guilty of any misconduct, tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case", the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the trial adverse to the defendant is misconduct tending to show injury to the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890). See also St. v. Pepo, 23 M 473, 59 P 721 (1900).

Part Commission Comments

1991 Part Comments: This part retains the 1987 code provisions for the delivery of a verdict and the disposition of the defendant. See 1987 MCA 46-16-603 through 46-16-605. These statutes amend the 1987 code, but no change in established procedure is anticipated.

Part Case Notes

Findings and Conclusions — Incapacity to Consent: A District Court in a criminal bench trial is under no statutory duty, except in death penalty cases, to make findings. Absent findings, the conclusions of law reached by the court could be construed to mean that the court found lack of the victim's consent (to sexual contact) from his incapacity as a 10-year-old to consent or that in any event the boy did not consent. In that the conclusions of law reached by a trial court do not enjoy the level of inviolability that findings of fact are accorded on appeal, in that the State concedes the inapplicability of the incapacity statutes, and in that there was found sufficient evidence to support a conclusion that the boy did not in fact consent, the conviction on the sexual assault counts is sustained on the basis of the boy not having consented. Commission Comments 1991 Comment: This statute preserves the substance of 1987 MCA 46-16-603. The 1987 code required the jury to return a general verdict for each charge; that statute was amended to direct the jury to return a verdict as instructed by the court. The statute permits flexibility in the type of verdict and the manner in which it is delivered. The amendment should not cause a significant change in practice.

Although a less-than-unanimous verdict is tolerated by the federal constitution, the state constitution requires a unanimous verdict. Compare Apodaca v. Oreg., 406 US 404, 410-12 (1972), and Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-1915, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-16-604 is also derived from section 95-1915. The commission comments to section 95-1915 are printed in their entirety under 46-16-603.

[Section 46-16-603(1)] requires that the verdict be unanimous in felony cases as does the present Montana law, (R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7403 [repealed], Article III, section 23 [1889 Mont. Const., revised by Art. II, sec. 26, 1972 Mont. Const.].)

[Section 46-16-603(2)] is self-explanatory and is in harmony with the present law. It makes it unnecessary to retry the case as to all defendants even though the jury may have been able to decide the guilt or innocence of some of them.

[Section 46-16-603(3)] makes no change in the present law.

[Section 46-16-604] raises the question whether a poll of the jury might be had after the return of a sealed verdict. If so, then it may be possible for the jury to be directed to return for further deliberations, even if they have been separated over a weekend or some other period of time.

[Section 46-16-604] provides for the polling of the jury by any party or upon motion of the court. The present law provides only that the jury may be polled at the request of either party.

1991 Amendment: In (1) substituted "verdict as instructed by the court" for "general verdict to each offense charged"; deleted (3) that read: "(3) The defendant may be found guilty of an offense necessarily included in the offense charged or of an attempt to commit either the offense charged or an offense necessarily included therein if the attempt is an offense"; and made minor change in style.

Applicability of Commission Comments: The applicability of commission comments should be evaluated with reference to subsequent amendments.

Case Notes

Failure of Counsel to Request Unanimity Instructions on Two Counts of Criminal Endangerment Not Considered Ineffective Assistance: Gallagher was convicted of two counts of criminal endangerment and asserted on appeal that failure of defense counsel to request specific unanimity instructions on the two charges constituted ineffective assistance and denied Gallagher the right to a fair trial. Based on the record, the Supreme Court disagreed. Both defense and prosecution counsel argued each count to the jury in closing arguments, linking appropriate facts and specific victims to each count, so juror confusion was extremely unlikely, nor could the court conclude that the trial outcome was prejudiced by the lack of a specific unanimity instruction on the endangerment charges that denied Gallagher a fair trial. Gallagher's convictions were affirmed. St. v. Gallagher, 2005 MT 336, 330 M 65, 125 P3d 1141 (2005).

Entry of Trial Court Judge Into Jury Room Without Counsel, Defendant, and Court Reporter — Automatic Reversible Error Absent Recorded Waiver by Defendant of Constitutional Rights: On the second full day of jury deliberations in Tapson's trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, aggravated kidnapping, and attempted deliberate homicide, the trial judge met with counsel, on the record, to notify them that the jury had a verdict on one of the three counts, but was unable to reach a verdict on the other two counts. With Tapson present, the state suggested substituting the existing verdict form, which listed all three charges, with six verdict forms—one "guilty" form and one "not guilty" form for each of the three charges—to avoid the problem of the jury switching its current verdict on one charge for some sort of last minute compromise. The state also suggested that the judge take the forms into the jury room, rather than moving the jury and handling the matter in open court. Tapson's counsel stated that the defense did not have any objection to the proposition, so the judge took the forms into the jury room, without counsel or Tapson present, and returned 11 minutes later. There was no record of whether the judge spent the entire time with the jury, what the judge told the jury, whether the jury had any questions, or whether the judge gave any responses. Tapson was subsequently convicted of attempted deliberate homicide, although the jury could not reach a verdict on the other charges. Tapson was sentenced to life imprisonment, but appealed the conviction and sentence. The Supreme Court noted Tapson's fundamental constitutional right to be present and defend in person and by counsel, and the fundamental right to a public trial, which extends to the entire trial, including the judge's instructions to the jury. The state contended that defense counsel waived Tapson's right to be present, but the Supreme Court declined to engage in presumptions of waiver, holding that if a defendant chooses to waive these constitutional rights, the trial court must obtain an on-the-record personal waiver, by the defendant, acknowledging that the defendant voluntarily, intelligently, and knowingly waives the rights. Thus, when there is some circumstance arguably making it necessary for a trial judge to enter the jury room while the jury is present, the court must contemporaneously explain to the defendant, on the record, the constitutional right to be present at all critical stages of the trial and the right to a public trial. The defendant may then choose to waive those rights. However, absent a contemporaneous, personal, knowing, voluntary, intelligent, on-the-record waiver by the defendant, if a judge enters a jury room while the jury is present and without counsel, the defendant, and the court reporter, reversal will be automatic. Tapson's constitutional rights were violated, so the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Tapson, 2001 MT 292, 307 M 428, 41 P3d 305 (2001), following St. v. Reed, 65 M 51, 210 P 756 (1922), St. v. Allison, 116 M 352, 153 P2d 141 (1944), U.S. v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 US 422 (1978), and Commonwealth v. Patry, 722 NE 2d 979 (Mass. Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Return of Blank Verdict Form — No General Rule: Turner was charged under the felony-murder rule for complicity in a prison riot that led to the deaths of several other inmates. The jury reached an inconclusive verdict on the underlying burglary charge, returning a blank verdict form. Turner contended that under St. v. Weinberger, 206 M 110, 671 P2d 567 (1983), a blank verdict form is a not guilty verdict. Distinguishing Weinberger, the Supreme Court declined to define the meaning of a blank verdict form in any given case or to state a general rule, noting the jury's intent from the record and holding that the jury's blank verdict had no impact on the ultimate issue of whether the state sustained its burden of proof. St. v. Turner, 265 M 337, 877 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 467 (1994).

Defendant Alleging Inconsistent Verdict: The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of aggravated burglary, aggravated kidnapping, and felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and not guilty of robbery and theft. The defendant argued that the verdict was inconsistent because if the jury found him innocent of robbery, it could not find him guilty of aggravated burglary and kidnapping. The Supreme Court held that the verdict was not inconsistent because the jury could find that the defendant had inflicted bodily injury while acting with the purpose to commit a robbery but had not completed the robbery. St. v. LaPier, 242 M 335, 790 P2d 983, 47 St. Rep. 760 (1990).

Initial Verdict Not Unanimous — No Mistrial: In considering the criminal charge against the defendant, the jury returned to the courtroom and disclosed its vote of 10 to 2 in favor of conviction. The judge did not make a prohibited inquiry of the jury as to its numerical division, nor was it reversible error for the judge to ask the jury to return to the jury room for a reasonable time to attempt to reach a unanimous decision when he emphasized that no juror should think any pressure was being placed on him to reach a unanimous decision. Given the manner in which the jury disclosed its initial vote, the trial court was correct in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the initial verdict. St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379, 43 St. Rep. 26 (1986).

Jury Not to Consider Sentence: District Court properly refused to give and avoided prejudicial error by refusing to give defendant's requested instruction that there is a mandatory 2-year sentence for each verdict of guilty of kidnapping which may not be suspended or deferred by the court. Sentencing is solely for the court, and the jury is not to consider possible punishment upon conviction. St. v. Herrera, 197 M 462, 643 P2d 588, 39 St. Rep. 731 (1982).

Use of Juror Affidavits to Show Misconduct: When the jury failed to reach a verdict and juror affidavits showed that, because of outside influences on the jury during its deliberations, a verdict of acquittal on three of the charges was actually rendered by the jury but not returned to the court due to confusion over jury instructions, justice compelled the use of the juror affidavits to prove what actually occurred and the rule that juror affidavits cannot be used to impeach jury verdicts did not apply as the jury did not return a verdict of any kind. St. v. Herron, 169 M 193, 545 P2d 678 (1976), distinguished in St. v. White Clay, 1998 MT 244, 291 M 147, 967 P2d 370, 55 St. Rep. 1014 (1998).

Manslaughter Included in Murder:

When the defendant was charged under former law with murder in the second degree, it was permissible for the jury to find him guilty of involuntary manslaughter. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

An information under former law charging murder, when stripped of the terms conveying the idea of deliberation, premeditation, and malice, sufficiently charged manslaughter, and the accused could be found guilty of the lesser offense. St. v. Crean, 43 M 47, 114 P 603 (1911).

When under former law there was evidence tending to show that the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree, murder in the second degree, and manslaughter, it was the duty of the court to instruct that a verdict for manslaughter could be returned since manslaughter was not a degree of murder. St. v. Shadwell, 26 M 52, 66 P 508 (1901).

Failure to Object to Instructions — Verdict Reviewable: The failure of the defendant to object to instructions under former law on first degree murder did not deprive him of the right to ask for a new trial on the ground that the evidence did not justify a verdict of murder in that degree. St. v. Gunn, 85 M 553, 281 P 757 (1929).

Technical Pleading Rules Inapplicable: A verdict is not subject to the technical rules that govern pleadings. Tripp v. Silver Dyke Min. Co., 70 M 120, 224 P 272 (1924); Consol. Gold & Sapphire Min. Co. v. Struthers, 41 M 565, 111 P 152 (1910).

Offense Found Independent of Offense Charged:

A party cannot be charged with one crime and be convicted of another independent offense. Thus, under former law a verdict of guilty of malicious destruction of property was insufficient under a charge of the malicious burning of property. The offense found did not include the offense charged. In such a case it was the right and duty of the trial court to require the jury to return some form of verdict authorized by law or to report a disagreement. St. v. Sieff, 54 M 165, 168 P 524 (1917).

Under former law, when the defendant was specifically charged with burglary in the nighttime, constituting the first degree of the offense of burglary, the jury could not convict him of the crime in the second degree, as having been committed in the daytime, since the former did not include the latter; the defendant needed only meet the accusation as made and not another and a different one, and the prosecution was held to proof of the charge as set out in the information. St. v. Copenhaver, 35 M 342, 89 P 61 (1907).

Court's Charge — Restricting Consideration of Lesser Offense: While under former law the offense of kidnapping included the minor offenses of false imprisonment and assault in the third degree, the court did not need to so formulate the charge that the jury could find the defendant guilty of a lower offense or of an included offense when the evidence was such as to show that the defendant was guilty of the offense charged or was entitled to an acquittal. St. v. McDonald, 51 M 1, 149 P 279 (1915).

Verdict Upon Finding of Insanity: Under former law when the defendant, charged with assault in the first degree, relied wholly upon the defense of insanity, the court's instruction that the jury might find the defendant guilty of assault in the first, second, or third degree or not guilty was inaccurate; the jury should have been told that, if they found him not guilty because insane, their verdict should be "not guilty by reason of insanity". St. v. Crowe, 39 M 174, 102 P 579 (1909).

Presence of Jurors When Verdict Delivered: When the record did not show that the jurors were not all present when the verdict was delivered and from the minutes no other fair inference could be drawn than that they were actually present at the time, the omission from the minutes of a statement that their names were called prior to delivery of the verdict was not an error that prejudiced the defendant in his substantial rights. St. v. DeLea, 36 M 531, 93 P 814 (1908).

Jury's Misunderstanding of Instructions: The affidavits of two jurors, filed in aid of a motion for a new trial by the defendant in a prosecution for murder, in which both stated that they had misunderstood the instructions of the court, which clearly charged the jury that it could find the accused guilty of any grade of unlawful homicide or acquit him, in that from a reading of the instructions the two jurors were under the impression that the jury was required to either find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or acquit him, and that being unwilling to acquit they voted for murder in the first degree rather than declare him innocent, did not show such misconduct on the part of the jury as to entitle the defendant to a new trial. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Case Notes

Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Initial Verdict Not Unanimous — No Mistrial: In considering the criminal charge against the defendant, the jury returned to the courtroom and disclosed its vote of 10 to 2 in favor of conviction. The judge did not make a prohibited inquiry of the jury as to its numerical division, nor was it reversible error for the judge to ask the jury to return to the jury room for a reasonable time to attempt to reach a unanimous decision when he emphasized that no juror should think any pressure was being placed on him to reach a unanimous decision. Given the manner in which the jury disclosed its initial vote, the trial court was correct in refusing to grant a mistrial because of the initial verdict. St. v. George, 219 M 377, 711 P2d 1379, 43 St. Rep. 26 (1986).

Verdict by Full Panel: When on the poll of the jury one juror answered that the verdict of guilty of burglary was his verdict provided that the sentence was suspended but thereafter, upon inquiry by the court, unqualifiedly answered that it was his verdict, a motion for dismissal of the information on the ground that the verdict had not been rendered by a full panel was properly denied. St. v. Asher, 63 M 302, 206 P 1091 (1922).

1991 Amendment: At beginning substituted "a verdict of not guilty is returned" for "judgment of acquittal is given on a general verdict" and at end, after "given", deleted "except, where the acquittal is because of a variance between the pleading and proof which may be obviated by a new indictment or information, the court may order his detention to the end that a new indictment or information may be filed by the county attorney"; and made minor change in style.

Value of Stolen Property at Issue — Error in Refusal of Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: Where the defendant had been charged with the felony theft of a guitar alleged to have a value of more than $150, the District Court erred in refusing an instruction requiring the jury to convict the defendant of the lesser included offense of misdemeanor theft if they found the value of the guitar to be less than $150 (raised to $300 by 1983 amendment). Under the rationale of St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973), the instruction should have been given because the weight of the evidence of value of the guitar was a question for the jury. St. v. Young, 206 M 19, 669 P2d 239, 40 St. Rep. 1474 (1983).

Modification of Verdict Without New Trial: Under a former statute providing that when the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence but the evidence shows the accused to be guilty only of a lesser degree or a lesser included offense rather than the degree of which he was convicted, the court could modify the judgment without granting a new trial. The expression "the verdict is contrary to the evidence" meant the same thing as the expression "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict". St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is a newly developed provision intended to regulate a jury's consideration of lesser included offenses. The statute allows a lesser included offense instruction only upon a party's request and only if the evidence warrants it. The Commission recognized that the statute makes significant changes in established procedure. The statute has been drafted to comport with a recent Ninth Circuit Court decision. See U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Case Notes

No Possibility of Lesser Plea Instruction — No Error in Denial of Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: As part of a plea agreement, Swensen pleaded guilty to felony assault and signed a waiver of rights, including the right to a jury instruction on a lesser included offense. Swensen subsequently moved to withdraw the guilty plea on grounds that the District Court failed to specifically advise him about the lesser included offense of misdemeanor assault during the change of plea hearing. The District Court denied the motion and Swensen was sentenced pursuant to the terms of the plea agreement. Swensen appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A court may at any time before judgment and within 1 year after final judgment allow a defendant to withdraw a guilty plea upon a showing of good cause, which includes the minimal constitutional requirement that a guilty plea be voluntary and intelligent and may include additional criteria such as the discovery of new exculpatory evidence. In this case, Swensen's guilty plea to aggravated assault was voluntary, and the District Court's interrogation during the change of plea hearing was adequate. Additionally, Swensen's admissions on the record about the nature of the injuries inflicted on the victim effectively eliminated the possibility that Swensen was entitled to a lesser included offense instruction. Absent good cause, the District Court did not err in denying Swensen's motion to withdraw the guilty plea. St. v. Swensen, 2009 MT 42, 349 M 268, 203 P3d 786 (2009). See also St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 265, 968 P2d 705 (1998).

No Prejudice Arising From Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Reversal Unwarranted: Potter was charged with aggravated assault. At trial, the District Court included two lesser included offense instructions for attempted aggravated assault and assault, and Potter objected to including the attempted aggravated assault instruction. The jury returned a guilty verdict on the aggravated assault charge. On appeal, Potter contended that the court erred by instructing the jury on attempted aggravated assault because attempted aggravated assault is not a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. However, the jury never reached the question of whether Potter committed the lesser offense, so Potter was not prejudiced by inclusion of the attempted aggravated assault instruction. Absent prejudice, the Supreme Court declined to reverse the conviction. St. v. Potter, 2008 MT 381, 347 M 38, 197 P3d 471 (2008).

Lesser Misdemeanor Assault Instruction Properly Refused Absent Evidentiary Support: At Johnson's trial for aggravated assault, Johnson contended that the trial court improperly refused to give the jury an instruction on the lesser offense of misdemeanor assault. The trial court held that the evidence did not warrant a lesser offense instruction, and on appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. The victim suffered two dislocated shoulders representing very severe trauma, with the possibility of injuries to the heart and lungs. One shoulder was permanently impaired, limiting the victim's range of motion and preventing the victim from returning to preinjury employment. Thus, the victim suffered more than pain, impairment, or reasonable apprehension of bodily injury characterizing misdemeanor assault. The evidence did not support a lesser misdemeanor offense instruction, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to give one. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008).

No Right to Be Informed of Possibility of Lesser Included Offense When No Such Possibility Exists: Defendant was charged with felony attempted sexual assault, but ultimately pleaded nolo contendere to a charge of felony attempted kidnapping. After being sentenced to 10 years in prison, defendant appealed the conviction on grounds that the trial court erred by failing to inform defendant that he could have been convicted on a lesser charge of unlawful restraint and by failing to allow withdrawal of the guilty plea. However, only those lesser included offenses applicable to the charge of felony attempted sexual assault were relevant to defendant's decision to plead nolo contendere. The court and the state could not be faulted for failing to inform defendant of any lesser included offense that was not relevant to defendant's decision, and defendant had no right to be informed of the possibility of submitting a lesser included offense instruction to the jury when no such possibility existed. Absent anything in the record that an omission, misinformation, or mental incapacity hindered defendant's ability to enter knowingly and intelligently into a plea agreement, the trial court did not err in holding that defendant failed to establish good cause to withdraw the plea, and the Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Iafornaro, 2007 MT 77, 336 M 489, 155 P3d 1238 (2007).

Jury Instruction Regarding Effect of Intoxication on Mens Rea Properly Rejected: Following conviction for deliberate homicide, Smith asserted that the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury regarding evidence of Smith's intoxication when considering whether Smith acted with intent to commit the crime. Smith contended that 45-2-203 unconstitutionally violated due process by excluding evidence of intoxication in determining mental state. The Supreme Court noted that the due process issue had been decided contrary to Smith's argument in Mont. v. Egelhoff, 518 US 37 (1996), so declining Smith's intoxication instruction was not error. Viewed as a whole, the jury instructions fully and fairly instructed the jury on the applicable law, and Smith's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 325, 329 M 526, 127 P3d 353 (2005), distinguishing U.S. v. Burdeau, 168 F3d 352 (9th Cir. 1999).

Failure to Give Jury Instruction on Lesser Included Offense of Unlawful Restraint in Aggravated Kidnapping Trial — Reversible Error: In Meyer's aggravated kidnapping trial, Meyer requested a jury instruction allowing the jury to consider unlawful restraint as a lesser included offense, but the instruction was denied. The Supreme Court noted that what constitutes isolation in terms of kidnapping and unlawful restraint is an issue for the trier of fact to decide, as long as there is some basis in the evidence for its conclusion. The jury as trier of fact in this case did not receive full and fair instructions on the applicable law and thus was not allowed to consider whether Meyer was guilty of the lesser included offense of unlawful restraint in light of the evidence. The judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Meyer, 2005 MT 215, 328 M 247, 119 P3d 1214 (2005).

Misinformation in Plea Agreement and Incomplete Information Provided by District Court Raising Doubt as to Intelligent Guilty Plea — Denial of Withdrawal of Plea Reversed: Rave was charged with sexual assault with bodily injury. Following advice of counsel, Rave accepted a plea agreement and pleaded guilty. Prior to sentencing, Rave moved to withdraw the guilty plea, but the motion was denied, and Rave was sentenced pursuant to the plea agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the plea agreement erroneously advised Rave that sexual assault may be a lesser included felony offense and that the penalty was the same as for sexual assault with bodily injury when, in fact, the lesser included offense was a misdemeanor. In addition, the District Court did not correct the misinformation in the plea agreement when accepting the guilty plea, so Rave could not have made a knowing, intelligent, and voluntary plea. Thus, the Supreme Court reversed the denial of Rave's motion to withdraw the guilty plea and remanded for further proceedings. St. v. Rave, 2005 MT 78, 326 M 398, 109 P3d 753 (2005).

Lesser Included Offense Instruction on Resisting Arrest Not Warranted When Defendant Under Arrest at Time of Assault: Pittman was arrested for disorderly conduct, and Pittman assaulted an officer and attempted to assault other officers while at the detention center. At the trial for felony assault and felony attempted assault, Pittman contended that the jury should be given an instruction on the lesser included offense of resisting arrest, but the instruction was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Pittman was already under arrest when the felony assaults took place. Absent evidence in the record that would permit the jury to find Pittman guilty of resisting arrest and acquit on the felony charges, it was not error to deny Pittman's request for the lesser included offense instruction. St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Misdemeanor Assault Not Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Assault — Denial of Lesser Included Offense Instruction Not Error: In a sexual assault trial, Cameron requested a jury instruction that misdemeanor assault was a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The request was denied. On appeal, Cameron raised several arguments regarding the lesser included offense and claimed error in denial of the instruction. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. The court examined the elements of both offenses and concluded that the elements of misdemeanor assault and sexual assault are not similar and do not overlap. Thus, misdemeanor assault is not a lesser included offense of sexual assault. The jury was therefore properly instructed, and the sexual assault conviction was affirmed. St. v. Cameron, 2005 MT 32, 326 M 51, 106 P3d 1189 (2005), followed in St. v. Gerstner, 2009 MT 303, 353 M 86, 219 P3d 866 (2009).

No Prejudice to Defendant When Assistance of Counsel Not Deficient: Following conviction for deliberate homicide, Sellner filed a petition for postconviction relief based on ineffective assistance of counsel, contending that counsel was deficient in: (1) failing to investigate and present a case for justifiable use of force; (2) abandoning an attempted mitigated deliberate homicide defense; (3) pursuing a defense based on a civil suit filed against defendant; (4) failing to offer a "failure to agree" instruction to the jury; and (5) making other errors. The Supreme Court applied the Strickland test to determine whether counsel's performance was deficient and prejudicial, addressing each argument in turn, and concluded that Sellner's contentions of deficient counsel were unfounded. Absent a showing of deficient counsel, Sellner could not show prejudice, and the denial of the petition for postconviction relief was affirmed. Sellner v. St., 2004

MT 205, 322 M 310, 95 P3d 708 (2004), following St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

No Error in Failure to Give Instruction Citing Statutory Language Regarding Value When Adequately Covered in Another Instruction: In a trial for attempted theft, Maloney offered a jury instruction, drawing from the statutory definition of value in 45-2-101, which included language that if value cannot be determined beyond a reasonable doubt, the value must be considered to be less than $1,000. The District Court rejected that instruction and gave an instruction that adequately informed the jury that value was an element of attempted theft and that the jury had to find that the value in question exceeded $1,000 to find Maloney guilty of felony theft. Although Maloney's proposed instruction followed more closely the statutory definition, citing exact statutory language in an instruction is not necessary if the instructions given explain the crime. Maloney's instruction would have added little to the jury's understanding of the law, and the District Court did not err in rejecting Maloney's instruction when the element of value was adequately covered in another instruction. St. v. Maloney, 2003 MT 288, 318 M 66, 78 P3d 1214 (2003).

Criminal Endangerment, Negligent Endangerment, and Partner or Family Member Assault Not Considered Lesser Included Offenses of Aggravated Assault: At trial for aggravated assault, the District Court refused Hoffman's request of lesser included offense instructions on the offenses of criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and partner or family member assault, and Hoffman appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Under 46-1-202(8)(a), a lesser included offense is one that is established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish commission of the offense charged, while under 46-1-202(8)(c), a lesser included offense is one that differs from the offense charged only in the respect that a lesser kind of culpability suffices to establish its commission. Although Hoffman made prefatory reference to both subsections, the substance of Hoffman's argument focused entirely on subsection (8)(c), and the Supreme Court declined to address arguments related to subsection (8)(a) that were raised for the first time on appeal. It is incumbent on counsel to specify at trial which subsection is being relied upon. Subsection (8)(c) does not support a conclusion that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, or partner or family member assault is a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The District Court's properly concluded that the offenses were too dissimilar to warrant a lesser included offense instruction. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003), following St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626 (1994).

Improper Jury Instructions — Mitigated Deliberate Homicide Verdict Without First Finding Guilt of Deliberate Homicide — Reversible Error: Demontiney was charged with deliberate homicide. On the first morning of trial, counsel exchanged jury instructions, and neither party's instructions included mitigated deliberate homicide. Following 3 days of testimony, the state proposed an instruction on mitigated deliberate homicide, arguing that evidence introduced at trial obligated the state to offer the instruction. The trial court agreed and stated that the jury would be instructed on mitigated deliberate homicide. Consistent with St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202 (2000), the state prepared instructions and a verdict form incorporating the "failure to agree" concept, directing the jury to consider all evidence relating to both the greater and lesser charges before considering the verdict on the greater charge. Nevertheless, the trial court's instructions and verdict form did not match those offered by either party. Rather, the trial court instructed the jury that it should first consider the deliberate homicide charge, and if it reached a not guilty verdict or was unable to reach a verdict on that charge, it was then to consider the mitigated deliberate homicide charge. The jury found Demontiney not guilty of deliberate homicide, but guilty of mitigated deliberate homicide. The Supreme Court found that the jury instructions were not a full and fair instruction on the applicable law. The District Court was bound by Scarborough, whether the court agreed with that decision or not. A finding of guilt on mitigated deliberate homicide requires a finding of every element of deliberate homicide, plus an additional finding of extreme mental or emotional stress. Thus, the jury's verdict was logically impossible, prejudicing Demontiney, and the jury instructions constituted reversible error. The verdict was vacated, and Demontiney was immediately discharged. (See 2003 amendment to 45-5-103.) Demontiney v. District Court, 2002 MT 161, 310 M 406, 51 P3d 476 (2002).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel in Failure to Offer "Failure to Agree" Instruction — Prejudice Warranting Remand for New Trial: At Rogers' trial for attempted sexual intercourse without consent and felony assault, the District Court provided jury instructions with misdemeanor sexual assault and misdemeanor assault as lesser included offenses. Rogers' attorney requested the "acquittal first" instruction, which provided that the jury was not to consider the lesser included offenses unless they first acquitted on the greater offenses. Rogers contended that the failure of the attorney to request the "failure to agree" instruction allowed under this section, which provides that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if it is unable to reach a verdict on the greater offense, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel. The Supreme Court agreed. The "failure to agree" instruction was drafted to protect against the serious risk identified in U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984), which arises when jurors harboring a doubt as to defendant's guilt of the greater offense, but at the same time convinced that defendant had committed some offense, might wrongly yield to the majority and convict of the greater offense rather than not convict at all. The failure to offer this potentially beneficial instruction, when that failure is not part of counsel's trial strategy, is an error so serious that it falls outside the range of competence required of attorneys in criminal cases. Thus, when sufficient facts exist to support a conviction for a lesser included offense, defense counsel must offer the "failure to agree" instruction unless there is a tactical reason for not doing so, and failure to offer the instruction in such cases is prejudicial error. St. v. Rogers, 2001 MT 165, 306 M 130, 32 P3d 724 (2001).

No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing to Instruct Jury on Lesser Included Offense of Negligent Homicide Absent Supporting Evidence: German was convicted of attempted felony assault and deliberate homicide. At trial, the court instructed the jury on German's defense of justifiable use of force and gave a mitigated deliberate homicide instruction but refused to give a jury instruction regarding the lesser included offense of negligent homicide, finding no evidence to support the instruction. German appealed on grounds that the trial court erred in failing to give the negligent homicide instruction. The Supreme Court affirmed. District Courts have broad discretion in formulating jury instructions, including the authority to reject instructions that are not supported by evidence. A lesser included offense instruction must be given when properly requested and when the jury could be warranted in finding defendant guilty of the lesser included offense, based on the evidence, but the instruction need not be given if there is no evidence to support it. A lesser included offense instruction is not supported by the evidence when defendant's evidence or theory, if believed, would require an acquittal. Here, German's justifiable use of force defense, if proved, would have required an acquittal. German cited St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705 (1998), for the proposition that a defendant is generally entitled to a lesser included offense instruction and that the District Court may usurp the jury's function by factually deciding the merits of the lesser included offense. The Supreme Court disagreed. Martinez neither overruled nor was inconsistent with cases entitling defendant to a lesser included offense instruction when evidence supports the instruction, and in both civil and criminal proceedings, the determination of whether there is sufficient evidence to raise an issue of fact for a jury is a question of law for the trial court. Only when the trial court determines as a matter of law that factual disputes exist are those disputes turned over to the jury. In this case, German's own testimony was that he consciously made the decision to shoot the victim, so there was no support for a negligent homicide instruction and the trial court did not err in refusing to give one. St. v. German, 2001 MT 156, 306 M 92, 30 P3d 360 (2001), following St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933 (1996).

Failure of Counsel to Exercise Right to Lesser Included Offense Instruction — Presumption of Effective Assistance — Failure to Provide Evidence of Ineffectiveness: This section provides that upon a defendant's request, the court shall instruct the jury that the jury may consider a lesser included offense if the jury cannot reach a verdict on the greater offense after reasonable effort. Because of the strong presumption that counsel acted reasonably and defendant's failure to provide any evidence to the contrary, the court would not find that counsel provided ineffective assistance by failing to request the instruction. St. v. Hubbel, 2001 MT 31, 304 M 184, 20 P3d 111 (2001).

Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Assault of Peace Officer: Section 45-5-210 provides that criminal endangerment, negligent endangerment, and assault are not included as offenses of assault on a peace officer. Fuqua was convicted of assault on a peace officer and argued that 45-5-210 unconstitutionally eliminated consideration of his claim of negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense. The Supreme Court noted that negligent endangerment differs from assault on a peace officer by requiring a lesser kind of culpability and by requiring proof of different conduct; thus, negligent endangerment is not a lesser included offense of assault on a peace officer. Having so concluded, the court declined to address the constitutional question of whether the Legislature can specifically eliminate consideration of an offense as a lesser included offense. St. v. Fuqua, 2000 MT 273, 302 M 99, 13 P3d 34, 57 St. Rep. 1141 (2000).

Criteria Required Before Lesser Included Offense Instruction Required: Two criteria must be met before a defendant is entitled to a lesser included offense instruction: (1) the offense must actually constitute a lesser included offense of the offense charged; and (2) there must be sufficient evidence to support the lesser included offense instruction. In regard to the second criterion, a lesser included offense instruction is not supported by the evidence when the defendant's evidence or theory, if believed, would require an acquittal. In this case, Hamby was charged with felony sexual assault on a 10-year-old girl with Down syndrome. Hamby contended that he was wrestling with the girl rather than sexually assaulting her and thus was entitled to a lesser included instruction for misdemeanor assault. However, if the evidence supported Hamby's theory that he was merely wrestling, there would not be sufficient evidence to establish that he knowingly made physical contact of an insulting or provoking nature to constitute a misdemeanor assault, so an acquittal would result. The evidence did not support Hamby's proposed jury instruction, and the District Court did not err in refusing to give it. St. v. Hamby, 1999 MT 319, 297 M 274, 992 P2d 1266, 56 St. Rep. 1272 (1999). See also St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

Sufficient Evidence of Criminal Endangerment — Instruction on Negligent Endangerment Not Required: Martinosky was charged with felony criminal endangerment. During settlement of jury instructions, Martinosky offered a proposed instruction on negligent endangerment as a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, but the instruction was refused. On appeal, without reaching the question of whether negligent endangerment was a lesser included offense of criminal endangerment, the Supreme Court found that the evidence established that Martinosky was fully aware of his actions and the probable outcome of those actions and thus acted knowingly, so an instruction on negligent endangerment was not warranted. St. v. Martinosky, 1999 MT 122, 294 M 427, 982 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 495 (1999), following St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

"Failure to Agree" Instruction — When Corrective Instruction Required: Generally, when a claimed error concerns jury instructions that were not objected to at the time that the instructions were settled, the alleged error may not be raised for the first time on appeal; however, the Supreme Court will review jury instructions in certain circumstances even in the absence of an objection to determine whether the jury was properly instructed. In the present case, there was significant confusion among the court, the prosecutor, and the defense counsel concerning the correct procedural sequence for the jury to consider greater and lesser offenses during deliberations, given a timely request by defendant. If a judge is of the opinion that instructions already given fully advise the jury on the procedures that it is to follow in deliberations, the judge's refusal to answer a jury's question already answered in the instruction is not error. However, when the instruction fails to fully advise, the judge should provide a corrective instruction. The withdrawal of defendant's timely request for an instruction at settlement was due to the mistaken representation of the court and the prosecutor that the law did not allow an instruction that the jury may consider a lesser offense if it fails to agree on a verdict for the greater offense, so the Supreme Court chose to review defendant's claim of error in a jury instruction. Under subsection (3) of this section, as long as a criminal defendant requests a "failure to agree" instruction at the settling of jury instructions, a District Court must instruct the jury that it may consider the lesser offense without first reaching a unanimous verdict on the greater offense. St. v. Robbins, 1998 MT 297, 292 M 23, 971 P2d 359, 55 St. Rep. 1213 (1998), following U.S. v. Jackson, 726 F2d 1466 (9th Cir. 1984).

Counsel Failure to Request Lesser Included Offense Instruction Based on Defense That No Rational Jury Would Believe: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, defendant's counsel did not render ineffective assistance by failing to request a jury instruction on the lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Therefore, counsel's performance was not outside the range of competence demanded of attorneys under similar circumstances. Defendant admitted that he shot a peace officer in the chest with a .41 caliber magnum pistol while running from the officer, who only wanted to talk to him. His defense was that he thought that the officer was part of a hit team hired by the government to get him and that a voice in his head told him that the officer had a flak jacket on and that if defendant shot the officer in the chest, he would not hurt the officer. The evidence did not support the instruction, and from the evidence, it would be irrational to conclude that defendant shot the officer with any intent other than to kill him. No jury could have rationally accepted the defense and have found defendant guilty of aggravated assault and not of attempted deliberate homicide. St. v. Sellner, 286 M 397, 951 P2d 996, 54 St. Rep. 1464 (1997), followed in St. v. Howell, 1998 MT 20, 287 M 268, 954 P2d 1102, 55 St. Rep. 72 (1998).

Assault Lesser Included Offense of Deliberate Homicide — Error to Refuse Instruction on Lesser Included Offense: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide. At trial, the court refused the defendant's proposed jury instruction on the offense of assault. The Supreme Court determined that as a matter of law, under the express terms of 46-1-202, assault is an included offense of the crime of deliberate homicide. When there was some evidence supporting a defendant's theory that the defendant was guilty of assault but not murder, the District Court erred in refusing the proposed jury instruction on assault as a lesser included offense of deliberate homicide. St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688, 54 St. Rep. 1194 (1997). However, see St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998).

Deliberate Homicide Charged — Insufficient Evidence to Support Instruction on Negligent Homicide — No Purpose to Instruction on Definition of "Negligently": Goulet, Nelson, and Running Crane became intoxicated after drinking at several bars, and Goulet, after pushing Running Crane away when he tried to borrow a cigarette, stabbed Running Crane in the stomach, then in the chest, and finally in the back. During trial on charges of deliberate homicide, Goulet requested an instruction on negligent homicide, but the instruction was refused by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in refusing the requested instruction. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense when the jury would be warranted in convicting on the lesser offense and acquitting on the greater offense. However, the Supreme Court noted that the only evidence that even approached evidence of negligence was that as he was stabbing Running Crane, Goulet was thinking that he hoped that he wasn't hurting Running Crane too badly. The Supreme Court called this evidence self-serving and insufficient to support the requested instruction. The Supreme Court also affirmed the District Court in its refusal to give an instruction on the definition of "negligently", saying that the District Court refused the instruction on the definition for the same reason that it refused the instruction on negligent homicide and that an instruction on the definition of a word standing alone, that is, not used in the instruction, would serve no purpose. St. v. Goulet, 283 M 38, 938 P2d 1330, 54 St. Rep. 482 (1997), followed in St. v. Fuqua, 2000 MT 273, 302 M 99, 13 P3d 34, 57 St. Rep. 1141 (2000).

Motion for New Trial Properly Denied — Attorney Assistance Not Ineffective: Swan argued that he was ineffectively represented because his attorney failed to request an instruction on a lesser included offense, neglected to ensure Swan's presence at an in camera hearing at which the trial court considered and answered a note from the jury inquiring whether an assault instruction applied to a felony aggravated assault charge as well as a felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charge, and allowed joinder of felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and felony aggravated assault charges. Finding that Swan failed to meet the first prong of the Strickland test, the Supreme Court held that Swan was effectively represented because counsel's performance was within the range of competence demanded of counsel in such cases and did not prejudice Swan in a manner that would have resulted in a different trial result. St. v. Swan, 279 M 483, 928 P2d 933, 53 St. Rep. 1246 (1996).

Assumption of Sexual Assault as Lesser Included Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — No Due Process Violation: Black was charged with sexual intercourse without consent. The court found insufficient evidence to convict on that charge but instead found him guilty of felony sexual assault. Black appealed on the grounds that he was convicted of an offense with which he was not charged, relying on St. v. Copenhaver, 35 M 342, 89 P 61 (1907). Neither Black nor the state raised the issue of whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, either at trial or directly on appeal. Although the issue was not properly before the Supreme Court on appeal and the court specifically declined to address it, the court nevertheless assumed for purposes of this opinion that sexual assault is a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent. The court distinguished Copenhaver, in which defendant was convicted of a separate, independent offense that was not a lesser included offense. In this case, pursuant to the court's assumption and subsection(1) of this section, the court found that the charging document provided a sufficient basis for Black's conviction of sexual assault. Black's arguments that he was convicted of a crime with which he was not charged, that the charging document did not provide notice of the crime of which he was convicted, and that his due process rights were violated were thus rendered ineffective. St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162, 52 St. Rep. 215 (1995).

Endangering Welfare of Child Not Lesser Included Offense of Deviate Sexual Conduct: As evidenced by the plain language of 45-5-505, the offense of deviate sexual conduct requires proof that the persons were of the same sex, while endangering the welfare of a child, 45-5-622, plainly requires proof of the ages of the offender and the victim. Each crime requires proof of additional facts that the other does not. Therefore, applying the test in Blockburger v. U.S., 284 US 299, 76 L Ed 306, 52 S Ct 180 (1932), the crime of endangering the welfare of a child is not a lesser included offense of deviate sexual conduct. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994).

Included Offense Based Upon Less Risk, Injury, or Culpability — Negligent Endangerment Not Lesser Included Offense of Aggravated Assault: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Sheppard, 253 M 118, 832 P2d 370 (1992), the Supreme Court held that a person is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense only if, based upon the evidence, the jury could rationally find the person guilty of the lesser offense and if that entitlement is based upon one offense being, in law, an included offense of the other. Because the definition of "included offense" is written in the disjunctive with the qualifier "only", a lesser included offense may differ in one and only one way from that of the offense charged. Fisch's argument fails because at least two of the variations in degree exist between the offense charged and negligent endangerment. Moreover, Fisch's "less serious risk", "less serious injury", and "lesser kind of culpability" arguments under 46-1-202(8)(c) also fail. As a result, the Supreme Court held that no amount of evidence as to negligent endangerment would entitle Fisch to the instruction he sought. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994), followed in St. v. Greywater, 282 M 28, 939 P2d 975, 54 St. Rep. 16 (1997), and St. v. Martinez, 1998 MT 265, 291 M 306, 968 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 1093 (1998).

Included Offense Based Upon Similar Proof — Failure to Raise in District Court: Fisch was convicted of aggravated assault after the District Court refused to accept a jury instruction on negligent endangerment, which Fisch argued was a lesser included offense of aggravated assault. Citing St. v. Henderson, 265 M 454, 877 P2d 1013, 51 St. Rep. 606 (1994), the Supreme Court noted that Fisch's argument for a lesser included offense based upon 46-1-202(8)(a) was not raised in the District Court and that Fisch could not change his theory on appeal from that argued in the District Court. St. v. Fisch, 266 M 520, 881 P2d 626, 51 St. Rep. 907 (1994).

GENERAL

Prosecutor's Inaccurate Description of DNA Evidence — Curative Jury Instruction — No Error Requiring New Trial: Defendant contended that a new trial was warranted because the prosecutor inaccurately stated that the victim's and defendant's DNA were found together at the scene of an alleged sexual assault. The trial court agreed that the evidence was mischaracterized and gave a curative instruction that the jury was to disregard any statement that mixed DNA was found and denied defendant's motion for a new trial. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed on this point. Given the curative instruction, defendant did not demonstrate that the trial court acted arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceeded the bounds of reason in denying the new trial motion. St. v. Ariegwe, 2007 MT 204, 338 M 442, 167 P3d 815 (2007).

Trial Court's Sua Sponte Objection to Testimony Not Violative of Court's Duty to Ensure Fairness of Trial: Price was charged with assault with a weapon, and his defense was based upon the assertion that his roommate committed the crime. On the opening day of trial, both the prosecution and the defense elicited testimony regarding the roommate's propensity for violence. At the beginning of the second day of trial, outside the presence of the jury, the trial judge objected sua sponte to the admission of the character testimony and heard arguments from both parties regarding the objection before ruling that the testimony was inadmissible. The judge then instructed the jury to disregard the testimony and limited testimony on the subject by a future witness. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the judge's actions constituted an abuse of discretion that impaired Price's defense and entitled Price to a new trial. The Supreme Court noted that although a trial judge should avoid officious interference in proceedings and remain impartial, the judge is not a mere figurehead or umpire at a trial who must remain silent and passive throughout a jury trial, speaking only to rule on motions and objections. Rather, the judge's duty is to ensure fairness, avoid waste of time, keep from the jury extraneous, potentially confusing matters, and facilitate the ascertainment of truth, which does not preclude a judge from excluding inadmissible evidence on the judge's own motion if the judge believes exclusion is in the interests of justice. Here, the judge did not cross the line between arbiter and advocate. The judge's objection pertained to testimony elicited by both parties and thus was not partial to the prosecution. The purpose of the objection was to prevent the jury from being misled by extraneous matters or basing the verdict on incompetence evidence, and the judge's action was in the nature of regulating the proceedings to ensure a fair trial. In addition, limiting the testimony by a future witness to the extent that the state opened the door regarding the roommate's character was not an abuse of discretion because the ruling was proportional to that testimony. St. v. Price, 2006 MT 79, 331 M 502, 134 P3d 45 (2006).

Prosecutor's Comments Improper — References to Unrelated Cases, Attempting to Define Reasonable Doubt, and Personal Opinions Regarding Guilt and Appropriateness of Sentence: In closing arguments in a case in which defendant was charged with attempting to fraudulently obtain dangerous drugs by altering a prescription, the prosecutor attempted to define reasonable doubt by referring to a rape case that he tried several years earlier and by citing the need for a new county jail as evidence that the state proved reasonable doubt every day. The comments were not only irrelevant but also misrepresented the state's burden of proof. Arguments attempting to define reasonable doubt will cause reversible error. The prosecutor also told the jury that defendant's denials were so commonplace that prosecutors had named it the "some dude" defense, as in "Blame it on somebody, some dude, some dude sitting out there". The "some dude" remarks were essentially the prosecutor's personal opinion on the strength of the state's case, referred to matters outside the record and to the prosecutor's own experience, and were similar to a prosecutor commenting on the believability of a witness. Closing arguments that reflect the prosecutor's personal opinions as to guilt are improper. Lastly, the prosecutor assured the jury that even if it found defendant guilty, the judge had the authority to order treatment rather than jail time. The comments were meant to reassure the jury that a guilty verdict would not hurt defendant, but would actually be a benefit in the long run. However, sentencing is solely the duty of the trial court, and in a noncapital case, the verdict should not be influenced in any way by sentencing considerations. It is impermissible for a jury to give weight to possible punishment when reaching a verdict. Although the case was remanded on other grounds, the Supreme Court admonished the prosecution not to make such comments on retrial. St. v. Stewart, 2000 MT 379, 303 M 507, 16 P3d 391, 57 St. Rep. 1615 (2000).

Prosecutor's Assertion of Personal Opinion — Motion for Mistrial Denied: Defendant moved for mistrial, asserting that the state's attorney's closing arguments constituted improper prosecutorial comment and misconduct. During closing, the state had argued that its office was too busy to prosecute innocent persons, stating: "We don't have time to do that, ladies and gentlemen. We do have 1,450 cases a year in the county attorney's office. We don't have time to spend chasing people that we believe are innocent or [have time] to frame people." The Supreme Court affirmed its disapproval of an attorney's assertion of a personal opinion and cautioned the state to refrain from such a tactic. However, since defendant had no evidence that these statements resulted in undue prejudice, the motion for mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987), followed in St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999). See also St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999).

Statement That Armed Officer Is Guarding Defendant: Defendant contended that the prosecutor's statement before the jury that an armed deputy was "in charge and keeping the defendant" warranted a new trial. During cross-examination, defense counsel drew the jury's attention to the fact that the officer guarding the defendant was armed in order to demonstrate that the witness had limited powers of observation. A short time later, the prosecutor made the statement which defendant complained prejudiced him before the jury and which he claimed should have been the subject of a cautionary instruction. The court found that defense counsel obviously had drawn the jury's attention to the armed officer, and that if defendant thought a cautionary instruction was necessary he should have offered one. The defendant failed to show any error affecting his substantial rights or resulting in prejudice. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986).

Testimony of Expert Witness — Testimony Stricken and Cautionary Instruction Given — No Abuse of Discretion in Refusing to Grant Mistrial: The state added an expert witness to the witness list just prior to trial. His testimony was later stricken from the record because a similar expert could not be procured for the defense. It was not an abuse of discretion by the District Court to refuse to grant defendant a mistrial based upon his testimony. The District Court was in the best position to determine if the testimony adversely affected the proceedings and properly found no prejudice once the testimony was stricken and a cautionary instruction given. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Prisoner Handcuffed in Jury Presence:

If there were no showing of prejudice to the defendant resulting from a momentary viewing of him in handcuffs by the jury outside the courtroom, he was not denied a fair trial and hence is not entitled to a mistrial. St. v. Schatz, 194 M 59, 634 P2d 1193, 38 St. Rep. 1687 (1981).

In the absence of an indication of prejudicial consequences, the momentary and inadvertent observation of the defendant in handcuffs by the jury members does not warrant the granting of a new trial. St. v. Baugh, 174 M 456, 571 P2d 779 (1977).

Suppression of Evidence — Motion for New Trial: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide, the defendant moved for a new trial, alleging that his counsel did not hear testimony offered by a state witness concerning an exculpatory item not admitted into evidence, claiming the prosecution had suppressed the evidence. The State did not take possession of the evidence during the trial or consider it evidence, and the defendant did not seek a continuance even when he gained knowledge of the evidence. There is no suppression of evidence if the defendant has knowledge of the facts and circumstances of the evidence. The court, therefore, did not err in denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979), followed in Harris v. St., 234 M 482, 765 P2d 706, 45 St. Rep. 2067 (1988), and in St. v. Henry, 241 M 524, 788 P2d 316, 47 St. Rep. 476 (1990).

Prosecutorial Misconduct: It is not the duty of the prosecuting attorney to make independent determinations concerning the admissibility of evidence once the court rules such evidence is inadmissible. Willful attempts by the prosecutor in this case to place excluded evidence before the jury resulted in a reversal of the conviction because of its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bain, 176 M 23, 575 P2d 919 (1978).

Defendant's Admission Not Prejudicial: The trial judge was correct in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for a mistrial because the admission made by the defendant to the arresting officer on another charge in another state and introduced in the instant case was not prejudicial or a denial of the right to a fair trial. St. v. LaVe, 174 M 401, 571 P2d 97 (1977).

Erroneous Admission of Collateral Evidence: It was reversible error for the court to admit collateral, irrelevant, and prejudicial evidence as the underlying reason for a debt, payment of which was coerced by the defendant's intimidating acts. St. v. Williams, 174 M 288, 570 P2d 578 (1977).

Quotient Verdict: A quotient verdict is not a lot verdict. St. v. Moorman, 133 M 148, 321 P2d 236 (1958).

Perfecting Appeal While New Trial Motion Pending: The act of the defendant in a criminal prosecution in perfecting an appeal from the judgment of conviction while his motion for a new trial was pending did not deprive the trial court of jurisdiction thereafter to pass upon the motion, nor the Supreme Court of jurisdiction to consider the subsequent appeal from the order denying the new trial. St. v. Harkins, 85 M 585, 281 P 551 (1929).

Failure to Object to Instructions — Verdict Reviewable: The failure of the defendant to object to instructions under former law on first degree murder did not deprive him of the right to ask for a new trial on the ground that the evidence did not justify a verdict of murder in that degree. St. v. Gunn, 85 M 553, 281 P 757 (1929).

Different Judge: The District Court has authority to grant a motion for a new trial upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the evidence without reference to the fact that the judge who presides at the hearing of the motion may not be the one who presided at the trial. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

INSUFFICIENT EVIDENCE

Verdict Contrary to Law and Evidence: A motion for a new trial in a criminal case upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence presents for the court's determination the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. St. v. Hughes, 76 M 421, 246 P 956 (1926).

Insufficient Evidence — Showing Required: A defendant is not required to show an entire absence of evidence of some fact necessary to make out a case in order to secure a new trial. If he can convince the District Court that the evidence in its entirety is insufficient in weight to justify the verdict, he is entitled to a new trial. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

JURY MISCONDUCT

New Trial — General Rule Prohibiting Admission of Juror Testimony — Exception for Extraneous Prejudicial Information: Following Lawlor's conviction for felony DUI, Lawlor moved for a new trial, alleging that during deliberations a juror improperly offered to other jurors an opinion relating to Lawlor's prior DUI convictions, references to which had been precluded by a motion in limine. The District Court denied the new trial motion, and Lawlor appealed. Rule 606, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), generally forbids the admission of juror testimony for purposes of ordering a new trial, but one exception hinges on whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention. Examples of impermissible extraneous information and external influence include: (1) telephoning a relative with regard to previous litigation by the plaintiff; (2) visiting the scene of an accident; (3) conducting experiments and informing the jury of the findings; (4) receiving evidence outside of court; (5) bringing a newspaper article into the jury room and showing it to the jury; (6) the jury's use of demonstrative evidence and experimentation with evidence; (7) pressure from other jurors; and (8) knowledge and information shared from one juror to another. In this case, comments by the juror in question derived from that juror's general knowledge of the criminal justice system when the juror mentioned that felony DUI cases are tried in District Court. The comment was internal and not an external influence subject to the exception in Rule 606, M.R.Ev., so the District Court properly denied Lawlor's motion for a new trial based on the juror affidavit. St. v. Lawlor, 2002 MT 235, 311 M 493, 56 P3d 863 (2002). See also St. v. Kelman, 276 M 253, 915 P2d 854 (1996).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Interrogation of Jurors as Basis for Mistrial — Motion Properly Denied: In a prosecution for attempted deliberate homicide in which the jury was exposed to publicity about the defendant, the court denied the defendant's motion on the fourth day of trial to interrogate the jurors on the effects of the publicity. In this state, the court is under no mandatory duty to question jurors on prejudicial effects of publicity. Rather, such a matter is within the discretion of the court, and each case must be decided on a case-by-case basis. As there were cautionary instructions given to the jury and the defendant produced no evidence of prejudice, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion. St. v. Kirkland, 184 M 229, 602 P2d 586 (1979).

Use of Jurors' Affidavits: Although jurors' affidavits were admissible to show the existence of juror misconduct, they were not admissible to show the jurors were not actually influenced by the unauthorized evidence. St. v. Davison, 173 M 510, 568 P2d 159 (1977).

Confession of Error by Attorney General — Juror Bias: The court set aside a conviction of first degree burglary and remanded the case for a new trial for error committed by the trial court, confessed by the Attorney General and shown by the record, in refusing the defendant's motion for retrial based on the ground that a juror was biased and prejudiced. St. v. Summers, 107 M 34, 79 P2d 560 (1938).

Jurors Impeaching Own Verdict: The fact that jurors may impeach their own verdict when it has been decided by lot excludes all other exceptions to the general rule that jurors will not be heard to impeach their own verdict. St. v. Lewis, 52 M 495, 159 P 415 (1916); St. v. Wakely, 43 M 427, 117 P 95 (1911); Sutton v. Lowry, 39 M 462, 104 P 545 (1909); St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907); St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Jury's Misunderstanding of Instructions: The affidavits of two jurors, filed in aid of a motion for a new trial by the defendant in a prosecution for murder, in which both stated that they had misunderstood the instructions of the court, which clearly charged the jury that it could find the accused guilty of any grade of unlawful homicide or acquit him, in that from a reading of the instructions the two jurors were under the impression that the jury was required to either find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree or acquit him, and that being unwilling to acquit they voted for murder in the first degree rather than declare him innocent, did not show such misconduct on the part of the jury as to entitle the defendant to a new trial. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Bias Concealed by Juror: Under a former statute providing for a new trial when the verdict has been decided by lot or by any means other than a fair expression of opinion on the part of all the jurors, the fact that a juror, when sworn, was biased and prejudiced against the defendant, which fact he concealed upon his voir dire examination and which neither the defendant nor his counsel discovered until after the verdict, was ground for a new trial. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Incompetent Juror — Showing Necessary: While it is imperative that the accused shall have a trial by an impartial jury, after the verdict error will not be presumed and it is incumbent on the accused to make it appear affirmatively that he is entitled to a new trial by reason of having been deprived of this constitutional right. Mere possibility or even probability that one of the jurors was incompetent is not sufficient to overthrow the verdict. St. v. Mott, 29 M 292, 74 P 728 (1903).

Consent to Taking Exhibits to Jury Room: Exhibits introduced in evidence in a prosecution for murder which are sent to the jury during its retirement will not be considered as having been received out of court when it is found on a motion for a new trial that counsel for the defendant consented to their being taken to the jury room during the jury's retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Newspapers Received by Jury out of Court:

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has received any evidence, papers, or documents, not authorized by the court", the word "papers" referred to such written instruments as might be competent testimony when inspected by the court and found to be competent under the Rules of Evidence and did not include newspapers; and the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the case did not in itself vitiate the verdict. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890).

Under a former statute providing that a new trial shall be granted "when the jury has been separated without leave of court, or been guilty of any misconduct, tending to prevent a fair and due consideration of the case", the reception by the jury of newspapers containing comments on the trial adverse to the defendant is misconduct tending to show injury to the defendant. St. v. Jackson, 9 M 508, 24 P 213 (1890). See also St. v. Pepo, 23 M 473, 59 P 721 (1900).

NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE

Postconviction Letter From Lead Detective Not Considered Newly Discovered Evidence Warranting New Trial: Following DuBray's conviction for robbery, theft, and deliberate homicide, DuBray received a letter from the lead detective in the case indicating that the detective thought that there was more to the case and wanted to hear DuBray's story. DuBray contended that the letter indicated that the detective wanted the real story because he only got part of it right, which impeached the detective's trial testimony, constituting new evidence that entitled DuBray to a new trial. The Supreme Court applied the test in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), to determine whether the letter constituted newly discovered evidence. Given that DuBray's trial counsel conducted a lengthy attack on the detective's objectivity at trial and advanced a theory that DuBray was charged based on rumor and innuendo, the letter would have been merely cumulative. Additionally, nothing in the letter indicated that a new trial in which the letter was admitted would have a reasonable probability of resulting in a different outcome. Thus, the letter failed to satisfy the Clark test, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying DuBray's motion for a new trial based on new evidence. DuBray v. St., 2008 MT 121, 342 M 520, 182 P3d 753 (2008).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief:

Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v.

Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in 46-21-102. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

Evidence of Victim's Failure to Repair Car Not Grounds for New Trial Because Evidence Not Relevant to Amount of Pecuniary Loss Suffered by Victim: Allen argued that the trial court erred in not granting him a new trial in his felony mischief case, based on newly discovered evidence that his sister had not had her car repaired after he shot bullet holes in it. The Supreme Court stated that a new trial based on newly discovered evidence could be granted only if the evidence is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon a new trial. The Supreme Court ruled that in the case before it, evidence of failure to make repairs did not affect the amount of pecuniary loss suffered by the victim and therefore Allen's conviction for felony mischief was proper and he was not entitled to a new trial. St. v. Allen, 2001 MT 17, 304 M 129, 18 P3d 1006 (2001).

Alleged Failure by State to Disclose Medical Report Until After Trial — Inability to Assess Prejudice Absent Record: Defendant contended that he was entitled to a new trial based on the alleged failure of the state to disclose a medical report until after trial, but defendant did not provide a copy of the report or a detailed account of the report in the motion for a new trial. Lacking sufficient information upon which to assess claims of prejudice and ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court properly denied the motion for new trial. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998).

New Evidence Tending to Be Exculpatory — Greeno Test Met — New Trial Warranted: The District Court examined newly discovered evidence, found that three elements of the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), were not met, and denied a motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the new evidence, discovered well after trial due to no lack of due diligence on defendant's part, was more than cumulative, tended to exculpate defendant, and spoke to facts that were not evident at trial. The new evidence, including a purported confession and other evidence pointing to a different person as the criminal, was distinct from any evidence presented at trial and was so material that it would probably, albeit not necessarily, produce a different result at another trial. Because all the Greeno criteria were met, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny a motion for a new trial and remand was warranted. St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171, 53 St. Rep. 32 (1996), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992). See also St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Confrontation of Witnesses — Motion Properly Denied: The District Court did not err in denying defendant's motion for new trial based on newly discovered evidence when the evidence, a tape recording of an Oregon attorney's interview with a prosecution witness, was not so material that it would have produced a different result, the evidence was cumulative as to other impeachment evidence, and there was other substantial evidence of defendant's guilt. Defendant was not entitled to a new trial on the basis that he was denied full confrontation and impeachment of witnesses when the District Court did not abuse its discretion in limiting extensive cross-examination on pending charges against a witness. St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985), followed in St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998).

Character Witness: The defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence was properly denied because the defendant's newly discovered evidence, a witness who knew of the defendant's good conduct and character, would only go to discredit a prosecution witness's testimony and would not make the difference between the defendant's being or not being convicted in a new trial. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732 (1978).

Alibi Witnesses: When the defendant moved for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence supported by affidavits of purported alibi witnesses and an investigator who knew of and tried to locate one alibi witness before the trial, the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion in light of St. v. Gallagher, 162 M 155, 509 P2d 852 (1973), which sets forth requirements for this motion. St. v. Briner, 173 M 185, 567 P2d 35 (1977).

Statements of Witnesses: The trial court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence in the form of statements taken from two witnesses subsequent to the trial. St. v. Quigg, 155 M 119, 467 P2d 692 (1970), distinguished in St. v. Nanoff, 160 M 344, 502 P2d 1138 (1972).

Perjury of State's Witness:

When the key witness at the trial in which the defendant was convicted of larceny made statements after the trial demonstrating that the testimony he gave was false and perjurious and, at the hearing on the defendant's motion for a new trial, the witness refused to give any testimony, the requirements for the granting of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence were met, and the defendant should have been granted a new trial. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

When newly discovered evidence may demonstrate perjury in the state's witness upon whose evidence the verdict of guilty was founded and, but for which, conviction could not have been had, and may probably produce a different result, a new trial should be granted on that ground. St. v. Hamilton, 87 M 353, 287 P 933 (1930).

Motion After Appeal Perfected: When the defendant had perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court and then discovered new evidence, the Supreme Court had no jurisdiction to grant a new trial. However, upon the defendant's prima facie showing of matters sufficient to warrant consideration, the court would instruct the District Court to entertain the defendant's motion for a new trial and would stay further proceedings pending such motion. St. v. Nicks, 131 M 567, 312 P2d 519 (1957).

Showing of Diligence Required: Motions for new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence in criminal cases are not favored, and regardless of the facts set up in affidavits filed in support thereof, the defendant is not entitled to a retrial unless it is shown that he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced the new evidence at the trial. St. v. Hamilton, 87 M 353, 287 P 933 (1930).

Cumulative Evidence:

Applications for new trials on the ground of newly discovered evidence are not favored by the courts and will not be granted when the new evidence is merely cumulative. St. v. Broell, 87 M 284, 286 P 1108 (1930).

Alleged newly discovered evidence that is cumulative only does not warrant the granting of a new trial, nor may the court be put in error for refusing a retrial on that ground when the movant made no attempt to show due diligence on his part to produce the newly discovered witness at the trial. St. v. Gies, 77 M 62, 249 P 573 (1926).

Lack of Due Diligence: When the defendant and his counsel accepted the statement of the County Attorney that a witness, then in the county jail, whose name was endorsed on the information had refused to testify, without verifying the prosecutor's statement by an interview with the witness, whereas after the trial they ascertained that if he had been called he would have testified that he and another committed the offense for which the defendant was convicted, they were lacking in due diligence in discovering and producing the alleged newly discovered evidence. St. v. Broell, 87 M 284, 286 P 1108 (1930).

Judgment Unsupported by Evidence: When no evidence of the fitness or unfitness of the parents of an accused delinquent minor to control or take care of him was heard by the court, a judgment that they were not unfit was unsupported by the evidence and refusal of a new trial on the ground of new evidence was error. State ex rel. Palagi v. Freeman, 81 M 132, 262 P 168 (1927).

Mistake of Prosecution Witness: When the owner of an animal that the defendant was charged with stealing testified that it was his property at the time it was taken and remained so until after the defendant's arrest when it was paid for by the latter, and such owner was fully cross-examined as to the transaction, a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence based upon the witness's affidavit to the effect that he was mistaken in so testifying was properly refused. St. v. Hughes, 78 M 87, 252 P 320 (1926).

Consideration of Motion: Though a motion for a new trial in a criminal case on the ground of newly discovered evidence is not generally viewed with favor by the courts, it was authorized by the former statutes and, when the prescribed conditions were met, entitled to the same consideration as a motion upon any other statutory ground; and while a broad discretion is lodged in the trial court in disposing of it, an order denying it is subject to review. St. v. Gangner, 73 M 187, 235 P 703 (1925).

Statements by Prosecuting Witness: An affidavit in support of a motion for a new trial following a conviction for attempted rape stating that the prosecuting witness, some 5 months before the trial, said to the affiant that, if the defendant didn't "fork over", she "would send him over the road for the rest of his life" was not "newly discovered evidence", that expression meaning evidence discovered since the trial. St. v. Prouty, 60 M 310, 199 P 281 (1921).

Commission Comments

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-2101, R.C.M. 1947. Section 46-16-702 is also derived from section 95-2101. The commission comments to section 95-2101 are printed in their entirety under 46-16-701.

Source: R.C.M. 1947, sections 94-7601 and 94-7602; Illinois Code of Criminal Procedure, [Chapter] 38, [section] 116-1.

[Section 46-16-701] defines a new trial and states the effect of granting such a motion. It is basically the same as existing law.

[Section 46-16-702] does not specify the grounds which may be the basis for a motion for a new trial. The present Montana law follows a different format. [Section 46-16-702] encompasses the various grounds set forth in the existing Montana law plus it permits the granting of a motion for a new trial for any other reason the court may find to be in the interest of justice. At the same time it does not provide defense counsel with a list of reasons to be considered on making the motion for a new trial.

[Section 46-16-702(2)] provides, as does the existing law, that the motion be in writing. It requires also that the motion be made within thirty days following the entry of a finding or the return of a verdict. This is a slight change from the existing law which requires notice of certain motions to be made within thirty days after discovery of the facts upon which the moving party relied to support his motion and that in all other cases notice of motion be filed within ten days after rendition of the verdict. This particular limitation should be viewed in conjunction with the post-conviction remedies that are made available.

[Section 46-16-702] also provides that reasonable notice of the motion be given to the state.

[Section 46-16-702] provides that the motion for a new trial specify the grounds therefor. Some specific examples are: the trial of a felony charge in the absence of the defendant, jury misconduct, the court has erred in the decision of any question of law arising during trial, the verdict is contrary to law or evidence or new evidence is discovered. This section does not require the motion to be upon affidavits as do some subsections of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7605 [now repealed].

[Section 46-16-702(3)] is not found specifically in the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, or the codes of any other state which have been used for source material. However, it does not represent any great innovation in the law. It merely lists the alternative decisions available to the judge in deciding a motion for a new trial. He may either grant or deny the motion, or modify or change the verdict which is provided to a limited extent in the specific context of R.C.M. 1947, section 94-7603(6) [now repealed].

Compiler's Comments

1991 Amendment: Deleted definition of new trial that read: "A "new trial" is a reexamination of the issue in the same court before another jury after a verdict or finding has been rendered".

Case Notes

Trial Court's Improper Determination of Veracity of Recanted Testimony —Remand: In ruling on Crosby's motion for a new trial based on the recanted testimony of a witness, the District Court erroneously concluded that Crosby was entitled to a new trial only when the trial judge was satisfied that the recantation was untrue, which improperly placed the court in the role of factfinder. Instead, the court should have applied the test in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), to determine whether a new trial should be granted based on newly discovered evidence. The Supreme Court remanded for application of the Clark standard in determining whether Crosby was entitled to postconviction relief and a new trial. Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006).

Recantation of Sexual Assault Victim's Testimony — Remand for Consideration of New Trial — Perry Partially Overruled: Following Clark's conviction of sexual assault against his stepdaughter, she recanted her testimony and Clark moved for a new trial, citing St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268 (1988). The Supreme Court overruled Perry to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a trial judge is required to grant a new trial only when satisfied that the recantation of the witness is true. However, the Perry proposition that the weight to be given to recanted testimony is for the trial judge to determine was retained as authoritative precedent to be considered as part of the analysis set out in Berry v. St., 10 Ga. 511 (Ga. 1851), describing when it is proper to grant a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, as adopted in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959). In applying the restated Berry test, a District Court is not to make factual determinations as to the veracity of the recantation, but should evaluate the recantation for materiality and its tendency to be cumulative or impeaching and should determine whether there is a reasonable probability that a new trial would produce a different outcome, keeping in mind the aspects of recantations that make them inherently suspect. If the Berry elements are met, a new trial is warranted; if not, the prior judgment stands. Here, the record was not clear as to the District Court's reasons for denying a new trial and whether the court correctly applied the law, so the case was remanded to allow the District Court to readdress Clark's motion for a new trial. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), followed in Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006).

On remand, the District Court found that evidence of the victim's recanted testimony was neither cumulative nor impeaching and that a new trial based on the testimony had no reasonable probability of resulting in a different outcome, so Clark's motion for a new trial was denied. Clark appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In the first trial, the jury had already heard Clark's theory, which was essentially confirmed by the recanted testimony, but had rejected the theory and convicted Clark. Thus, there was no probability that a new trial based on the same theory would result in a different outcome, so a new trial was unwarranted. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 391, 347 M 113, 197 P3d 977 (2008), following Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006).

Use of Testimony From Prior Trial in Retrial Not Precluded: Ingraham was convicted of negligent homicide, criminal endangerment, and criminal trespass to property in relation to an automobile accident. Admission of certain evidence was found to constitute reversible prejudicial error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. On remand, Ingraham moved to preclude the state from using his testimony from the first trial during its case in chief at the second trial, based on this section and his constitutional right not to be compelled to testify against himself. The District Court granted Ingraham's motion, based in part on Harrison v. U.S., 392 US 219 (1968), as interpreted in People v. Armentero, 384 NW 2d 98 (Mich. App. 1986), and the state appealed. The Supreme Court examined the legislative history of this section, noting that prior to amendment in 1967, the statute expressly required that testimony must be produced anew in a new trial—i.e., testimony from an earlier trial could not be used in a new trial of the same case. However, the 1967 amendment deleted that requirement. When the Legislature amends a statute, it is presumed that some change to existing law is intended; thus, the presumption is that since 1967, the use of testimony from a prior trial in a new trial is not precluded by statute. With regard to the alleged constitutional issue of self-incrimination, the Supreme Court noted that under Harrison and subsequent federal cases, in order to preclude the use of prior testimony in a subsequent trial, the testimony must have been compelled by the admission of evidence both illegally obtained and improperly admitted at trial, but when testimony is compelled as a result of evidence that was improperly admitted rather than unconstitutionally obtained, Harrison does not preclude use of the testimony in a later trial. The District Court abused its discretion in granting Ingraham's motion excluding his prior testimony. State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 2000 MT 266, 302 M 39, 22 P3d 166, 57 St. Rep. 1111 (2000).

Prosecution Presenting New Evidence at Second Trial: The defendant argued that the prosecution's introduction of new evidence at the second trial constituted double jeopardy. The Supreme Court ruled that a mistrial placed the parties in the same position as if there had been no trial in the first instance and that therefore the introduction of new evidence was proper. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

Admissibility in Second Trial of Testimony Given in First Trial: After having testified in his first trial, which ended in a mistrial, defendant declined to testify in his second trial. Defendant argued that his testimony given in the first trial was inadmissible in the second because this section places the parties in a new trial in the same position as if there had been no trial and that the first trial was therefore a nullity. The court found that under this section and 46-16-702 there must be a "finding" or a "verdict of guilty" in the first trial in order for these sections to apply, that since the first trial resulted in a hung jury and mistrial there was no "finding or verdict", and that therefore defendant did not fit under these sections. Admission of defendant's testimony from the first trial was not error. St. v. Hall, 234 M 57, 761 P2d 1283, 45 St. Rep. 1726 (1988).

Mention of Prior Trial: This section does not compel automatic reversal if anyone other than defendant or his witnesses mentions to the jury that there has been another trial. However, the judge and counsel for both sides should carefully guard the record to ensure that none of the parties loses or gains any rights because of the result of the previous trial. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Justice's Court — Authority to Grant New Trial: A Justice's Court is not a "court" for the purposes of 46-16-701, and a Justice of the Peace may not dismiss charges against a defendant upon a motion for a new trial. Forsythe v. Wenholz, 170 M 496, 554 P2d 1333 (1976).

Attacking Charge on New Trial: When a first conviction is set aside, the defendant is not precluded upon a remand for a new trial from attacking the indictment or information. St. v. Hale, 129 M 449, 291 P2d 229 (1955), overruled on another point in St. v. Bogue, 142 M 459, 384 P2d 749 (1963).

New Trial Not Double Jeopardy: When one convicted of crime is granted a new trial, he is not placed in new jeopardy by the second trial but is in the same jeopardy he was in when the first trial was had. St. v. Aus, 105 M 82, 69 P2d 584 (1937).

1999 Amendment: Chapter 301 in (1) inserted second sentence concerning ordering new trial without motion or after motion and hearing. Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 301, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, in State v. Brummer, 1998 MT 11, [287] Mont. [168], 953 P.2d 250, 55 St. Rep. 30 (1998), the Montana Supreme Court determined that section 46-16-702, MCA, created an ambiguity as to whether a court could order a new trial sua sponte."

1991 Amendment: In (2), after "guilty", deleted "reasonable notice of the motion" and at end substituted "state" for "prosecution"; and made minor changes in style.

Case Notes

State's Alleged Failure to Reveal Exculpatory Evidence Unfounded — New Trial Not Warranted: Jackson asserted that a new trial was warranted because the state committed a Brady violation by failing to disclose exculpatory statements made to a professional counselor by a deputy who was wounded during an altercation with Jackson in which another deputy was killed, in which the wounded deputy stated that he felt responsible for the other officer's death. The District Court denied Jackson's motion for a new trial, and on appeal the Supreme Court found no reversible error. The state disclosed the name of the counselor well before trial, identifying the counselor as a person with whom the deputy had discussed the shooting, and the jury heard evidence from other witnesses that the deputy felt guilty about the incident. Thus, the record did not support Jackson's claim that exculpatory evidence was withheld, and denial of Jackson's motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Jackson, 2009 MT 427, 354 M 63, 221 P3d 1213 (2009).

Court's Sua Sponte Withdrawal of Defendant's Guilty Plea Following Judgment Considered Mistake of Law: Friedt pleaded guilty to a stop sign violation and to a charge of failing to carry proof of insurance in the vehicle and was sentenced in Municipal Court. During sentencing, the County Attorney failed to raise any issues of restitution. After judgment was entered, the court was advised by a victim of a claim of damages associated with Friedt's offenses. The court, sua sponte, withdrew Friedt's guilty pleas, appointed counsel, and set an omnibus hearing. Friedt then petitioned the Supreme Court for supervisory control, asserting that the Municipal Court lacked jurisdiction to vacate or modify the sentence once a valid sentence was pronounced and thus proceeded under a mistake of law in withdrawing the guilty pleas, which would result in a gross injustice and unnecessary expense if Friedt was required to stand trial on charges to which she knowingly and voluntarily pleaded guilty and on which she had been sentenced. The County Attorney argued that the Municipal Court retained jurisdiction under 46-16-702 and that the interests of justice to the victim and the mandatory restitution provision in 46-18-201 required the Municipal Court to remedy the situation sua sponte. The Supreme Court noted that 46-16-702 allows a new trial, following judgment, for a defendant in the interests of justice, but that the statute does not authorize a new proceeding to benefit a victim or a prosecutor who fails to timely raise a sentencing matter. Further, although 46-16-105 allows a court for good cause to allow withdrawal of a guilty plea within 1 year after judgment if evidence supports a fundamental miscarriage of justice, nothing in the statute allows a court to forcibly withdraw a defendant's guilty plea sua sponte under any circumstances. Therefore, the Supreme Court agreed that the Municipal Court's action constituted a mistake of law. Friedt's petition for supervisory control was granted, and the Municipal Court was instructed to vacate the order withdrawing Friedt's guilty pleas. Friedt v. Billings Municipal Court, 2008 MT 174, 343 M 386, 184 P3d 1032 (2008).

Failure to Timely Object to Opening Statement — Waiver of Appeal: Paoni moved for a mistrial based on allegedly impermissible statements by the prosecutor during opening statements, but failed to timely object when the statements were made. The mistrial motion was denied, and Paoni appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant must make a timely objection to properly preserve an issue for appeal. Although unproved facts asserted in an opening statement may constitute grounds for a mistrial if there is a reasonable possibility that the unproved facts contributed to a conviction, in this case, even if the objection had been timely, the state later established a proper foundation for the statement, so denial of the motion for mistrial was proper, and Paoni's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), following St. v. Gardner, 2003 MT 338, 318 M 436, 80 P3d 1262 (2003), and followed, with regard to the necessity for timeliness of an objection to the prosecutor's statements, in St. v. McWilliams, 2008 MT 59, 341 M 517, 178 P3d 121 (2008).

No Prejudice Warranting New Trial on Grounds of Cumulative Error: Larson contended that he was denied a fair trial and was entitled to a new trial because of the cumulative errors argued in his appeal. The doctrine of cumulative error requires reversal of a conviction when a number of errors taken together prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial. However, in this case, the Supreme Court declined to apply the doctrine after reviewing all the issues on appeal. There was no prejudice shown, there was no abuse of judicial discretion, none of the evidentiary rulings were erroneous, and there was sufficient evidence to support the conviction. Larson's mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice were insufficient to satisfy the doctrine, and Larson's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

Motion Filed Seventy-Nine Days After Verdict Untimely — Denial Proper: McCarthy filed a pro se motion for a new trial 79 days after being found guilty of intimidation. The District Court denied the motion as untimely, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under this section, a motion for a new trial must be filed within 30 days following a verdict or finding of guilty. St. v. McCarthy, 2004 MT 312, 324 M 1, 101 P3d 288 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence of Sexual Contact to Preclude New Trial on Incest Charge: After the jury convicted Bailey of two counts of incest, Bailey moved for a new trial on grounds that there was insufficient evidence to support the verdict on one count, but the motion was denied. The child victim had been ruled incompetent to testify, and none of the expert witnesses testified regarding any specific incident of sexual contact between Bailey and the child. However, the child's mother did testify regarding an incident when she found Bailey and the victim in bed, which provided sufficient evidence for the jury to conclude that sexual contact occurred during the time in question, so denial of Bailey's motion for a new trial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Bailey, 2004 MT 87, 320 M 501, 87 P3d 1032 (2004).

Alleged New Evidence Not Extending Statutory Time Bar for Postconviction Relief:

Raugust contended that the period for filing for postconviction relief should be extended based on newly discovered evidence that the state mishandled a weapon found at the crime scene and that a key eyewitness confessed to the offense while waiting in the County Attorney's office to testify in Raugust's trial and because of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Raugust could not establish that the evidence regarding the weapon was so material that it would probably produce a different result at trial or that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. Evidence regarding the eyewitness directly conflicted with other evidence given at trial that tended to preclude the possibility that the eyewitness could have committed the crime, nor could Raugust show that the evidence could not have been discovered in a timely manner. The claims of ineffective counsel were not newly discovered evidence because Raugust was aware of the asserted deficiencies at trial. Raugust v. St., 2003 MT 367, 319 M 97, 82 P3d 890 (2003), following St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Abe was found guilty of accountability for deliberate homicide and was sentenced to 60 years in prison. One year and 14 days after the deadline, Abe filed a petition for postconviction relief on grounds of newly discovered evidence. Allegedly, two jurors from Abe's trial sat in on the trial of Abe's coconspirator and heard two of the state's witnesses testify differently than they did in Abe's trial. The Supreme Court applied the factors to be considered when a District Court evaluates a motion for a new trial based on newly discovered evidence as set out in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215 (1997) (see also St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959)), including the requirement that the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the defendant since trial and the requirement that the evidence must not be such as will tend only to impeach the character or credit of a witness. Here, Abe's counsel knew about the alleged discrepancies after Abe's trial but prior to Abe's appeal, so the discrepancies in testimony could have been raised on direct appeal. Further, the petition for postconviction relief alleged that the discrepancies undermined the credibility of the witnesses but did not establish that Abe did not engage in the criminal conduct for which he was convicted. Thus, the District Court concluded, and the Supreme Court agreed, that the alleged new evidence did not serve to extend the statutory bar for filing a petition for postconviction relief beyond the 1-year period in 46-21-102. Although Abe correctly pointed out that the state did not raise the issue of the statutory bar in District Court and that the District Court did not rule on the issue, the general rule that the Supreme Court will not address issues raised for the first time on appeal did not apply in this case because that rule does not apply when the issue is jurisdictional. The 1-year statute of limitations for postconviction relief is a jurisdictional limit, and lack of subject matter jurisdiction may be raised at any time under Rule 12(h), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20). Dismissal of Abe's petition for postconviction relief was affirmed as procedurally barred. St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

When Sexual Assault Occurred Question for Jury — Sufficient Evidence to Show That Incident Occurred When Alleged to Preclude New Trial: Longhorn was convicted of a sexual assault that allegedly occurred in 1992. He moved for a new trial based on testimony by the victim and witnesses at trial that seemed to indicate that the assault occurred in 1991. In denying the motion, the District Court noted that the jury was properly instructed that the incident occurred in 1992 or not at all and that a reasonable juror could easily find beyond a reasonable doubt that the incident occurred in 1992. The Supreme Court examined the record and agreed. The question of when the incident occurred was one for the jury, and there was substantial evidence for the jury to conclude that the assault happened in 1992. The Supreme Court declined to second-guess the jury, holding that denial of the motion for a new trial was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Longhorn, 2002 MT 135, 310 M 172, 49 P3d 48 (2002).

Motion for New Trial and Recusal Based on Occasional Professional Relationship Between Court and Witness Properly Denied: Following conviction of theft and deceptive practices, Landis moved for a new trial and requested the District Court to recuse itself in order to avoid an appearance of impropriety, because one of the state's witnesses was a counselor occasionally used by the court to provide psychosexual and mental health evaluations, and because the professional relationship between the court and the witness was not disclosed. However, Landis failed to present any authority that such an occasional professional relationship constituted an appearance of impropriety giving rise to the necessity of recusal or a right to a new trial. The Supreme Court noted that it was the jury, not the District Court, that determined the witness's credibility, so any undisclosed occasional relationship had no bearing on the ultimate resolution of Landis's case by the jury. St. v. Landis, 2002 MT 45, 308 M 354, 43 P3d 298 (2002).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under Rule 606(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Alleged Failure by State to Disclose Medical Report Until After Trial — Inability to Assess Prejudice Absent Record: Defendant contended that he was entitled to a new trial based on the alleged failure of the state to disclose a medical report until after trial, but defendant did not provide a copy of the report or a detailed account of the report in the motion for a new trial. Lacking sufficient information upon which to assess claims of prejudice and ineffective assistance of counsel, the District Court properly denied the motion for new trial. St. v. Ahto, 1998 MT 200, 290 M 338, 965 P2d 240, 55 St. Rep. 851 (1998).

Authority of District Court to Order New Criminal Trial Sua Sponte: Absent a lawful enactment by the Legislature withholding a trial court's inherent power to grant a new trial sua sponte, the court's authority to do so stands. Addressing the ambiguity in the statutory language while giving effect to all provisions of this section, the Supreme Court held that the right of a defendant to move for a new trial does not affect the court's inherent power to order a new trial sua sponte when required in the interests of justice. Given the circumstances of the court's concern for the state's "selective prosecution", the violation of the court's pretrial order precluding the giving of instructions on lesser included offenses unless presented prior to trial, the overwhelmingly contradictory witness testimony, and the court's fear that the jury was deprived of an option more supportable by the facts, the interests of justice demanded a new trial and the District Court did not err in ordering one sua sponte. St. v. Brummer, 1998 MT 11, 287 M 168, 953 P2d 250, 55 St. Rep. 30 (1998), followed in St. v. Marker, 2000 MT 303, 302 M 380, 15 P3d 373, 57 St. Rep. 1282 (2000).

Motion for Judgment Notwithstanding Verdict — Effect and Treatment: The statutes governing criminal procedure do not provide for judgment notwithstanding the verdict, but that motion is considered a motion for a new trial under this section, and the standard for review is whether the lower court abused its discretion. St. v. Bell, 277 M 482, 923 P2d 524, 53 St. Rep. 792 (1996).

New Evidence Tending to Be Exculpatory — Greeno Test Met — New Trial Warranted: The District Court examined newly discovered evidence, found that three elements of the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), were not met, and denied a motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that the new evidence, discovered well after trial due to no lack of due diligence on defendant's part, was more than cumulative, tended to exculpate defendant, and spoke to facts that were not evident at trial. The new evidence, including a purported confession and other evidence pointing to a different person as the criminal, was distinct from any evidence presented at trial and was so material that it would probably, albeit not necessarily, produce a different result at another trial. Because all the Greeno criteria were met, it was an abuse of discretion for the District Court to deny a motion for a new trial and remand was warranted. St. v. Cline, 275 M 46, 909 P2d 1171, 53 St. Rep. 32 (1996), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Motion After Thirty Days — Judicial Exceptions Distinguished: The defendant filed a motion for a new trial 3 ½ years after conviction. The Supreme Court distinguished several of its past decisions and held that the defendant's motion was time-barred. The defendant has the opportunity to raise postverdict claims through a petition for postconviction relief. There are no "reasonable time" or "serious case" exceptions to the 30-day filing requirement under this section. St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995), followed in St. v. Belgarde, 1998 MT 152, 289 M 287, 962 P2d 571, 55 St. Rep. 590 (1998).

Alleged Juror Prejudice Caused by Defendant's Voluntary Ex Parte Contact With Juror: Defendant, whose ex parte contact with a juror was caused by his own actions in going to an airport cafe where she worked and ordering coffee, could not wait until he was found guilty and then seek a new trial based on alleged juror prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Failure to File Motion Within Thirty Days — Motion Considered: Although defendant did not file a new trial motion within 30 days after the guilty verdict, as required by this section, the Supreme Court considered the merits of the motion and its denial because the District Court gave extensive consideration to the motion and it was a serious case (deliberate homicide). St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Proof of Actual Prejudice Required — No Presumption of Prejudice: Defendant seeking a new trial because of defendant's ex parte contact with a juror must prove actual prejudice; there is no presumption of prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Lower Court's Ruling on Untimely Motion Upheld: The state argued that the trial court should have summarily dismissed Barrack's motion for a new trial because it was filed late and that the trial court should not have treated the motion as a petition for postconviction relief. The Supreme Court noted that at the time that the trial court incorrectly treated the untimely motion for a new trial as a petition for postconviction relief, Barrack could still have filed a timely appeal and may have been lulled into a position in which he did not timely pursue his appeal rights. The Supreme Court held that under the unique facts of the case, it would affirm the lower court's decision to rule on the untimely motion but that its decision could not be read as enlarging the scope of postconviction relief or as diminishing a defendant's obligation to timely file any motions. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994), Redcrow was distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Failure to Meet Second Prong of Strickland Test — No Prejudice Shown — Claim of Ineffective Counsel Denied: Denny's counsel neglected to investigate and interview several witnesses in her case, which satisfied the first prong of the Strickland test for ineffective counsel. However, because the potential witnesses were never interviewed, it was impossible to determine whether their testimony would have produced a different result. The second prong of Strickland was not satisfied because Denny could not demonstrate that counsel's omission prejudiced the case to such a degree as to deprive Denny of a fair trial. Denny's motion for a new trial on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel was properly denied. St. v. Denny, 262 M 248, 865 P2d 226, 50 St. Rep. 1537 (1993), following Nealy v. Cabana, 764 F2d 1173 (5th Cir. 1985), United States ex rel. Cross v. DeRobertis, 811 F2d 1008 (7th Cir. 1987), and Lawrence v. Armontrout, 900 F2d 127 (8th Cir. 1990), and cited in St. v. Hagen, 273 M 432, 903 P2d 1381, 52 St. Rep. 1048 (1995). Hagen was followed in St. v. Boucher, 1999 MT 102, 294 M 296, 980 P2d 1058, 56 St. Rep. 431 (1999), and St. v. Cady, 2000 MT 353, 303 M 258, 15 P3d 479, 57 St. Rep. 1491 (2000).

Grant of New Trial at Discretion of Trial Court: As stated in this section, the grant or denial of a motion for a new trial is within the discretion of the trial court. Absent an abuse of that discretion, the court's decision will be affirmed. St. v. Gambrel, 246 M 84, 803 P2d 1071, 47 St. Rep. 2270 (1990). See also St. v. Goettle, 253 M 111, 831 P2d 595, 49 St. Rep. 438 (1992).

Failure to File Supporting Brief — New Trial Denied: Defendant maintained that he was entitled to a new trial pursuant to 46-16-701 and this section. The state contended that a summary ruling was proper under Rule 2, M.U.D.C.R. (Title 25, ch. 19), because defendant failed to file a supporting brief within 5 days. Defendant argued that Rule 2 did not apply to criminal cases. The state contended that the decision to deny the motion for a new trial was a matter of trial court discretion. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion when defendant failed to provide sufficient information to support his motion for a new trial. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990).

Test Whether New Trial Warranted on Grounds of Newly Discovered Evidence: In determining whether a new trial was warranted based on newly discovered evidence, the District Court properly applied the test set out in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), that: (1) the evidence must have come to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it is not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; and (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon retrial. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 866, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992). See also St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997).

Admissibility in Second Trial of Testimony Given in First Trial: After having testified in his first trial, which ended in a mistrial, defendant declined to testify in his second trial. Defendant argued that his testimony given in the first trial was inadmissible in the second because 46-16-701 places the parties in a new trial in the same position as if there had been no trial and that the first trial was therefore a nullity. The court found that under 46-16-701 and this section there must be a "finding" or a "verdict of guilty" in the first trial in order for these sections to apply, that since the first trial resulted in a hung jury and mistrial there was no "finding or verdict", and that therefore defendant did not fit under these sections. Admission of defendant's testimony from the first trial was not error. St. v. Hall, 234 M 57, 761 P2d 1283, 45 St. Rep. 1726 (1988).

Statement of Codefendant After Trial Not So Material as to Produce Different Result: Statements made by a codefendant exculpating defendant from crimes were not sufficient to warrant a new trial. The lack of veracity of both defendants, plus the fact that the evidence presented an additional inconsistency for jury consideration, justified refusal of a new trial because the new evidence was not so material as to produce a different result upon another trial. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988), citing St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959).

Motion Based on Cumulative Evidence Properly Denied: It was not error to deny a motion for a new trial based on alleged newly discovered evidence when such evidence was cumulative. St. v. Lamping, 231 M 288, 752 P2d 742, 45 St. Rep. 616 (1988), citing St. v. Matkins, 45 M 58, 121 P 881 (1912).

Rules for Granting New Trial Based on Newly Discovered Evidence: In order for newly discovered evidence to be sufficient to warrant granting a new trial, it must be determined that: (1) the evidence came to the knowledge of the applicant since the trial; (2) it was not through want of diligence that it was not discovered earlier; (3) it is so material that it would probably produce a different result upon another trial; (4) it is not merely cumulative—that is, does not speak to facts in relation to which there was evidence at the trial; (5) the application is supported by the affidavit of the witness whose evidence is alleged to have been newly discovered or its absence accounted for; and (6) the evidence is not such as will only tend to impeach the character or credit of a witness. St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), followed in St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984); St. v Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985); St. v. Cyr, 229 M 337, 746 P2d 120, 44 St. Rep. 2013 (1987); St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990); St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991); In re J.R.T., 258 M 520, 853 P2d 710, 50 St. Rep. 642 (1993); St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994); St. v. Hatfield, 269 M 307, 888 P2d 899, 52 St. Rep. 1 (1995); St. v. Fina, 273 M 171, 902 P2d 30, 52 St. Rep. 887 (1995); St. v. Sullivan, 285 M 235, 948 P2d 215, 54 St. Rep. 1128 (1997); St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997); St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 686 (1998), and St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999). Redcrow was distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995). The rules were also applied in St. v. Abe, 2001 MT 260, 307 M 233, 37 P3d 77 (2001).

Newly Discovered Evidence — Material Cumulative — Different Result at New Trial Not Probable: An "intelligence" file relating to problems involving the deceased was kept by the Sheriff's office. For the homicide trial, defense demanded all materials held by the Sheriff's office concerning the case, but through apparent inadvertence, the file was not turned over to the defense. It was not discovered until 5 months after the trial during a search of the Sheriff's files by defense counsel and an assistant County Attorney. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a new trial after it had determined: that the file was not deliberately suppressed; that the material in the file was testified to at the trial and the material would have been cumulative; and that the material was not germane to the defendant's defense of use of justifiable force. The Supreme Court held that under the rules set forth in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P2d 1052 (1959), a new trial was not necessary because the file was not so material that it would probably produce a different result upon another trial. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Inclusion of Grounds Not Necessary in Order Denying Motion for New Trial: The Supreme Court refused to extend the ruling of St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981) (annotated below), to denial of a motion for a new trial under this section. The court also observed that in this case comments made by the trial judge did set forth the reason he denied the motion. St. v. Hall, 203 M 528, 662 P2d 1306, 40 St. Rep. 621 (1983).

Conviction of Lesser Included Offense — Lack of Mental State as Defense — No Mental State Verdict Form: The trial court refused defendant's request for a verdict form that stated that the defendant was found not guilty of attempted deliberate homicide due to mental disease or defect. The jury found him not guilty of that offense but did find him guilty of the lesser included offense of aggravated assault. The defendant alleged that due to his drugged state he lacked the necessary mental state to commit the offense charged and that the jury finding of not guilty of the charged offense on that basis yet guilty of the lesser offense constituted inconsistent and irreconcilable verdicts. The Supreme Court held that although a mental state verdict form would have been preferable in determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in refusing a new trial, it must look at every fact that the jury reasonably could have deduced from all the evidence, and in this case the basis for the conviction for the lesser included offense could have been based on several grounds. St. v. Doney, 194 M 22, 636 P2d 1377, 38 St. Rep. 1707 (1981).

Order for New Trial to Include Grounds: Rule 59(f), M.R.Civ.P., which requires that an order of the District Court granting a new trial must include a statement of the grounds for the trial, is applicable to motions for new trial in criminal actions. Therefore, when the trial court grants a new trial under this section, there must be a statement of the grounds for the order contained in that order. St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981).

Unreasonable Notice: Ten minutes before the sentencing hearing, counsel for the defendant moved the court for a new trial. The County Attorney had not been given advance notice of the motion or an opportunity to brief the question. Clearly, such action denied the state "reasonable notice". St. v. Williams, 193 M 432, 632 P2d 328, 38 St. Rep. 1253 (1981).

Insufficient Evidence — Acquittal Required: The defendant was convicted of tampering with or fabricating evidence. The defendant moved the court for a judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial. A new trial was granted. The Supreme Court found that there was insufficient evidence to support the conviction, and therefore the District Court should have entered a judgment of acquittal rather than granting a new trial. St. v. Warren, 192 M 436, 628 P2d 292, 38 St. Rep. 773 (1981).

Examination After Trial — New Evidence on Mental Defect: Application for new trial based on a psychiatric examination that could have been conducted prior to trial but was not conducted until after was properly denied. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980). See also St. v. Pease, 227 M 424, 740 P2d 659, 44 St. Rep. 1203 (1987). As applied to newly discovered battered women's syndrome, see St. v. Redcrow, 242 M 254, 790 P2d 449, 47 St. Rep. 672 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Jury Instructions on Lesser Included Offenses — No Error When Omitted Instruction Not Offered by Appellant: On appeal, the defendant in a deliberate homicide case alleged error in the failure to give jury instructions on mitigated deliberate homicide and negligent homicide. The general rule is that an instruction is required where there is some evidence to support the lesser included offense. Both negligent homicide and mitigated deliberate homicide are to be considered lesser included offenses of deliberate homicide. Here, a lesser included offense instruction was offered by the State and objected to by the defense. The Montana Supreme Court reiterated its position that error may not be predicated upon the failure to give an instruction when the party alleging the error failed to offer the instruction. Failure to offer an instruction removes the cause of error, particularly when the defense counsel has objected to the instruction upon the ground that the defendant was either guilty of deliberate homicide or not guilty. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470 (1980).

Evidence Impeached at Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion for Denial: When evidence presented at hearing on motion for new trial was impeached to the point that the trial judge felt that he had been lied to, the motion was properly denied. St. v. Rose, 187 M 74, 608 P2d 1074 (1980).

Intimidation of Witnesses: When protection was immediately provided for two witnesses upon the discovery that they were being intimidated, and the jury had all the facts before it to weigh those witnesses' credibility, the District Court sufficiently guarded the defendant's rights and a mistrial was not warranted. St. v. Booke, 178 M 225, 583 P2d 405 (1978).

Motion After Thirty Days: A motion for a new trial on the basis of newly discovered evidence filed in the District Court after the 30-day period for filing with the District Court was untimely and filed in the wrong court. If the grounds for seeking a new trial do not arise until after the 30-day period or until after the appeal is filed, the proper procedure is to stay the appeal, remand the case to the District Court, file the motion, secure the District Court's decision thereon, and continue with the appeal. St. v. Best, 161 M 20, 503 P2d 997 (1972), distinguished in St. v. Gollehon, 274 M 116, 906 P2d 697, 52 St. Rep. 1182 (1995).

Improper Denial of Bail: The trial court abused its authority in denying bail to a defendant whose conviction for first degree murder was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campbell, 160 M 111, 500 P2d 801 (1972).

Motion After Appeal Perfected: Once an appeal has been perfected to the Supreme Court, the District Court loses jurisdiction of the case, except that if a motion for a new trial is then pending, the District Court retains jurisdiction thereof with power to rule thereon. St. v. Nicks, 131 M 567, 312 P2d 519 (1957).

Assignment of Error in Denying New Trial — No Record, Not Argued: When an alleged error in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial was not argued and nothing appeared in the record to sustain it, the assignment did not merit consideration. St. v. Wong Sun, 114 M 185, 133 P2d 761 (1943).

Newspaperman's Bias: After conviction of first degree murder, the defendant moved for a new trial on the ground, among others, that a juror had been guilty of misconduct in concealing from the court, while under examination on his voir dire, the fact that after the arrest of the defendant he, as correspondent for the newspaper published at the county seat, had furnished it articles, which were published, in effect complimenting the officers for their quick action in apprehending the "murderer", whose "worthless carcass will lie to rot deeply buried when the wheels of justice cease to grind". The motion was denied. The court held, in answer to the contention that the trial court abused its discretion in denying the motion, that in view of the explanation of his conduct by the juror on the hearing of the motion that the articles were not intended to be personal as applied to the defendant, whom he did not know, but applicable to anyone who committed homicide, and the advantageous position of the trial judge in passing upon the sincerity and truth of the statements of the juror on his examination touching his competency as well as on the hearing of the motion, the court did not err in its ruling. St. v. Hoffman, 94 M 573, 23 P2d 972 (1933). See also St. v. Huffman, 89 M 194, 296 P 789 (1931).

Verdict Contrary to Law and Evidence: A motion for a new trial in a criminal case upon the ground that the verdict is contrary to the law and the evidence presents for the court's determination the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict. St. v. Hughes, 76 M 421, 246 P 956 (1926).

Appeal: Rulings upon the admission or rejection of testimony and upon giving or refusing instructions may be reviewed either upon appeal from the judgment or on appeal from an order refusing a new trial, but any other questions arising from this section may be reviewed only upon appeal from an order denying a new trial. St. v. Brantingham, 66 M 1, 212 P 499 (1923).

Modification of Verdict Without New Trial: Under a former statute providing that when the verdict is contrary to the law or evidence but the evidence shows the accused to be guilty only of a lesser degree or a lesser included offense rather than the degree of which he was convicted, the court could modify the judgment without granting a new trial and the expression "the verdict is contrary to the evidence" meant the same thing as the expression "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict". St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919); Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

Scope of Appeal of Ruling on Motion: Upon an appeal from an order granting or denying a motion for a new trial, the Supreme Court sits as a court of error and review, not as a court of original jurisdiction or as an appellate court that is clothed with authority to try the motion de novo. St. v. Schoenborn, 55 M 517, 178 P 294 (1919).

Content of Notice of Motion: The notice of a motion for a new trial in a criminal case need not state whether the motion will be based on affidavits or a bill of exceptions, and the statement therein of the grounds on which the motion will be made is notice of what will be the basis of the motion. St. v. Landry, 29 M 218, 74 P 418 (1903).

Waiver of Objection: When on a motion for a new trial it is found that the counsel for the defendant consented to the taking of certain exhibits to the jury room previously admitted in evidence on a prosecution for murder, such consent constitutes a waiver of any objection to the sending of the exhibits to the jury during retirement. St. v. Allen, 23 M 118, 57 P 725 (1899).

Chapter Commission Comments

Source of 1991 Commission Comments: The 1991 comments to this chapter were prepared by the Commission on Criminal Procedure appointed by the Supreme Court. The Commission's work extended over nearly a decade. The comments were prepared for proposed rules of criminal procedure. The Supreme Court determined that the proposed rules would be better suited to adoption by the Legislature. The Commission received assistance from the State Bar of Montana and the Montana County Attorneys' Association. The following were members of the Commission at various times: Robert L. Deschamps III, Chairman; Honorable Thomas A. Olson; Honorable Henry Loble; Honorable Leif B. Erickson; Professor James T. Ranney; John P. Connor; Daniel V. Donovan; Gary G. Doran; Harold Hanser; Joe L. Hegel; Ted O. Lympus; Marc F. Racicot; and Michael J. Sherwood. The Commission also received valuable assistance from its intern, Peter Carroll, and from Leslie Halligan, who compiled the Commission's work.

The Commission's work ultimately resulted in the enactment of Chapter 800, Laws of 1991. The commission comments were substantially rewritten by the Code Commissioner and his staff to reflect changes from the time the rules were initially proposed and to reflect the change from a rules format to a statute format. The Code Commissioner has substituted references to "statute" for "rule" when appropriate and has substituted MCA citations for references to proposed rules. The Code Commissioner has inserted "1987" in MCA references that originated with the Commission because that is the version of the MCA the Commission originally used. The annotator has also deleted references to "proposed" material that has been adopted. Bracketed material has been inserted to indicate changes made by the 1991 Legislature that were not based on the Commission's proposal. The Code Commissioner extends his thanks to John P. Connor and Michael J. Sherwood for their review of the revised comments.

Chapter Case Notes

Limited Jurisdiction: Police courts (now City Courts), like Justices' Courts, are courts of limited jurisdiction and have only such authority as is expressly conferred upon them. State ex rel. Marquette v. Police Court, 86 M 297, 283 P 430 (1929).

Nature of Action for Ordinance Violation: The nature of an action for the violation of a city ordinance, whether civil or criminal, must be determined by the relief sought in the proceeding without regard to the question of whether some other proceeding may or may not be brought under the state statutes. State ex rel. Marquette v. Police Court, 86 M 297, 283 P 430 (1929).

Part Case Notes

Remedy for Criminal Prosecution of Public Nuisance: Panasuk, convicted in City Court of misdemeanor criminal public nuisance charges under 45-8-111, contended that because 3-10-301, 25-31-102, and Rule 4(B), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), preclude a nonrecord court from hearing actions involving the title to or possession of real property, jurisdiction for prosecution of the public nuisance charge must lie with the District Court. He cited 45-8-112 as authority that any action to abate a nuisance must be brought in the name of the state and that because abatement is a form of injunctive relief, the District Court has exclusive jurisdiction. He also argued that 27-30-202 provides the exclusive civil and criminal remedies for public nuisance. His claims were dismissed for the following reasons: (1) charges filed under 45-8-111 were criminal rather than related to a civil action involving title to or possession of real property, which is regulated by the sections cited by Panasuk; (2) the remedy created by 27-30-202 has been supplemented by subsequent legislative action regarding a City Court's jurisdiction over misdemeanors and by the enactment of 46-17-101 (now repealed), which requires that all prosecutions brought in City Court be commenced by a sworn complaint; and (3) because Panasuk's interpretation would result in a direct contradiction between 27-30-202 and statutes subsequently enacted, the argument that 27-30-202 provides the exclusive remedies for public nuisance is erroneous. Billings v. Panasuk, 253 M 403, 833 P2d 1050, 49 St. Rep. 499 (1992).

Disqualification of Justice of the Peace: Under former law, the word "judge" did not include "justice of the peace", and a Justice of the Peace could not be disqualified on a simple affidavit for substitution of judge. Bailey v. St., 163 M 380, 517 P2d 708 (1973).

Procedure for Requesting Speedy Trial — Justice's Court: An inmate of the state prison who sought a speedy trial upon a Justice's Court complaint, by virtue of which a detainer had been filed at the prison, should have petitioned the District Court setting forth the facts of the complaint against him and requested a speedy trial rather than directing such a request to the County Attorney or petitioning the Supreme Court. Petition of Ditton, 145 M 594, 403 P2d 205 (1965).

Pleading City Ordinance: In a criminal proceeding, it is sufficient to plead a city ordinance by reference to its title, section, and subdivision of section. Philipsburg v. Weinstein, 21 M 146, 53 P 272 (1898).

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute is an adaptation of 1987 MCA 46-17-201. The statute recognizes the defendant's right to a jury of six members but allows that a jury of less than six may be agreed upon. Subsection (2) deletes the requirement for both parties' approval before a jury trial may be waived. The statute permits such a waiver upon the defendant's written request. The change recognizes that waiver of the jury trial is an exclusive right of the defendant.

Commission Comment Not Divided: This section is a recodification of part of section 95-2004, R.C.M. 1947. Sections 46-17-203 through 46-17-205 [46-17-204 and 46-17-205 now repealed] are also derived from section 95-2004. Compiler's Comments

1999 Amendment: Chapter 346 in (1) at beginning deleted "Subject to subsection (3)"; deleted former (3) that read: "(3) A defendant in a misdemeanor case filed in justice's or city court is limited to one jury trial, either in justice's or city court or on appeal to the district court. The defendant shall either elect a jury trial in justice's or city court or reserve jury trial for the district court in the event of conviction and subsequent appeal to the district court. The defendant's election or reservation must be noted by the court on the face of the charging document"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 19, 1999.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 346, L. 1999, provided: "WHEREAS, in Woirhaye v. Montana Fourth Judicial District Court, 1998 MT 320, [292] Mont. [185], [972] P.2d [800] (1998), the Montana Supreme Court found that Chapter 129, Laws of 1997, impinges upon rights to a jury trial guaranteed by Article II, section 26, of the Montana Constitution."

1997 Amendment: Chapter 129 at beginning of (1) inserted reference to subsection (3); and inserted (3) limiting defendants to one jury trial in misdemeanor criminal cases filed in a Justice's or City Court and requiring election or reservation of jury trial. Amendment effective March 24, 1997.

Applicability: Section 5, Ch. 129, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] applies to criminal charges filed on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 24, 1997.

1995 Amendment: Chapter 7 in (1) and (2) substituted reference to parties for reference to defendant; and made minor changes in style.

1991 Amendment: In (1), after "defendant", inserted "in a misdemeanor case" and at end inserted "at any time before the verdict"; substituted (2) concerning waiver of jury trial by defendant for former text that read: "(2) A trial by jury may be waived by the consent of both parties expressed in open court and entered in the docket"; and deleted (3) that read: "(3) Questions of law shall be decided by the court and questions of fact by the jury except that, when a jury trial is waived, the court shall determine both questions of law and questions of fact".

Case Notes

Constitutionality of Waiver of Jury Trial by Defendant Over State's Objection — Writ of Supervisory Control Granted: Defendant Courville was charged in Justice's Court with speeding, DUI, and possession of an open container. Courville requested a waiver of a jury trial, and the state objected. The Justice's Court granted the waiver, finding that the statute violated Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const. The state filed an application for a writ of supervisory control and a motion for stay of proceedings pending the Supreme Court's review of the application. Courville argued that only a defendant, and not the state, has the constitutional right to a jury trial and the corresponding ability to waive the right despite statutory language to the contrary in this section. The Supreme Court vacated the waiver of a jury trial, holding that Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const., provides a right of a jury trial to the state and that both parties in a criminal trial must consent to waiver. State ex rel. Long v. Justice's Court, 2007 MT 3, 335 M 219, 156 P3d 5 (2007), overruling State ex rel. Nelson v. District Court, 262 M 70, 863 P2d 1027 (1993).

Purpose of Act — Declaratory Judgment Properly Used to Test Constitutionality of Criminal Jurisdictional Statute — Previous Opinion Applied by Remand: Defendants in criminal proceedings in several different Justices' Courts filed actions under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act (UDJA) to have declared unconstitutional statutes requiring a criminal defendant in a Justice's Court proceeding to choose between a jury trial in Justice's Court or in District Court. Several civil actions requesting the same relief under the UDJA were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. The state argued that the UDJA was not intended to be used for this purpose and that the various criminal defendants could obtain the same relief by raising the unconstitutionality of the underlying statute as a defense in their individual criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court noted that acceptance of the state's position would require each criminal defendant to litigate the constitutionality of the pertinent sections of law both in the District Courts and in the Montana Supreme Court. Citing Goff v. St., 141 M 605, 374 P2d 862 (1962), St. v. Wilson, 160 M 473, 503 P2d 522 (1972), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997), and noting that the issue of the constitutionality of the pertinent statutes could be raised, but not finally decided, in the District Courts, the Supreme Court held that it was proper to use the UDJA to determine the constitutionality of the statutes requiring the election of a jury trial in one court and not both courts. On this substantive issue, the Supreme Court cited its recent decision in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), holding that the statute requiring the election was unconstitutional, and remanded the cases to the District Courts with directions to enter declaratory judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and appellants. McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (3) of this section providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and 46-17-311. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare subsection (3) of this section unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-311(1), and former subsection (3) of this section to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999), and Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

City Court Error to Refuse Waiver of Jury Trial — Error Waived by De Novo Appeal: McCarvel was charged with DUI within the city limits of Billings and scheduled for trial in the City Court. The city demanded a jury trial, but McCarvel waived his right to trial by jury. The City Court refused to accept the waiver, and the jury convicted McCarvel. On appeal to the District Court, McCarvel moved to dismiss on the grounds that the City Court committed error. The District Court refused to dismiss, and McCarvel changed his plea to guilty. Citing St. v. O'Brien, 35 M 482, 90 P 514 (1907), the Supreme Court held that because the trial in District Court is a trial de novo, in which a defendant has an opportunity for a trial without a jury, the opportunity for a District Court trial cured whatever prejudice resulted from the City Court's refusal to grant the right to a waiver provided under the provisions of this section. Billings v. McCarvel, 262 M 96, 863 P2d 441, 50 St. Rep. 1460 (1993).

Guilty Plea Not to Be in Writing: Both 46-12-201, regarding the arraignment of an accused, and this section, regarding the procedure applicable to a plea in Justice's Court, require that a defendant appear in open court, that there be actual communication between the judge and defendant, that the judge first make the requisite inquiries of and provide mandated information to the defendant, and that a plea be accepted as part of that communicative process. There is no provision in either statute that allows a judge to accept a guilty plea from a defendant in either a felony or misdemeanor case through the expedient of the defendant or defendant's counsel simply filing a written plea with the court. The Supreme Court expressed its disapproval of the practice and admonished state courts to comply with the statutory mandates. However, in this case, defendant was at all times represented by counsel, who was personally involved in the written plea. Because defendant's substantive rights were not affected, acceptance of the written guilty plea by the trial court was allowed to stand. St. v. Schneiderhan, 261 M 161, 862 P2d 37, 50 St. Rep. 1242 (1993).

Waiver of Jury Trial When Only Questions of Law Raised: Where defendant raised only legal questions in his challenge to the constitutionality of 61-3-301, his waiver of jury trial was effective regardless of whether or not the court advised him that only legal issues were involved and that the judge, not a jury, decides all legal issues, since only the court can decide questions of law. St. v. Turk, 197 M 311, 643 P2d 224, 39 St. Rep. 584 (1982).

Questions of Law — Questions of Fact: The provision that the court shall decide questions of law but can give no charge with respect to matters of fact was the statement in legislative form of an ancient legal maxim which has been enacted in many statutes and has been deemed so vital to the rights and liberties of the people that it has been engrafted upon the constitutions of states. St. v. Sullivan, 9 M 174, 22 P 1088 (1890).

46-17-202. Formation of trial jury for justices', municipal, and city courts.

Commission Comments

1991 Comment: This statute preserves the first two subsections of 1987 MCA 46-17-202. Subsection (1) governs the formation of a list of potential jurors for lower courts. Subsection (2) retains the provision allowing oral notice that a juror has been summoned. The remainder of the 1987 code provision is not retained because the conduct of voir dire and other matters concerning actual jury selection are governed by other statutes.

2007 Amendment: Chapter 133 in (1) in fifth sentence after "must be" substituted "filed" for "kept on file". Amendment effective April 5, 2007.

Extension of Effective Date: Section 1, Ch. 99, L. 2005, amended sec. 9, Ch. 441, L. 2003, by extending the effective date imposed by Ch. 441 to October 1, 2007. Effective March 24, 2005.

Applicability Date Extended: Section 2, Ch. 99, L. 2005, amended sec. 10, Ch. 441, L. 2003, to read: "[This act] applies to combined jury lists compiled partly from the lists submitted under [section 1] [61-5-127] by the department of justice to the clerks of the district courts on and after the second Monday of May 2008." Amendment effective March 24, 2005.

2003 Amendment: Chapter 441 in (1) in first sentence near beginning after "jury list" inserted "under 3-15-404(6)" and near middle before "shall prepare" substituted "clerk of the district court" for "county commissioners and clerk and recorder" and in fifth sentence near beginning after "must be" substituted "kept on file" for "filed" and at end inserted "as provided in 3-15-403". Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Applicability: Section 10, Ch. 441, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to combined jury lists compiled partly from the lists submitted under [section 1] [61-5-127] by the department of justice to the clerks of the district courts on and after the second Monday of May 2006."

1991 Amendment: In (1), in first sentence after "justice's", inserted "municipal"; deleted (3) and (4) that read: "(3) The prosecuting attorney and the defendant or his attorney shall conduct the examination of prospective jurors. The court may conduct an additional examination. The court may limit the examination by the defendant, his attorney, or the prosecuting attorney if the court believes such examination to be improper.

(4) Each party may challenge jurors for cause, and each challenge must be tried by the court. The challenge may be for any cause enumerated in 46-16-304(2) (renumbered 46-16-115). Each defendant shall be allowed three peremptory challenges, and the state shall be allowed the same number of peremptory challenges as all of the defendants"; and made minor changes in style.

1983 Amendment: In (1), after "the county" substituted "commissioners and clerk and recorder" for "jury commission".

Case Notes

Impartial Jury — No Change of Venue: Notwithstanding the pretrial publicity and the judge's comment that transfer of the case would cause expense to the county, if each juror seated could render an impartial verdict based upon the evidence, there was no error in not transferring the case. St. v. Buckley, 171 M 238, 557 P2d 283 (1976).

How Challenges Taken — Waiver: When the State waived its fourth peremptory challenge and the defendant exhausted his peremptory challenges, it was not error, on the panel's being filled and passed for cause, to permit the State to peremptorily challenge a juror who was in the box when the State waived its fourth challenge; the State's waiver of its fourth challenge was not a waiver of any subsequent challenge to which it was entitled. St. v. Peel, 23 M 358, 59 P 169 (1899).

Applicability: Section 4, Ch. 354, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to denial of motions to withdraw pleas of guilty or nolo contendere entered on or after [the effective date of this act]." Effective April 16, 2003.

1999 Amendment: Chapter 395 throughout section after "plea of guilty" inserted "or nolo contendere". Amendment effective October 1, 1999.

1997 Amendment: Chapter 163 in (1)(a), at beginning, inserted "subject to the provisions of subsection (3)"; inserted (3) regarding the acceptability of a guilty plea disclosed through audio-video communications; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective March 26, 1997.

Applicability: Section 6, Ch. 163, L. 1997, provided: "[This act] [46-12-211, 46-16-105, 46-17-203, 46-18-102, and 46-18-115] applies to guilty pleas entered and sentences pronounced after [the effective date of this act]." Effective March 26, 1997.

1989 Amendment: Inserted (2) relating to waiver of trial de novo; and made minor changes in form and phraseology.

Case Notes

Person Pleading Guilty in Justice's Court Not Entitled to Appeal to District Court for Trial De Novo: Fyant pleaded guilty in Justice's Court to failure to provide proof of insurance and received a suspended sentence and a $350 fine with the understanding that all or part of the fine would be suspended upon a finding by the court of an inability to pay on the part of Fyant. Fyant offered proof of the inability to pay, but the Justice's Court made no finding regarding her ability to pay and refused to suspend the fines. Fyant filed an appeal with the District Court on the grounds that the sentence was illegal. The Supreme Court held that according to this section, a person who pleads guilty in Justice's Court waives the right of trial de novo and that Fyant failed to take advantage of the other methods of postconviction relief available to her. St. v. Fyant, 2004 MT 298, 323 M 408, 104 P3d 434 (2004).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under this section, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, 46-17-311 procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under 46-21-101, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Question of Adequacy of Advisement Regarding Waiver of Appeal Rights Resolved in Favor of Defendant: The first factor in determining whether good cause existed in allowing the withdrawal of a guilty plea and whether a court abused its discretion in denying a motion to withdraw the guilty plea, as set out in St. v. Bowley, 282 M 298, 938 P2d 592 (1997), is the adequacy of the court's interrogation at the time that the plea was entered regarding the defendant's understanding of the consequences of the plea. The plea must be a voluntary, knowing, and intelligent choice among the alternative courses of action open to the defendant. In the present case, Boucher was charged with DUI, and at his initial appearance, the Justice's Court had Boucher acknowledge in writing that he understood the waivers that he would make if he pleaded guilty. Boucher pleaded not guilty and waived no rights. Five months later, the state amended the complaint, and Boucher changed his plea to guilty, but at the time that the plea was entered, the Justice's Court did not reiterate the information provided at the initial appearance and failed to question Boucher regarding his understanding of the waiver of his constitutional rights. The Supreme Court concluded that the court's colloquy was inadequate and that good cause existed to permit Boucher to withdraw his guilty plea. Any doubt about the voluntariness of Boucher's plea was resolved in his favor, and the Supreme Court remanded to Justice's Court for further proceedings. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by 46-17-311, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is 46-17-311 unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-311, and this section. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Fine With or Without Imprisonment: The Legislature recognized a distinction between a judgment for a fine and one for a fine with imprisonment until the fine is paid. State ex rel. Hodgdon v. District Court, 33 M 119, 82 P 663 (1905).

Imprisonment for Full Period — Judgment Discharged: When a defendant was imprisoned under a predecessor section for the full period prescribed in a judgment rendered in a Justice's Court, such imprisonment operated ipso facto to satisfy and discharge the judgment. Petelin v. Kennedy, 29 M 466, 75 P 82 (1904).

Attorney General's Opinions

Indigents Unable to Pay Fines: A person who has been sentenced to a term of imprisonment and has also been fined cannot be imprisoned beyond the maximum term of imprisonment set by statute for the crime in question if he is indigent and financially unable to pay the fine at the time of sentencing. When an offense is punishable by fine only, a court cannot initially imprison an indigent because he is financially unable to pay the fine. If an indigent is unable to pay a fine it would not be unreasonable to require him to pay on a predetermined installment basis. 34 A.G. Op. 17 (1971).

Section 2, Ch. 149, L. 1997, provided: "Because [section 1] [46-17-311] codifies existing case law, [section 1] [46-17-311] applies to all suspended sentence revocation proceedings regardless of when the sentence was entered." Effective March 25, 1997.

1993 Amendment: Chapter 262 in first sentence of (1), after "justice's", deleted "municipal" and inserted second sentence regarding appeal from Municipal Court to District Court.

1991 Amendment: In (1), at beginning, substituted "for cases in which legal issues are preserved for appeal pursuant to 46-12-204" for "as provided in 46-17-203", after "justice's" inserted "municipal", and at end substituted "for other criminal cases" for "a trial jury in a civil action, except that the total number of jurors drawn shall be at least six plus the total number of peremptory challenges"; in (2), at beginning of first sentence, substituted "The defendant" for "A party", substituted "filing" for "giving", and after "judgment" deleted "except that the state" and inserted "is rendered following trial" and inserted second sentence concerning notice of appeal by prosecution; in (3), after "days", inserted "of filing the notice of appeal, the court shall transfer", after "record of the" substituted "court of limited jurisdiction to the district court" for "justice's or city court proceedings must be transferred to the district court or the appeal must be dismissed", and deleted last sentence that read: "It is the duty of the appellant to perfect the appeal"; and made minor changes in style.

Coordination Instruction — Amendment Void: Section 2, Ch. 470, L. 1991, provided: "If Senate Bill No. 51 is passed and approved and if Senate Bill No. 51 contains a section amending 46-17-311, then [this act] is void." Senate Bill No. 51 was approved May 23, 1991, as Ch. 800, L. 1991, and included an amendment to 46-17-311. Therefore, the amendment to 46-17-311 contained in sec. 1, Ch. 470, L. 1991, is void.

1989 Amendment: At beginning inserted exception clause.

1985 Amendment: In (2) at beginning substituted "A party" for "The defendant" and at end inserted "except that the state may only appeal in the cases provided for in 46-20-103"; and near end of (3) substituted "appellant" for "defendant".

Case Notes

Trial De Novo Rather Than Hearing Appropriate Absent Evidence of Prosecutor Conduct Warranting Mistrial: On an appeal from City Court on a DUI conviction, Whittinghill contended that the District Court should have held an evidentiary hearing on whether the prosecutor goaded Whittinghill into moving for a mistrial. However, Whittinghill did not present any cogent argument or statement of available evidence indicating that the situation was a product of prosecutor misconduct and only speculated about why the prosecution's only witness gave offending testimony. Absent a showing that the prosecutor did anything to goad the defense into moving for a mistrial, the District Court properly denied an evidentiary hearing and granted a trial de novo. Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009).

Date Defendant Sentenced In Absentia Considered Date of Legally Effective Sentence for Appeal Purposes: Clark was charged with a misdemeanor traffic violation but failed to appear for trial and was tried, convicted, and sentenced by the Municipal Court in absentia pursuant to 46-16-123 on June 12, 2006. A warrant was issued for failure to appear, and Clark appeared before a different Municipal Court on July 14, 2006, and was informed of the June sentence. Clark sought to appeal to District Court, but the District Court dismissed the appeal on grounds that it was untimely. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Clark argued that dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was in error because the period for filing a Municipal Court appeal should have begun on July 14 when he was informed of the June sentence, rather than June 12 when the sentence was actually imposed. The Supreme Court disagreed. A valid sentence was imposed on June 12 and was not subject to postponement or modification until Clark appeared on the bench warrant. By Municipal Court Rule, Clark had until June 26 to file an appeal, but the appeal was not filed until July 28 and was therefore untimely and was properly dismissed by the District Court. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 317, 346 M 80, 193 P3d 934 (2008). See also St. v. Bonamarte, 2006 MT 291, 334 M 376, 147 P3d 220 (2006).

Improper Denial of State's Right to Appeal Justice's Court Suppression Motion: A Justice's Court granted Willis's motion to suppress that precluded the state from presenting statements made by Willis on the day of an accident on grounds that the state had unlawfully obtained the statements in violation of constitutional guarantees against self-incrimination. The state appealed the Justice's Court's ruling to the District Court, and the District Court granted Willis's motion to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked jurisdiction. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Regardless of whether the Justice's Court order suppressed evidence or a confession or admission, the state had a statutory right under 46-20-103 to appeal the Justice's Court's ruling. Trial de novo in District Court was the proper proceeding for the state's appeal pursuant to St. v. Yarns, 252 M 45, 826 P2d 543, 49 St. Rep. 132 (1992), and St. v. Kesler, 228 M 242, 741 P2d 791, 44 St. Rep. 1490 (1987). St. v. Willis, 2008 MT 293, 345 M 402, 192 P3d 691 (2008). See also St. v. Strizich, 286 M 1, 952 P2d 1365, 54 St. Rep. 1241 (1997).

Interim Appeal, Rather Than Trial De Novo, Appropriate for Consideration of Double Jeopardy Challenge: Barron appealed a Justice's Court decision to the District Court for trial de novo, then moved to dismiss the case on double jeopardy grounds. The motion was denied, and Barron appealed to the Supreme Court. Normally, the Supreme Court will not consider appeals from District Court unless a final judgment of conviction has been rendered. However, as set out in Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007), there is no trial de novo if a second trial in District Court would violate the provision against double jeopardy. Thus, notwithstanding the fact that the District Court had not rendered final judgment, the Supreme Court accepted Barron's interim appeal to consider the merits of the double jeopardy claim. St. v. Barron, 2008 MT 69, 342 M 100, 179 P3d 519 (2008).

Appeal of City Court Ruling — Trial De Novo in District Court Proper Remedy: Defendant was charged in Three Forks City Court with four counts of endangering the welfare of a minor. The City Court determined that a fair trial could not be had in Three Forks and, upon motion by the city for a change of venue, ordered the case and jurisdiction transferred to Madison County. A Madison County Justice's Court jury convicted defendant of one count and acquitted on three counts. Defendant appealed to Gallatin County District Court, requesting that the case be dismissed because the Three Forks City Court improperly granted the change of venue. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, but concluded that the change of venue was an abuse of discretion and remanded to the Three Forks City Court for a new trial. The city appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The general rule is that, with few exceptions, District Courts must try appeals from Justices' Courts and City Courts de novo, rather than acting as courts of review. In this case, none of the statutory or case law exceptions to the general rule applied, so the District Court was limited to the remedy of conducting a de novo trial as required by this section, regardless whether the City Court's change of venue was erroneous. A trial de novo in District Court also cured any prejudice that might have been suffered by defendant occasioned by the change of venue. The case was remanded for a trial de novo in Gallatin County District Court. Three Forks v. Schillinger, 2007 MT 331, 340 M 211, 173 P3d 681 (2007), distinguishing Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800 (1998), and St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Counsel Present but Defendant Not in Attendance for District Court Appeal in Misdemeanor Case — No Authority of District Court to Dismiss Appeal When Defendant Not Required to Be Present: Clark appealed a Justice's Court judgment for issuing a bad check, and the District Court set a trial de novo. On the day of trial, Clark's counsel was present, but Clark did not appear in person. Because Clark was not present, the District Court dismissed the appeal pursuant to this section and reinstated the Justice's Court judgment. Clark appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed and remanded. Under 46-16-120, a defendant may appear by counsel only in all misdemeanor cases unless the court requires the defendant's personal appearance. Because Clark's counsel was present and ready to proceed and because the District Court did not require Clark's personal presence, the District Court did not have authority to dismiss the appeal and should have proceeded with the trial pursuant to 46-16-122. St. v. Clark, 2006 MT 313, 335 M 39, 149 P3d 551 (2006).

Concurrent Justice's Court and District Court Jurisdiction Over Misdemeanor Family Assault No Right to Trial De Novo From Court of Record: Brockway was charged with two misdemeanor and two felony counts of family member assault. Brockway moved to sever the misdemeanor counts and have them tried first in Justice's Court so that he would have the opportunity to appeal to District Court. The District Court concluded that it lacked jurisdiction to try the misdemeanor charges, so the misdemeanor charges were severed and remanded for trial in Justice's Court. The state appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's conclusion that it did not have jurisdiction to try the misdemeanors was erroneous. Under 3-10-303, District Courts have concurrent jurisdiction with Justices' Courts over misdemeanor charges of partner or family member assault. Additionally, under this section, there is no right to a trial de novo from District Court or from a Justice's Court that is a court of record, so Brockway was entitled to one jury trial in a court of record—in this case, the District Court—and if convicted, Brockway could then appeal to the Supreme Court. The case was remanded for trial in District Court on all charges. St. v. Brockway, 2005 MT 179, 328 M 5, 116 P3d 788 (2005).

Failure to Provide Notice That Arresting Officer Would Appear as Witness — No Error: At Boettiger's DUI bench trial in Justice's Court, the arresting officer testified regarding Boettiger's actions on the day in question. Boettiger was convicted and appealed to District Court, but the state did not provide Boettiger with written notice that the officer would again be a witness. Nevertheless, the District Court allowed the officer to testify over Boettiger's objection, and Boettiger's counsel subjected the officer to extensive cross-examination. Boettiger was again convicted and on appeal alleged error in the state's failure to list the officer as a potential witness. The Supreme Court did not condone the failure to provide notice but found that Boettiger knew that the officer would testify again and failed to demonstrate prejudice as a result of the officer's testimony. The Supreme Court disregarded the irregularity because it did not affect Boettiger's substantive rights, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Boettiger, 2004 MT 313, 324 M 20, 101 P3d 285 (2004), following St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307 (1997).

Contrary Instructions Regarding Appeal Process From Justice's Court — Appeal to District Court Considered Petition for Postconviction Relief: Boucher pleaded guilty to DUI in Justice's Court, signing a form stating that the plea was voluntary and constituted waiver of the right to appeal to District Court. Despite the waiver, the written judgment stated that Boucher could appeal to the District Court within 10 days. Boucher subsequently learned that his driving privileges would be revoked in Washington as a result of the guilty plea, so he moved to withdraw the guilty plea following conviction. The motion was denied, and Boucher appealed to District Court, but that court held that the guilty plea was voluntary and dismissed the appeal for lack of subject matter jurisdiction because under 46-17-203, entry of a guilty plea in Justice's Court waives a defendant's right to a trial de novo in District Court. Further, this section procedurally requires adjudication of a matter by trial in a Justice's Court or City Court as a prerequisite to an appeal in District Court. Boucher then appealed to the Supreme Court, which exercised subject matter jurisdiction by considering Boucher's appeal to District Court as a petition for postconviction relief. Under 46-21-101, a defendant who asserts the illegality of a sentence and has exhausted all appeal remedies provided by law may petition for postconviction relief with the District Court in the county where the court of limited jurisdiction is located. A petition for postconviction relief is not another form of appeal from a criminal case, but a separate civil proceeding aimed at vacating, setting aside, or correcting a sentence, and is available to a defendant whose sentence is imposed by a court of limited jurisdiction. Here, the District Court correctly determined that Boucher had no right to appeal the Justice's Court's denial of the motion to withdraw the guilty plea. However, given the contrary instructions concerning the appeals process issued by the Justice of the Peace, the fact that the Justice's Court is not a court of record, and the nature of Boucher's constitutional challenge to the validity of his plea, the District Court held an evidentiary hearing to establish a factual basis for ruling on the issues, and those proceedings constituted the functional equivalent of a postconviction hearing. Boucher was eligible to pursue postconviction relief given the absence of an appellate remedy and the constitutional claims asserted, and the District Court erred in finding that it had a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. (See 2003 amendment.) St. v. Boucher, 2002 MT 114, 309 M 514, 48 P3d 21 (2002), following St. v. Christensen, 265 M 374, 877 P2d 468 (1994), and St. v. Liefert, 2002 MT 48, 309 M 19, 43 P3d 329 (2002).

Appeal to District Court Allowed Only After Trial in Lower Court, Not After Forfeiture of Bond — Exclusive Statutory Remedy for Appeals From Courts of Limited Jurisdiction: Kempin was charged in Justice's Court with seven fish and game violations but failed to appear for trial, so the appearance bonds that Kempin had posted were forfeited and Kempin's hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges were suspended for 10 years. Kempin appealed to the District Court within 10 days of the Justice's Court judgment, but the appeal was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction and because Kempin had no statutory right to appeal the forfeitures as a matter of law, so Kempin appealed to the Supreme Court. Under Art. VII, sec. 4, Mont. Const., District Courts must hear appeals from inferior courts as trials de novo unless otherwise provided by law, and appeal of a criminal conviction from a court of limited jurisdiction is governed exclusively by this section, which provides three circumstances under which a criminal defendant may appeal to District Court for a trial de novo: (1) when a defendant pleads guilty or nolo contendere but preserves legal issues raised by pretrial motion for appeal; (2) when a defendant files written notice of intention to appeal within 10 days after a judgment is rendered following a trial; and (3) when a defendant appeals revocation of a suspended sentence. Here, Kempin claimed that denial of a District Court trial by jury following forfeiture in Justice's Court violated his due process rights. However, Kempin raised no appealable pretrial issues, nor was the case an appeal of a suspended sentence, so the first and third circumstances did not apply. Kempin did appeal the judgment within 10 days, but there was no trial, so Kempin was not constitutionally entitled to a trial de novo when there had been no trial initially, nor is this section unconstitutionally vague for not explicitly proscribing an appeal following a forfeiture. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's explanation in declining jurisdiction—that if a defendant was automatically entitled to a trial de novo on appeal without first having a trial in Justice's Court, a defendant could avoid Justice's Court altogether by not appearing and forfeiting the Justice's Court bonds and then pursuing a trial in District Court, which would render the Justice's Court system meaningless. Kempin's other due process arguments were also not compelling because Kempin waived his trial rights by failing to appear in Justice's Court to assert any constitutional rights and in light of his stated intention to forfeit the bonds and the advance notice of the suspension of the hunting, fishing, and trapping privileges. Absent any statutory basis for an appeal, dismissal of the appeal by the District Court was affirmed. St. v. Kempin, 2001 MT 313, 308 M 17, 38 P3d 859 (2001). See also St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), and St. v. Schulke, 2005 MT 77, 326 M 390, 109 P3d 744 (2005).

No District Court Error in Failing to Hold Trial De Novo in Municipal Court Appeal: Campbell was charged in Missoula Municipal Court with criminal trespass, disorderly conduct, and obstructing a police officer. Campbell failed to appear for trial and was tried in absentia and convicted on all charges. Campbell appealed to District Court, was notified of the appropriate Municipal Court appeal procedure in 3-6-110, and was given 10 days to file a brief. Campbell failed to file a brief, so the District Court dismissed the appeal and remanded to Municipal Court for further proceedings. Campbell appealed to the Supreme Court on grounds that the District Court should have conducted a trial de novo pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. Campbell's appeal was from a Municipal Court and thus was governed by 3-6-110, rather than this section, so the appeal was confined to review of the record and questions of law. The District Court did not err in failing to conduct a trial de novo, and dismissal of Campbell's appeal for failure to file a brief was affirmed. Missoula v. Campbell, 2001 MT 271, 307 M 286, 37 P3d 670 (2001).

No Authority to Appeal Justice's Court Order Denying Motion to Withdraw Guilty Plea: The Feights got into a fight with a highway patrol officer at a high school basketball game and were charged with misdemeanor assault. They were informed of their rights in Justice's Court, waived their right to counsel, and pleaded guilty. More than a month later, they moved through counsel to withdraw their guilty pleas, claiming good cause under 46-16-105. The Justice's Court denied the motion, holding that the Feights had been given due process and had voluntarily, knowingly, and willingly entered guilty pleas. The Feights appealed the denial of their motion to withdraw their guilty pleas to District Court. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, contending that the District Court lacked jurisdiction to review denial of the motion to withdraw a plea. The District Court dismissed the appeal but remanded to Justice's Court with a recommendation that the Feights be allowed to withdraw their pleas. Instead, the Justice's Court reinstated judgment, and the Feights appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed. The statutes that provide for and determine the jurisdiction of a District Court to entertain an appeal from a Justice's Court include 3-5-303, 46-12-204, 46-17-203, and this section. However, none of these statutes provide authority for appeal to the District Court from the denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea. Further, the specific language of these sections prevails over the general language in 46-20-104 defining the scope of appeal by a criminal defendant. The Legislature has not created a statutory right of appeal from a Justice's Court denial of a motion to withdraw a guilty plea, and the Supreme Court refrained from creating one. St. v. Feight, 2001 MT 205, 306 M 312, 33 P3d 623 (2001), distinguishing St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115 (1994), and followed in St. v. Fox, 2001 MT 209, 306 M 353, 34 P3d 484 (2001).

Improper Reliance by District Court on Justice's Court Proceeding Constituting Denial of Right to Trial De Novo — Reversal Warranted: Stedman was convicted in Justice's Court of criminal mischief and appealed to District Court for a trial de novo. During the District Court trial, the judge referenced the Justice's Court proceedings in several instances, which strongly suggested that the judge was unduly influenced by the Justice's Court proceedings, denying Stedman of the constitutional and statutory right to a trial de novo. The Supreme Court remanded for a trial de novo. St. v. Stedman, 2001 MT 150, 306 M 65, 30 P3d 353 (2001).

Purpose of Act — Declaratory Judgment Properly Used to Test Constitutionality of Criminal Jurisdictional Statute — Previous Opinion Applied by Remand: Defendants in criminal proceedings in several different Justices' Courts filed actions under the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act (UDJA) to have declared unconstitutional statutes requiring a criminal defendant in a Justice's Court proceeding to choose between a jury trial in Justice's Court or in District Court. Several civil actions requesting the same relief under the UDJA were consolidated for the purposes of appeal. The state argued that the UDJA was not intended to be used for this purpose and that the various criminal defendants could obtain the same relief by raising the unconstitutionality of the underlying statute as a defense in their individual criminal prosecutions. The Supreme Court noted that acceptance of the state's position would require each criminal defendant to litigate the constitutionality of the pertinent sections of law both in the District Courts and in the Montana Supreme Court. Citing Goff v. St., 141 M 605, 374 P2d 862 (1962), St. v. Wilson, 160 M 473, 503 P2d 522 (1972), and Gryczan v. St., 283 M 433, 942 P2d 112 (1997), and noting that the issue of the constitutionality of the pertinent statutes could be raised, but not finally decided, in the District Courts, the Supreme Court held that it was proper to use the UDJA to determine the constitutionality of the statutes requiring the election of a jury trial in one court and not both courts. On this substantive issue, the Supreme Court cited its recent decision in Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), holding that the statute requiring the election was unconstitutional, and remanded the cases to the District Courts with directions to enter declaratory judgments in favor of the plaintiffs and appellants. McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999).

Limitation to One Jury Trial Held Unconstitutional: In 1997, the Legislature enacted the provisions codified at 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and former subsection (1) of this section, providing that a person tried for a misdemeanor in Justice's or City Court who appeals to the District Court has the right to only one jury trial. Woirhaye was charged with misdemeanor DUI and requested a jury trial in Missoula County Justice's Court. Upon his conviction by the Justice's Court jury, Woirhaye appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo pursuant to Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., and this section. Woirhaye asked that the District Court declare 46-17-201(3) unconstitutional, but the District Court denied his motion. Woirhaye then petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted on the grounds that Woirhaye would otherwise be denied a fundamental right. The Supreme Court held that Woirhaye's right to a jury trial in both the Justice's Court or City Court and the District Court was a fundamental right guaranteed by Art. II, sec. 24 and 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court pointed out that the right to a jury trial is guaranteed by Art. III, sec. 2, clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution and the sixth amendment to the U.S. Constitution and also that even if that were not the case, Montana may, under the rationale of St. v. Bullock, 272 M 361, 901 P2d 61 (1995), provide rights in excess of those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The Supreme Court noted, in response to the state's argument that Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., guarantees "a" jury trial, that the state's argument was not persuasive against the language of Art. II, sec. 26, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court also distinguished Ludwig v. Mass., 427 US 618 (1976), holding that Art. VII, sec. 4(2), Mont. Const., was not implicated in the case, and stated that any language in N. Cent. Serv., Inc. v. Hafdahl, 191 M 440, 625 P2d 56 (1981), indicating that a requirement for a jury trial applicable to Small Claims Court was satisfied if the right was granted at the District Court level, was dicta and could not be relied upon to support the state's case that only one jury trial was required. Consequently, the Supreme Court held 46-7-102(1)(g), 46-17-201(3), and former subsection (1) of this section to be unconstitutional as violating Woirhaye's right to a jury trial. (See 1999 amendment.) Woirhaye v. District Court, 1998 MT 320, 292 M 185, 972 P2d 800, 55 St. Rep. 1298 (1998), followed in McGillivray v. St., 1999 MT 3, 293 M 19, 972 P2d 804, 56 St. Rep. 11 (1999), and Balyeat Law, P.C. v. Harrison, 1999 MT 144, 295 M 13, 983 P2d 902, 56 St. Rep. 566 (1999), and followed and clarified in St. v. Rensvold, 2006 MT 146, 332 M 392, 139 P3d 154 (2006).

Trial De Novo — Exclusive District Court Remedy for Alleged Denial of Jury Trial in City Court — No Right to District Court Review: The exclusive remedy of defendant convicted of traffic violations in City Court, who claimed that he was forced into a bench trial in City Court and denied the exercise of his right to a jury trial, was a trial de novo in the District Court. The District Court could not sit as a court of review. Therefore, the District Court properly denied his motion to dismiss for failure to allow a jury trial in City Court. St. v. McKee, 1998 MT 110, 288 M 454, 958 P2d 700, 55 St. Rep. 433 (1998).

Payment of Justice's Court Cost Imposed as Judgment of District Court Held Improper — Smith Reaffirmed: Morales was charged with assaulting a sports official, in violation of 45-5-211, after striking a basketball referee. Upon his conviction in Justice's Court, Morales appealed to District Court. Upon his conviction, the District Court ordered Morales to pay the costs of the trial in Justice's Court. The Supreme Court reaffirmed its holding in Billings v. Smith, 281 M 133, 932 P2d 1058 (1997), and held that a trial de novo in District Court has the effect of erasing any debt for costs in Justice's Court incurred before the appeal to District Court. St. v. Morales, 284 M 238, 943 P2d 1286, 54 St. Rep. 862 (1997).

Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court — Failure to Include Citation of Authority for Lack of Jurisdiction — Jurisdictional Argument Not Addressed on Appeal: Sol appealed his DUI conviction in Justice's Court to the District Court. In the Supreme Court, Sol argued that the failure of the Justice's Court Clerk to timely transmit the file to the District Court within the time provided by this section deprived the District Court of jurisdiction. The Supreme Court noted that Sol had failed to cite any authority, as required by former Rule 23, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), for his assertion that the clerk's failure deprived the District Court of jurisdiction. For this reason, the Supreme Court declined to address the issue of the District Court's jurisdiction. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Failure of Justice's Court Clerk to Timely Transmit Case File to District Court — No Speedy Trial Violation: Sol appealed his DUI conviction in the Justice's Court to the District Court. The Justice's Court Clerk failed to transmit the case file within the time provided by this section. The District Court Clerk scheduled the trial 110 days after Sol filed his notice of appeal from Justice's Court. Sol argued that the clerk's failure caused a violation of his right to a speedy trial. The Supreme Court noted that the 1-day delay in transmittal of the file probably resulted in the District Court Clerk's scheduling the trial 1 day later, in 110 days rather than in 109 days. Because a delay must be presumptively prejudicial before other speedy trial factors will be analyzed and because a delay of less than 6 months is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court held that it would not apply the other speedy trial criteria and held that Sol's right to a speedy trial had not been violated. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Justice's Court Clerk Delay Not Attributable to Prosecution: After Sol appealed his DUI conviction in Justice's Court to the District Court, the Justice's Court Clerk failed to transmit the case file to the District Court within the 30-day time limit required by this section. Sol argued that the requirements of the statute should be strictly construed against the state. The Supreme Court held that the duty to transmit the file was only the duty of the clerk and neither Sol nor the prosecution was responsible for the transmittal. Citing the reasoning in St. v. Dubray, 201 M 327, 654 P2d 970 (1982), the Supreme Court refused to attribute to the prosecution the Justice's Court Clerk's failure to strictly comply with the statute. St. v. Sol, 282 M 69, 936 P2d 307, 54 St. Rep. 246 (1997).

Objection to Dismissal Not Prerequisite to State's Right to Appeal Dismissal: The state did not have to object in Justice's Court to the defendant's motion to dismiss in order to preserve the state's right to appeal the grant of the motion to the District Court. St. v. Romero, 279 M 58, 926 P2d 717, 53 St. Rep. 1050 (1996).

Appeal of Misdemeanor Conviction From Justice's Court to District Court — No Record of Oral Pronouncement of Sentence in Justice's Court — District Court Jurisdiction Upheld: Tweedy was convicted by a Justice's Court jury of misdemeanor assault and was scheduled for sentencing on April 18, 1989. On April 19, Tweedy filed a notice of appeal to the District Court. The Justice's Court filed its sentencing order on May 3. Later, in response to a motion by Tweedy to dismiss the underlying charge, the state contended that the District Court had not acquired jurisdiction over Tweedy. The Supreme Court held that since there was no evidence in the record that the sentencing hearing scheduled for April 18 did not, in fact, take place and since, under St. v. Mortenson, 175 M 403, 574 P2d 581 (1978), appeal may be taken within 10 days after sentence is orally pronounced in open court, Tweedy's notice of appeal was timely filed and the District Court had jurisdiction over the case. The Supreme Court also noted that the later enactment of 46-18-116, which applies to Justices' Courts by virtue of 46-1-103, requiring a signed judgment on the record, should eliminate confusion in the future regarding when the statutory time for appeal begins to run. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Appeal to District Court — Burden on State to Ensure Speedy Trial: Tweedy perfected the appeal of his misdemeanor conviction to the District Court. After Tweedy asked for and received a continuance and was substituted for his counsel, to act pro se, nothing further happened in the case until 5 years later, when the state moved to dismiss Tweedy's appeal because of his lack of diligence in pursuing it. The District Court granted the state's motion. The Supreme Court held that the burden was not upon Tweedy to pursue the appeal, but was upon the state to ensure that the constitutional requirements for a speedy trial were complied with. The Supreme Court reasoned that any other decision would ignore the de novo nature of the appeal to District Court and would penalize a defendant exercising a statutory right of appeal. St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996).

Notice of Appeal Timely Filed: Defendant was convicted by a City Court jury of driving under the influence of alcohol and resisting arrest. Defendant's notice of appeal was filed 14 days after conviction and sentencing. The appeal was dismissed on the basis that the appeal was not timely filed. The District Court erred in dismissing the appeal because it failed to exclude intermediate weekend days and legal holidays as required by rule. St. v. Price, 271 M 409, 897 P2d 1084, 52 St. Rep. 527 (1995), followed in St. v. Pizzola, 283 M 522, 942 P2d 709, 54 St. Rep. 774 (1997).

Period of Time Prescribed or Allowed — Ten Days or Less: The Justice's Court sentenced Schindler on March 4, 1994. On appeal, the state contended that Schindler's notice of appeal filed by fax on March 14, 1994, was untimely. The Supreme Court applied Rule 21, M.U.R.J.C.C. (Title 25, ch. 24), in interpreting this section to mean that when the period of time prescribed or allowed is 10 days or less, intermediate Saturdays, Sundays, and legal holidays are excluded from the calculations. St. v. Schindler, 268 M 489, 886 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 1421 (1994), distinguishing St. v. Arthur, 234 M 75, 761 P2d 806 (1988), and followed in St. v. Pizzola, 283 M 522, 942 P2d 709, 54 St. Rep. 774 (1997).

Revocation of Suspended Sentence — Right to Trial De Novo in District Court Based on Similarities to Criminal Proceedings — Legislative Intent: Defendant pleaded guilty and received a suspended sentence in Justice's Court. Upon defendant's arrest again on additional charges, the state filed a petition in Justice's Court to revoke the suspended sentence. The Justice's Court found that defendant had violated the conditions of the suspended sentence and again suspended sentence, adding additional conditions. Defendant appealed to the District Court for a trial de novo on the petition for revocation of suspended sentence. The state moved to dismiss the appeal, arguing that no appeal is available under this section because a suspended sentence revocation is an administrative rather than a criminal proceeding. The District Court agreed and granted the state's motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that based on cogent and numerous similarities between criminal and revocation proceedings, appeals de novo from Justice's Court revocations of suspended sentences are available under and governed by this section. Any other holding would foreclose any appeal to or review by any court from a Justice's Court's revocation of a suspended sentence and would fail to take into account the Legislature's intent to provide for appeals de novo to the District Court from all final Justice's Court proceedings, criminal or civil. (See 1997 amendment.) St. v. Rogers, 267 M 190, 883 P2d 115, 51 St. Rep. 1037 (1994).

Dismissal of Appeal Based on Failure to Post Bond — Reversible Error: On appeal of a City Court conviction of misdemeanor assault, defendant moved for a stay of execution pending appeal and requested that the record be transferred to the District Court. The District Court informed defendant that a $1,000 appearance bond must be filed within 10 days or the appeal would be dismissed and the City Court judgment reinstated. Upon defendant's failure to post the bond, the appeal was dismissed. The right to appeal a criminal conviction from Justice's Court or City Court is purely statutory. Nothing in this section requires that an appeal bond or appearance bond be posted to perfect an appeal, and in the absence of such a requirement, the District Court may not impose one. The District Court's requirement of an appearance bond and subsequent dismissal based on the failure to post the bond constituted reversible error. St. v. Ward, 266 M 424, 880 P2d 1343, 51 St. Rep. 885 (1994), following State ex rel. Abbitt v. Justice Court, 220 M 210, 714 P2d 140 (1986).

Municipality Not Liable for Municipal Judge's Violation of Defendants' Civil Rights: Under state law, a Municipal Court Judge's failure to advise indigent defendants of their right to appointed counsel occurred under the state's judicial authority rather than under the municipality's authority, precluding imposition of civil rights liability against the city. Eggar v. Livingston, 40 F3d 312 (1994).

Premature Appeal of Judgment Not Including Sentence — De Novo Appeal Only — Appeal Not Perfected Properly Dismissed: Todd was convicted of assault in Justice's Court and, before he was sentenced, filed a notice of intention to appeal. The Justice's Court nevertheless proceeded to sentencing, and Todd was sentenced to pay a $250 fine or to perform community service, to pay costs, and to a 6-month deferred sentence. Several months after fulfilling the community service, Todd was informed that he had not paid the costs, whereupon the state moved for imposition of sentence and for dismissal of the earlier appeal. The court granted the state's motion, and Todd subsequently filed a notice of appeal from the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal.

The District Court held that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order and dismissed the appeal. Citing St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509 (1991), and St. v. Wilson, 252 M 264, 827 P2d 1286 (1992), the Supreme Court held that the right to appeal from a judgment was a right to appeal from a judgment that includes a sentence and that because sentence had not been pronounced at the time that Todd filed his first notice, the notice was premature and ineffective. The Supreme Court held that the second notice of appeal was also ineffective in that it was filed months after sentencing and not within the time required by statute. The District Court was correct in holding that it had no jurisdiction to review the Justice's Court's order dismissing the first appeal, both because the appeal to District Court is a trial de novo and not a review of lower court orders and because the notice of appeal was untimely filed. St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), followed in St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), followed in St. v. Mora, 277 M 411, 922 P2d 516, 53 St. Rep. 736 (1996).

Retrial of Unconvicted Offense Prohibited — Dismissal of Conviction for Uncharged Offense Affirmed: Barker was charged with DUI but was convicted of reckless driving by the Ravalli County Justice of the Peace. Barker appealed to the District Court and filed a motion to dismiss, which the District Court granted. On appeal by the state, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the reckless driving charge and the DUI charge were inapposite charges and that reckless driving was not a lesser included offense of DUI. The Supreme Court also held that while a defendant's statutory remedy for appealing a Justice's Court decision is a trial de novo in the District Court, it would be a violation of the prohibition against double jeopardy to try Barker again on the DUI charge because Barker was originally charged with that offense and jeopardy had attached when the first witness was sworn. When Barker appealed from the erroneous conviction of an uncharged offense, he did not waive his constitutional protection against double jeopardy for charges of which he was acquitted. St. v. Barker, 260 M 85, 858 P2d 360, 50 St. Rep. 970 (1993).

Oral Pronouncement of Guilt and Delayed Sentencing — Appeal Improper Pending Final Judgment: Following a nonjury trial on February 5, the Justice of the Peace orally pronounced defendant guilty of DUI and driving while the privilege to do so was suspended or revoked and ordered defendant to obtain an alcohol evaluation and return for sentencing February 26. On February 7, the Justice's Court issued a written order and mailed it to the prospective parties. On February 11, defendant filed a notice of appeal with the District Court, and the case was transferred on March 11. On March 28, the state filed a motion to dismiss on the basis that the appeal was premature because defendant had not been sentenced. On April 1, the District Court dismissed and remanded the case back to Justice's Court for sentencing before defendant had an opportunity to respond with a brief. An appeal cannot be utilized until judgment has been fully rendered. Dismissal was proper because the District Court lacked subject matter jurisdiction absent final judgment by the Justice's Court. St. v. Wilson, 252 M 264, 827 P2d 1286, 49 St. Rep. 243 (1992), distinguished in St. v. Caldwell, 1998 MT 261, 291 M 272, 968 P2d 711, 55 St. Rep. 1076 (1998).

Judgment and Sentence Prerequisite to Appeal to District Court — Misdemeanors: Except for misdemeanors listed in 3-5-302(2), a District Court is limited to appellate jurisdiction of misdemeanor cases. Imposition of sentence and entry of a final judgment by a Justice's Court or City Court are prerequisites to appeal to a District Court, and a party may not consent to subject matter jurisdiction or waive the want of jurisdiction. St. v. Hegeman, 248 M 49, 808 P2d 509, 48 St. Rep. 318 (1991), followed in St. v. Todd, 262 M 108, 863 P2d 423, 50 St. Rep. 1466 (1993), St. v. Tweedy, 277 M 313, 922 P2d 1134, 53 St. Rep. 656 (1996), and St. v. Diesen, 1998 MT 163, 290 M 55, 964 P2d 712, 55 St. Rep. 655 (1998), and distinguished in St. v. Caldwell, 1998 MT 261, 291 M 272, 968 P2d 711, 55 St. Rep. 1076 (1998).

Dismissal of Appeal From City Court to District Court — No Final Judgment: Appellant sought to appeal from City Court to District Court a decision made at a show cause hearing regarding forfeiture of bail bonds. However, because no order or final judgment issued out of the hearing, there was no right of appeal from that hearing. Helena v. Buck, 247 M 313, 806 P2d 27, 48 St. Rep. 213 (1991).
